Howard Wolfson, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton, said any nominee would face a barrage from the right. "I think that history demonstrates that whoever the nominee is is going to engender opposition from the right, and we will certainly be prepared," Mr. Wolfson said.

Mrs. Clinton's campaign has attracted some new enemies. John LeBoutillier, a former Republican congressman from New York and conservative commentator, said he started a Stop Hillary political action committee in part because he thought her opponents "gave her a free pass" in her two Senate races.

"I started by trying to figure out what it is about her that bugs the heck out of people," Mr. LeBoutillier said, mainly by looking at public polls. He said his organization recently spent $20,000 to run television commercials in Iowa featuring footage of a handful of potential Democratic caucus-goers saying that they distrusted Mrs. Clinton as a power-hungry opportunist.

Still, he acknowledged that his group had struggled for money.

Richard H. Collins, a Dallas investor, has taken over an unrelated group that was conceived by the Republican consultant Arthur J. Finkelstein to oppose Mrs. Clinton. Mr. Collins, who redirected the group toward the presidential race, said he had put in about $200,000 in "seed money" to start a Web site, www.stophernow.com. It plays cartoons of Mrs. Clinton as the host of a late-night talk show who is in the habit of batting guests over the head with a hammer.

"The idea is to present Hillary Clinton as she is and not as the person she is pretending to be," using humor, Mr. Collins said.

David N. Bossie, the president of the conservative group Citizens United who played a pivotal role in publicizing accusations about the Clintons during their White House years, has announced plans to collaborate on a documentary film attacking Mrs.

Clinton with Dick Morris, the Clintons' estranged political adviser. Mr. Morris has made a career out of criticizing the Clintons in books and a syndicated column. Mr. Bossie has moved on to write books criticizing the last two Democratic presidential nominees and to produce four conservative political films.

Many conservatives still consider Mrs. Clinton the Helen of Troy of direct mail, the face who can launch a thousand donations. Richard Viguerie, a direct mail pioneer who worked on former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani's short-lived Senate campaign against Mrs. Clinton in 1999, said he had not had such success in four decades of fund-raising.

"We couldn't mail enough," Mr. Viguerie said. "The money was just coming in in bucketloads from all over the country."

But by the time the Clintons had left the White House in 2000, Morton Blackwell, another veteran conservative, found mailings for his Emergency Committee to Stop Hillary Rodham Clinton had little success. "The experience with the initial solicitation persuaded me not to do any more," Mr. Blackwell said.

As a senator from New York, Mrs. Clinton has built an alliance with some former critics like Rupert Murdoch, chairman of News Corporation. He has raised money for her, and his New York Post has grown respectful in its coverage.

Still Mr. Viguerie, speaking by phone from a meeting at the office of a founding father of the conservative movement, Paul Weyrich, said they would attack Mrs. Clinton with everything they had. "The vast right-wing conspiracy lives," he said.

Wrong Is Right (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

Many people are perplexed by the uproar over Senator Hillary Clinton's refusal to say, as former Senator John Edwards has, that she was wrong to vote for the Iraq war resolution. Why is it so important to admit past error? And yes, it was an error — she may not have intended to cast a vote for war, but the fact is the resolution did lead to war; she may not have believed that President Bush would abuse the power he was granted, but the fact is he did.

The answer can be summed up in two words: heckuva job. Or, if you want a longer version: Medals of Freedom to George Tenet, who said Saddam had W.M.D., Tommy Franks, who failed to secure Iraq, and Paul Bremer, who botched the occupation.

For the last six years we have been ruled by men who are pathologically incapable of owning up to mistakes. And this pathology has had real, disastrous consequences. The situation in Iraq might not be quite so dire — and we might even have succeeded in stabilizing Afghanistan — if Mr. Bush or Vice President Dick Cheney had been willing to admit early on that things weren't going well or that their handpicked appointees weren't the right people for the job.

The experience of Bush-style governance, together with revulsion at the way Karl Rove turned refusal to admit error into a political principle, is the main reason those now-famous three words from Mr. Edwards — "I was wrong" — matter so much to the Democratic base.

The base is remarkably forgiving toward Democrats who supported the war. But the base and, I believe, the country want someone in the White House who doesn't sound like another George Bush. That is, they want someone who doesn't suffer from an infallibility complex, who can admit mistakes and learn from them.

And there's another reason the admission by Mr. Edwards that he was wrong is important. If we want to avoid future quagmires, we need a president who is willing to fight the inside-the-Beltway conventional wisdom on foreign policy, which still — in spite of all that has happened — equates hawkishness with seriousness about national security, and treats those who got Iraq right as somehow unsound. By admitting his own error, Mr. Edwards makes it more credible that he would listen to a wider range of views.

In truth, it's the second issue, not the first, that worries me about Mrs. Clinton. Although she's smart and sensible, she's very much the candidate of the Beltway establishment — an establishment that has yet to come to terms with its own failure of nerve and judgment over Iraq. Still, she's at worst a triangulator, not a megalomaniac; she's not another Dick Cheney.

I wish we could say the same about all the major presidential aspirants.

Senator John McCain, whose reputation for straight talk is quickly getting bent out of shape, appears to share the Bush administration's habit of rewriting history to preserve an appearance of infallibility.

DOJ_NMG_0133693

Last month Senator McCain asserted that he knew full well what we were getting into by invading Iraq: "When I voted to support this war," Mr. McCain said on MSNBC, "I knew it was probably going to be long and hard and tough, and those that voted for it and thought that somehow it was going to be some kind of an easy task, then I'm sorry they were mistaken."

But back in September 2002, he told Larry King, "I believe that the operation will be relatively short," and "I believe that the success will be fairly easy."

And as for Rudy Giuliani, there are so many examples of his inability to accept criticism that it's hard to choose.

Here's an incident from 1997. When New York magazine placed ads on city buses declaring that the publication was "possibly the only good thing in New York Rudy hasn't taken credit for," the then-mayor ordered the ads removed — and when a judge ordered the ads placed back on, he appealed the decision all the way up to the United States Supreme Court.

Now imagine how Mr. Giuliani would react on being told, say, that his choice to head Homeland Security is actually a crook. Oh, wait.

But back to Mrs. Clinton's problem. For some reason she and her advisers failed to grasp just how fed up the country is with arrogant politicians who can do no wrong. I don't think she falls in that category; but her campaign somehow thought it was still a good idea to follow Karl Rove's playbook, which says that you should never, ever admit to a mistake. And that playbook has led them into a political trap.

After A Delicately Worded Pitch, Clinton Draws Cheers (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

COLUMBIA, S.C., Feb. 19 — Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton told an audience of black voters on Monday that they would be "breaking barriers" if they supported her for president in 2008 — deliberately signaling that they could still take pride in making history if they chose a woman over one of their own, Senator Barack Obama of Illinois.

It was a delicately worded pitch — Mrs. Clinton did not mention Mr. Obama by name — and it drew applause. Another remark, that "anyone can be president," set off an ecstatic standing ovation.

Afterward, several black voters said they would support Mrs. Clinton, a New York Democrat, on the merits, and postpone a vote for Mr. Obama until a future presidential election, once he had more experience.

The two Democrats, rivals for their party's presidential nomination, were both in South Carolina this holiday weekend competing for the support of blacks, who cast almost half of the votes in the Democratic primary here in 2004. South Carolina is scheduled to be fourth in the string of nominating primaries and caucuses for the 2008 race.

Mrs. Clinton's task here became more complicated last week when one of her prominent black supporters, State Senator Robert Ford of South Carolina, said that nominating Mr. Obama would be a disaster.

"Every Democrat running on that ticket next year would lose because he's black and he's top of the ticket," said Mr. Ford, who is black.

The remark caused a sensation. Mr. Ford apologized.

Mr. Obama said Saturday that history was full of examples of people telling blacks, "We can't." He then said that, with black support, he could say to voters, "Yes, we can."

The Clinton campaign criticized the Ford jab, but Mrs. Clinton said nothing herself, advisers said.

In an interview with The Associated Press in South Carolina on Monday, Mrs. Clinton was pressed on hot-button issues in the state. She said she would like to see the Confederate battle flag removed from the Statehouse grounds in Columbia, and she denied that there was anything untoward about a consulting contract that her campaign executed recently with the firm of an influential black state senator here who agreed to endorse her around the same time.

Mrs. Clinton put her own gentle spin on Mr. Ford's remark at a forum here at Allen University, a historically black institution, by arguing that a candidate could make history by winning in 2008 — and that she should be that candidate.

"I believe this presidential election is about breaking barriers — and this is the campaign, and I am the candidate with the experience to break the barriers," Mrs. Clinton said.

A little later, hundreds of audience members, many of them black women, stood and cheered when Mrs. Clinton asked, “Can a woman be president?” Many stood and cheered again, seconds later, when she added, “I believe one of the great things about America is, anyone can be president, and what it depends upon is the individual.”

Mrs. Clinton also referred several times to her husband, former President Bill Clinton, who is widely popular with black Democrats.

After the forum, several black audience members said they would support Mrs. Clinton over Mr. Obama, and added that race was not a factor for them.

“All in all, I feel she’s the better candidate — her experience as a senator, in the White House,” said Angel Matta Jr., a freshman at Allen. “After more time, Obama will be a great president, too.”

Mrs. Clinton also appeared at a tribute Monday in Charleston for the state’s most powerful black Democrat, Representative James E. Clyburn, majority whip of the United States House, who also met with Mr. Obama over the weekend. While Mr. Clyburn is holding off on an endorsement, he urged Mrs. Clinton to try to make history.

“No one has ever won who did not run,” he said. “Run, Hillary, run!”

In S.C., Sen. Clinton Targets Black Vote (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

COLUMBIA, S.C., Feb. 19 -- Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York courted black voters, considered crucial to securing the Democratic presidential nomination, in a series of campaign stops in South Carolina on Monday in which she cast the 2008 election as a chance to make history.

"I believe this presidential campaign is about breaking barriers," Clinton said at a town hall meeting in the state's capital. "This is the campaign, and I am the candidate."

Each of Clinton's appearances was aimed at projecting her as the candidate best equipped to deal with the hopes and hardships of black voters. She called on state leaders to remove the Confederate flag from the grounds of the State House here, as have several other Democratic candidates. Then, after her town hall event at Allen University -- a historically black institution in Columbia -- she headed south to a gathering in Florence in honor of Mayor Frank Willis.

Clinton closed the day in Charleston, speaking at a gala honoring Rep. James E. Clyburn (D-S.C.), who is widely regarded as the most influential black politician in the state. Clinton praised Clyburn -- the third-ranking Democrat in the House -- for his efforts "to find common ground and then stand his ground."

She also noted that the Book of James is one of her favorites in the New Testament -- a religious reference that was greeted with calls of approval and clapping by the overflow crowd packed into a union hall.

Clyburn returned the favor moments later, touting Clinton's "tremendous record of public service and a tremendous campaign that she is running."

Clinton's visit came less than 48 hours after Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) campaigned here, and even during Clinton's speech in Columbia word was circulating that Obama had secured the endorsement of Dick Harpootlian, a former state party chairman.

Obama's attempt to step on Clinton's day in South Carolina underscored the behind-the-scenes back-and-forth between the two top Democratic candidates for the support of black voters, who are expected to make up about half of the electorate in the state's presidential primary Jan. 29.

Clinton scored something of a coup last week by securing the endorsement of state Sen. Darrell Jackson, an influential leader in South Carolina's black community. But the momentum was compromised by allegations that she secured Jackson's support by offering him a lucrative consulting contract.

Jackson, the emcee at the Columbia event, has insisted that several campaigns had made offers to hire his consulting firm. On Monday, Clinton, too, denied any quid pro quo.

These events were far from the minds of the hundreds of people who packed halls across the state to catch a glimpse of Clinton.

Chris Lykes, a black man from Swansea who attended the Columbia meeting, reflected the ambivalence of voters torn between their strong loyalties to Clinton and their attraction to a new face in Obama.

Lykes said that Clinton had "answered all the tough questions" and that he supports the former first lady.

Asked his feelings about Obama, though, Lykes said the senator's being black "matters a whole lot" in his decision, and he acknowledged he had yet to choose between the two candidates.

Although Obama is widely seen as the first black candidate with a serious shot at winning the presidency, national polling shows Clinton with a wide lead among black voters.

In a recent Washington Post-ABC News survey, Clinton led Obama by 60 percent to 20 percent among black voters -- a wider margin than the 41 percent to 17 percent lead she held over the freshman senator among the broader Democratic primary electorate.

Much of Clinton's strong support in the black community is due to the affection that many African Americans hold for her husband, former president Bill Clinton.

Those warm feelings were on display Monday, as the very mention of his name brought a roar from the crowd. "I was always a big fan of your husband," said one man who stood to pose a question in Columbia. "I thought he did a great job."

Asked why she is qualified to lead the nation in a time of peril at home and abroad, Clinton referred to the time she spent by her husband's side in Washington.

"During the eight years of Bill's presidency, I had a front row seat on history [and saw] the difficult decisions any commander in chief has to make," she said. "I learned both what works and what doesn't work."

Clinton Emphasizes Her Gender As Strategy (POL)

By Ben Smith

The Politico, February 20, 2007

COLUMBIA, S.C. -- Roberta Stokes said she cried Monday morning when she heard Hillary Rodham Clinton ask whether America is ready for a woman to be president. "That was emotional to me," said Stokes, 69, a retired teacher. "A lot of people don't understand that a woman is strong enough to do that." But Stokes said she'd also been moved when Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., came to Columbia last week, carrying the promise that he could become the first black president. "I couldn't make a choice right now on them," she said.

Clinton spent Monday morning before a mostly black, mostly female crowd in the South Carolina capital, and she seemed to grasp Stokes' choice clearly. Her pitch was equally clear: One pioneer at a time.

"I believe this presidential election is about breaking barriers," Clinton said. "This is the campaign and I am the candidate with the experience to break those barriers."

Clinton's tailored case to a black audience reflected her new directness in talking about herself as a woman and a mother. Former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher reportedly took voice lessons to sound more like a man; Clinton has gone in the other direction since announcing her bid for the presidency, speaking more explicitly about her sex than ever before in her political career. And while the shift has the lofty aim of trying to change national attitudes toward women, it also reflects a cold, strategic reality.

"I like numbers. I like politics because it is about the bottom line," said Ann Lewis, a former White House communications director who has long been, among other roles, Clinton's liaison to women's groups. "Fifty-four percent of the electorate in November 2004 was women."

Clinton is the only woman among the 10 or so Democrats seeking the presidency, and despite a persistent storyline of discomfort among many women about her candidacy, she has a history of drawing women's support. In New York last year, she won re-election to the Senate with 73 percent of women voting for her and 61 percent of men, according to exit polls. The first major national group to endorse her presidential campaign was the powerhouse EMILY's List, which backs female candidates. And Clinton, alone among candidates for the presidency in a world of mostly male political junkies, draws mostly female crowds.

The new emphasis on gender by a candidate who once famously disparaged baking cookies and having teas -- enraging many women who enjoyed both those activities -- takes many forms, explicit and implicit. Clinton's new stump speech raises, before she can be asked, the question of whether Americans will elect a female president, and she speaks at times specifically as a woman and as a mother.

Clinton describes her campaign in what is a traditionally feminine vocabulary: She launched her bid for the White House in a video expressing her desire to "chat" with the electorate. She pledges to be a president who will "listen." Her campaign events are described as "conversations."

In a telephone interview last week, Lewis resisted the notion that the campaign is speaking primarily to women, and suggested that it differs from other campaigns merely in speaking as directly to women as to men. "What is unusual is that this is a campaign in which women are not sort of an afterthought," Lewis said. "The traditional Democratic campaign would go along saying, 'Of course we're talking to everybody,' and then would look at their numbers around Labor Day and say, 'We've got to do a better job talking to women.' "

Clinton's explicit embrace of her gender was a choice, and it represents a gamble of sorts. Though most polling shows a gender gap between parties and candidates, other factors -- such as race and income -- are typically stronger determinants of voters' preference. And according to a Siena College poll released Monday, 12 percent of Americans still say they wouldn't vote for a woman for president. Other polling has suggested that Americans are more comfortable with female legislators than executives. But it's a gamble that appears, so far, to be paying off. In particular, Clinton appears to have managed to avoid a mass defection of African-American supporters to Obama.

In interviews with black women of her own, baby boomer generation, it appeared clear that for voters affected by the notion of electing a pioneer, Clinton is able to compete with Obama. "We need a woman," said Joy Silver, 60, an African-American nurse attending the Columbia event. "I think she's going to make it."

Clinton drew roars from the Columbia crowd when she told them, "I am proud to be a woman." But while Clinton connects with women, she faces a challenge of not alienating another, only slightly less important demographic group that has, perhaps, grown accustomed to being the center of candidates' attention: men.

"It's not a zero-sum game," insisted Lewis. "This is not about throwing men over the side."

To accuse Hillary of lack of substance and not understanding the issues is in itself an ill-informed comment. She has spent her life studing the issues even her republican opponents in the Senate admit that she always does her homework and is usually the smartest person in the room.What does a comment like tnproud2b's add to the conversation, how stupid.

by tnproud2b on 02.19.2007 at 10:56 PM

Since Hillary Clinton is so adamant about being a woman - I'm inclined to believe she's not. Seriously. Doesn anybody really know Hillary's gender?

by Macabee on 02.19.2007 at 09:23 PM

Sedona has a pretty good point. Gender has nothing to do with Hillary Clinton's qualifications (as race has nothing to do with Obama's bid). Playing the gender card seems to evidenc a lack of substance and understanding of the issues facing the country. Hillary's biggest challenge isn't her gender, but the fact that she's part of the status quo... part of a political system which has run amok and is out of touch with America. The great majority of this country is sick and tired of these self-serving, self-applauding Washington insiders who are obsessed with power for power's sake and have nothing at all in common with the rest of the country. Get real, Hillary. No one cares if you wear a skirt. What people care about is how you intend to fix a country which is falling into Third-Worldom!

by Sedona on 02.19.2007 at 08:26 PM

Hillary Clinton's 'gender' doesn't have anything to do with being President, after all, there are more than a few excellent female Chief Executives of major corporations and a few really good women Governors in America, what Hillary Clinton doesn't have is one minute of executive or chief executive experience in either the public or private sector, nor has she made one political decision in her life in which the responsibility for the results have been hers and hers alone. Something a Governor, President, and Chief Executive of a company does on a routine basis.

Clinton Defends S.C. Campaign Hire (AP)

By Jim Davenport

AP, February 20, 2007

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton on Monday denied that her campaign traded money for an endorsement from one of South Carolina's most influential black politicians.

In an interview with The Associated Press, Clinton responded to questions about the consulting contract her campaign negotiated with state Sen. Darrell Jackson, who last week endorsed her candidacy rather than of top rivals John Edwards or Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill.

"Senator Jackson was someone who was involved in my husband's campaigns. He was someone we turned to for political advice and counsel and I'm proud to have him on my team," Clinton told the AP.

Soon after the endorsement, Jackson acknowledged that his media consulting firm had negotiated a $10,000 per month contract with Clinton's campaign. Jackson has said he turned down more lucrative contracts from other candidates.

Although he backed Edwards, the former North Carolina senator, in the 2004 Democratic presidential primary, Jackson said he now supports Clinton because she has the best shot of winning the White House.

Mo Elleithee, a Clinton spokesman, said Friday that Jackson's firm will advise the campaign on "political matters in South Carolina, outreach, organizing issues" and purchasing advertising.

Jackson introduced Clinton when she spoke to more than 1,500 people gathered at Allen University, a historically black college in Columbia, where she lashed out at President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq, saying that Iraq needs to know "the blank check days are over."

On Monday evening, Clinton attended a tribute in Charleston to Majority Whip Jim Clyburn, a leading black member of Congress as No. 3 in the House leadership. African-Americans account for 49 percent of the state's Democratic primary vote.

Clinton, who spoke to the AP during her first trip to this early voting state since announcing her White House bid, also said South Carolina should remove the Confederate flag from its Statehouse grounds, in part because the nation should unite under one banner while at war.

"I think about how many South Carolinians have served in our military and who are serving today under our flag and I believe that we should have one flag that we all pay honor to, as I know that most people in South Carolina do every single day," the New York senator said.

"I personally would like to see it removed from the Statehouse grounds."

Other Democratic hopefuls, including Sens. Joe Biden of Delaware and Chris Dodd of Connecticut, have said the flag should come down. The banner, which once flew over the Statehouse dome and now flies nearby, is the subject of an ongoing NAACP boycott.

Clinton is one of several Democrats to draw huge crowds during campaign stops in the state, but she said during the interview that her party will have a tough time winning in GOP-heavy South Carolina.

"I think it's going to be hard for any Democrat to carry the state," she said. "The Republican Party is very strong here."

Clinton's visit comes close on the heels of Obama's two-day trip to the state in which he drew crowds of about 2,000 people.

Authentic Obama (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

ORANGEBURG, S.C. -- Is Barack Obama "authentically" black? Come on, be real. Is the pope Catholic?

Obama made his first campaign trip to this early-primary state over the weekend, drawing about 3,000 people to a rally in Columbia, the state capital, and 2,000 to a "town hall meeting" here in the city where I was born and raised. If those who rose early Saturday morning to attend the Orangeburg event constitute a representative focus group, black voters will want to weigh Obama's policy positions against those of the other candidates before deciding whom to support. But they won't spend a lot of time pondering his identity.

Among the dignitaries with front-row seats in the auditorium at Claflin University (where my mother used to be head librarian) was state legislator Gilda Cobb-Hunter, an African American, who had no patience for the "blackness" question that reporters kept asking.

"People talk as if this is, like, some kind of option for him," Cobb-Hunter said. "When Obama looks in the mirror in the morning, what do you think he sees? There is no way that he has any confusion about being a man of color. I think this issue is being manufactured by people who want to get us off focus. I don't hear the national media questioning Hillary Clinton about being a woman."

But what about the argument, posed by a couple of contrarian black columnists, that since Obama is not the descendant of slaves (white mother from America, black father from Kenya), he's a different kind of African American? "As time passes, very few people are going be able to say they marched in the civil rights movement," Cobb-Hunter said. "Are the people asking this question saying that if you didn't live through the Civil War, you can't understand slavery?"

Most of those in Obama's audience here had some past or present association with Claflin or nearby South Carolina State University, both of which are historically black colleges. Making my way through the crowd of old friends and neighbors, I wasn't able to find anyone willing to qualify Obama's blackness with an asterisk.

Henry N. Tisdale, Claflin's dynamic president -- the institution was failing when he took over in 1994 and now is firmly established in U.S. News & World Report's annual list of America's best colleges -- was less blunt than Cobb-Hunter, but no less dismissive of the question: "I think that in today's global and multicultural society, we will find persons such as Barack Obama becoming not the exception but the rule, and giving hope to all who want to live the American dream."

House Majority Whip James E. Clyburn, whose district includes Orangeburg, rearranged his schedule so he could be here to introduce Obama. "I thank him for giving new hope and inspiration to a new generation," Clyburn said. "Obama is able to run today because Rosa Parks sat down. . . . He is able to run today to give hopes and dreams to all of us."

I should make clear that none of these kind words added up to a formal endorsement. Almost a year remains before the South Carolina Democratic primary, scheduled for Jan. 29, in which African Americans will cast about half of all votes. Both Hillary Clinton and John Edwards hope to win significant black support in this state; I would advise them, and others, that trying to convince people that Obama somehow isn't black enough would be a poor use of precious time and resources.

Obama was comfortable in the town hall format, pacing like a talk-show host without notes or a lectern. His first big applause line was a call to fix "a health-care system that's broken." Someone in the audience yelled, "We want you to fix it!" and Obama yelled back, "We're going to fix it."

There were more cheers when he reiterated his opposition to the Iraq war, but he really got the crowd going when he talked about the national hunger for "a new kind of politics." People "want something new," he said, and the crowd enthusiastically agreed.

One woman, asking a question, mangled his name into "Barama." The candidate picked up on it immediately, saying that "they call me 'Alabama,' they call me 'yo' mama,' " but all that matters is that "I have your vote."

One of his biggest applause lines -- perhaps predictably, in a college town -- was a call for black Americans to "get over this anti-intellectualism we see in our community sometimes." And when he ended with a rousing "Yes, we can!" set piece, he exited the way every candidate wants to leave any room: with people on their feet, cheering for more.

Could Bill Clinton Take Over His Wife's Senate Seat If He Becomes The First First Husband? Some Think So. (WASHEX)

By Bill Sammon, The Examiner

Washington Examiner, February 20, 2007

WASHINGTON - If Hillary Rodham Clinton wins the presidency, some top Democrats would like to see her husband, former President Bill Clinton, appointed to serve out Hillary's unexpired Senate term.

"As a senator, he'd be a knockout," said Harold Ickes, who was once a top White House aide to Bill Clinton and now gives behind-the-scenes advice to Hillary. "He knows issues, he loves public policy and he's a good politician."

Some Democrats and political analysts say Bill Clinton would thrive in the world's greatest deliberative body, much like Lyndon Johnson did before he became president.

"President Clinton would excel in the Senate," said Paul Begala, who helped Bill Clinton get elected and served in the White House as a top aide.

"Why not?" Begala added. "He excelled as attorney general and governor of Arkansas, he excelled as president and he's been a model of the modern Senate spouse."

Larry Sabato, director of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia, agreed.

"Clinton is a natural for the Senate," Sabato said. "He loves to talk and schmooze. He could be a great vote-organizer. Majority Leader Clinton?"

Such a scenario is not beyond the realm of possibility now that the governor's mansion in New York is occupied by a Democrat, Eliot Spitzer, who succeeded Republican Gov. George Pataki last month. If Hillary Clinton wins the White House, Spitzer would likely appoint a fellow Democrat to take over her Senate seat.

So far, speculation about potential successors has focused on New York Attorney General Andrew Cuomo and environmental lawyer Robert F. Kennedy Jr., whose father once held the same Senate seat.

But Spitzer could just as easily appoint Bill Clinton, who, under New York law, would fill his wife's Senate seat through 2010. A special election would then be held, and the winner would serve the final two years of her term, which expires in 2012.

Although Ickes would love to see Bill Clinton in the Senate, he considers the scenario a long shot.

"I think there'd be a real call on [Spitzer] to appoint a black senator," Ickes said. "I think there'd be a real call on him to appoint a Hispanic senator."

Bill Clinton, who was once dubbed America's "first black president" by author Toni Morrison, would not be the first former president to serve in Congress. John Quincy Adams had a long career in the House after his presidency, and Andrew Johnson served briefly in the Senate after a stint in the White House. Johnson and Clinton are the only two presidents in history to have been impeached by the House. Both were acquitted by the Senate.

Political analysts say a Senate seat for Bill would go a long way toward solving a potentially nettlesome problem for Hillary — what to do with her husband if they return to the White House. The former president currently maintains an office in Harlem and a home with his wife in Chappaqua, N.Y.

"Nothing will solve the Bill problem entirely," Sabato said. "He will be restless and underfoot for Hillary, in part because he is the more talented pol."

There would also be financial ramifications.

"It would certainly lower the family income because there are restrictions on how much a senator can bring in on speeches and so forth," said presidential scholar Stephen Hess of George Washington University. "Of course he'd have housing, because she'd put him up in the Lincoln Bedroom or something."

Bush, Like Clinton, Presiding Over The Decline Of His Party (RC)

By Louis Jacobson

Roll Call, February 20, 2007

With the National Governors Association winter meeting set to begin later this week and the 2008 presidential race continuing to simmer, it seems an appropriate time to look at how both former President Bill Clinton and President Bush presided over a significant decline in their own parties' downballot fortunes.

Granted, the parallels aren't exact. For Clinton, the biggest drop in gubernatorial, legislative and Congressional seats came in 1994, two years after he was elected, whereas for Bush, it came after six years in office. And generally speaking, the declines in Democratic downballot strength under Clinton were steeper than those the Republicans have suffered under Bush (though if the trends from 2006 continue, the GOP could cumulatively be looking at Clinton-scale losses two years from now).

Still, despite the shadings of difference, it's hard to ignore the similarities.

After six years of Clinton, the Democratic Party claimed 13 fewer governorships than it had at the start of his presidency, seven fewer state Houses and five fewer state Senates — not to mention 47 fewer Democrats in the House and 12 fewer Democrats in the Senate.

Republicans now hold seven fewer governorships, five fewer state Senates and two fewer state Houses than they did when Bush took office, as well as 19 fewer House seats and one less Senate seat.

Six-year totals are the only appropriate way to measure Bush against Clinton. However, every metric discussed here also declined under Clinton during his full, eight-year run, and for some offices, the declines actually accelerated (see chart).

Of course, this unraveling of party fortunes is not entirely the fault of the men at the top of the ticket. Sooner or later, ancestrally Democratic rural conservatives, particularly those in the South, were going to become Republicans, whether that shift came in 1994 or later. Similarly, moderate suburbanites in Northeastern states seem destined to abandon their long-standing GOP habits.

In addition, downballot erosion during two-term presidencies is a well-established feature where Congress is concerned. For instance, former President Ronald Reagan lost eight Senate seats and 15 House seats in his first six years in office. If their consecutive terms are taken as one, former Presidents Richard Nixon and Gerald Ford lost five Senate seats and 48 House seats. Former Presidents John Kennedy and Lyndon Johnson, measured the same way, held steady in the Senate but lost 14 House seats in six years. And former President Dwight Eisenhower lost 14 Senate seats and 68 House seats over his first six years.

The number of GOP governors serving alongside Nixon after his first inauguration in 1969 was 31. By 1975 — the year after what would have been his second midterm election, had he not resigned — the number of Republican governors had plummeted to 13.

Even Reagan saw the number of GOP governors drop by seven on the eve of his second midterm election in 1986; he avoided the same fate as other presidents only because Republicans surged in gubernatorial elections in 1986, gaining a net of eight seats.

"Governors and legislators fall victim to diminished base turnout in nonpresidential years," said Republican strategist Patrick Davis. "I think you could surmise that the president's popularity, or lack of it, impacts his ability to motivate voters beyond the party activists to vote for 'his' candidates."

History aside, the larger-than-life personas of both Clinton and Bush — and their polarizing effect on the electorate — almost certainly contributed to their party's downballot decline.

The big Democratic losses of 1994 are widely attributed to frustration over the shortcomings of Clinton's first two years in office, from the controversy over gays in the military to his failure to enact health care reform. Later, the Monica Lewinsky scandal made Clinton an imperfect role model for his party. Clinton's push to stave off impeachment, while ultimately doing his GOP pursuers significant damage, likely prevented the White House from undertaking the kinds of efforts that could have aided Democrats running for lower office.

Bush-era Republicans, for their part, survived the 2002 and 2004 elections in better shape than the Clinton-era Democrats did in 1994 and 1996, but the chickens came home to roost in 2006. Much like the Lewinsky scandal for Clinton, the Iraq War sucked the air out of Bush's second term. As was the case with Democrats after 1994, Republicans chose to run away from their leader last year.

Both Clinton and Bush also benefited from, and were burdened by, having unified control of Congress and the executive branch — Clinton for two years and Bush for the better part of six. Unified control tends to raise expectations — and makes it easier to pin blame when the public mood sours.

In recent years, said George Mason University political scientist Michael McDonald, political polarization has meant a heightened nationalization of downballot elections. That means that downballot offices are more vulnerable to national swings.

"I don't think it is a coincidence that these two large swings were against the president's party, since centrist voters tend to like divided government," he said.

"These two-term presidents are often caught in some scandal which becomes a distraction," added Donna Brazile, a Democratic strategist and Roll Call contributing writer. "In Clinton's case, it was a steady drum beat of scandals brewing, and then came Monica. With Bush, it's the war," as well as the scandals surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) and imprisoned ex-lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

In other words, Clinton and Bush had to face extended periods in office when they needed to focus on their own political survival, rather than on aiding their party. And that had to hurt further down the ballot.

"Presidential campaigning in 1992 for Clinton and in 2000 for Bush was largely driven by a 'clean, new message,' and it followed that downballot candidates benefited," said one Republican strategist. "In subsequent years, the agenda of the national party dominated discussion, and like it or not, Members of Congress, governors and legislators were seen as somewhat beholden to those national agendas."

Some political experts, however, caution against drawing overly broad conclusions from the data.

Bernadette Budde, senior vice president of the Business Industry Political Action Committee, evokes the old Buffalo Springfield song that goes, "There's somethin' happenin' here/What it is ain't exactly clear."

"I wouldn't try too hard to quantify or figure out the 'what,'" Budde said. "We know that 'churning' at one level affects all other levels of the ballot, even if there is some lag. Voter dissatisfaction takes a while to rumble through the system."

For this reason, she said, BIPAC prefers to use the metaphor of an earthquake rather than a wave for changes like those that took hold in the 2006 election cycle.

"The evolution of what voters want continues, even if the electorate can't quite define the solutions to problems vexing their lives," she said. "Everyone elected in 2006 still sits atop an active fault line. Shifting tectonic plates have altered the political map, and when the earth stops moving, nothing will ever look the same."

Joe Biden And The Mouth That Soars (POL)

By Roger Simon

The Politico, February 20, 2007

AMES, Iowa -- Joe Biden is in the 27th minute of his five-minute presentation, but nobody in the church basement has slipped away, nobody is nodding off, nobody is doing anything but following his every word.

"It was a mistake," he says in reply to a question about his vote to authorize the Iraq war. "I regret my vote."

Joe Biden's mouth can get him in trouble, but when it is working right, the words drop from his lips like pearls, and nodding heads now spread through the audience like ripples on a pond.

Biden's full reply to the attendees of the Story County Annual Soup Supper takes 4 minutes and 45 seconds -- it can take him 4 minutes and 45 seconds to say "hello" -- but here is the short version:

"It was a mistake," Biden says. "I regret my vote. I regret not realizing how incompetent (the Bush administration) would be. The president did not level with us. And if I had known it, I would never have voted to give him that authority in the first place."

The applause washes over him. It threatens to go on and on until he cuts it off by saying: "I want to do yes-or-no answers from now on."

Everybody laughs.

"But that was an important question," Biden says.

How important? Well, imagine that question being asked at a Democratic debate -- as surely it will be -- with all the Democratic candidates on stage.

Biden will say his vote was a mistake. As will Chris Dodd. As will John Edwards.

Hillary Clinton?

She will say, I guess, what she said in Dover, N.H., the other day: "If the most important thing to any of you is choosing someone who did not cast that vote or has said his vote was a mistake, then there are others to choose from."

And Joe Biden wants to make sure he is one of the others they choose.

Most politicians love to serve but hate to run, and you can hardly blame them: Running is when you get the least respect. Running is when the voters remind you that you are a job applicant and they are doing the hiring.

But Biden, a senator from Delaware, seems to live for campaigning, live for the give and take, live for switching audiences from rapt attention to raucous laughter and back again.

Joe Biden is a glad-hander in the best sense of the word: He looks glad to be grasping each person's hand, looking the person in the eye, answering some question or exchanging some pleasantry -- "You're going to a wedding in Delaware? What hotel? You're kidding! I live four miles from that hotel!" -- and then, spying the next person down the row, saying, "I'm coming for you! I'm coming!"

At the soup supper, he kneels down on one knee on the tile floor next to an elderly woman and, gripping her hand, says in a loud whisper: "Let the press know I'm not a phony."

Does it really matter? Voters appreciate this much effort even if the candidate is faking sincerity.

The church basement is redolent of soup and succotash. People sit at long tables covered by oilcloths. Power strips have been supplied, not for laptops, but for the 18 crockpots in which the soups and stews bubble and simmer. A mild snowstorm (fewer than 5 inches) has been going on outside, but every seat is filled and some people are standing against the walls.

Retail politics like this has been derided. And while it is true that candidates even in retail states like Iowa and New Hampshire will end up reaching more people by TV than in person, the tradition is a powerful one and best not dismissed.

Real retail events are not grip-and-grins, where the candidate stands in a receiving line, spending only a few seconds with each voter. Real retail demands time, and Biden is spending the time.

He walks up and down between the tables. His long white hair is combed straight back. He is wearing a light blue shirt and dark blue tie, a navy blue blazer and gray slacks that break exquisitely over his tasseled black loafers.

Tasseled black loafers? Well, you can take the boy out of Delaware, but …

Actually, even though Biden is the only man in the room wearing a tie, let alone tasseled loafers, it works. Iowans don't want candidates showing up in work shirts and overalls pretending to be one of them. They just want somebody who understands them.

But why all this effort for Iowa? Why are so many candidates coming so early? Because they all fear the race for the nomination is going to be over very quickly and there will be no time to recover if they stumble and fall.

So they all have the same strategy: Win early, win often.

And it all starts here, in places like this, in church basements in Iowa.

I caught up with Biden by phone Monday and he told me a story -- it took him about 4 minutes and 45 seconds -- about how he was campaigning in Delaware as a young man and he met a guy at a gas station who was wearing a John Deere cap and was slouching on a chair around a potbelly stove.

"Why should I vote for you?" the man asked.

"Because I'm just like you," Biden replied.

The man sat up straight. "Boy, if you ain't different than me," he said, "I ain't voting for you!"

Biden and I both laughed.

"I guess I am a street politician," Biden said. "My whole career, whenever I wanted to get a sense of what people were thinking, the only way I trust it is to go out and listen to people. It sounds corny, but it is true."

I mentioned his tasseled loafers, and we both laughed again.

"Iowa is authentic, and they are looking for authenticity," he said. "I don't wear funny hats. But the major thing about Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina, is that they want to look you in the eye and poke you."

Poke you?

"What they want to do," Biden said, "is kick the tires before they buy the car."

I love Joe Biden. I hope Hillary Makes him her Secretary of State.

by Invertedgc on 02.20.2007 at 12:53 AM

I have been a fan of Biden for some years - he was always the guy who spoke his mind and sometimes did it too freely, as was evidenced by his early Obama gaffe. At least when he spoke he said intelligent things (most of the time) and kept you on your toes.

I agree that a candidate is likely to emerge from the many second tier hopefuls. It will be interesting to see how Biden carries himself during the debates. Obama is the most gifted orator, and Biden is a distant second, but I think that is where is best shot is going to come. He ought to at least be able to talk circles around Edwards and Clinton. It's going to be a fun season for politico's!

by AnyoneButHilary08 on 02.19.2007 at 10:09 PM

Maybe all the jockeying up front between the Democrat's Big 3 will cause all three heavy hitters to punch themselves out. Maybe a dark horse-like glad handing Joe Biden-can take the nomination. If he stays close, it'll at least keep the race interesting.

Will '08 Democrats Follow Murtha, Vote To Cut Troop Funds? (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, February 20, 2007

As dangerous as President Bush's record on Iraq may be to Republican presidential candidates in 2008, Democrats also are risking revival of fears that their party is weak on foreign policy.

If Democratic candidates embrace the strategy of Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) to cut off funds for U.S. troops in Iraq, they deserve to be compared to the losers of the past — George McGovern, Jimmy Carter, Walter Mondale, Michael Dukakis and Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.).

All lost presidential elections — often by landslides — mainly because voters perceived them as being unreliable in protecting the country from foreign adversaries.

This year, as in the past, the force-averse liberal base of the party is demanding ever-stronger statements and actions in opposition to the Iraq War and party leaders are obliging, with Murtha, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and presidential candidates either obliging or leading the process.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) is being massively pressured to apologize for her 2002 vote authorizing the war, as former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.) did. Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), who opposed the war from the beginning, has set a deadline for withdrawal of U.S. forces, as has Edwards. Clinton hasn't, but she says she would end the war if it's still going in 2009.

It's true that Bush's misguided and deeply unpopular policies in Iraq probably put an even greater political burden on Republicans.

The leading GOP presidential candidates, Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, all feel obligated to defend the war and Bush's current "surge."

But they also are trying to distance themselves from the tactics and strategies — largely the work of former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld — that have led the U.S. to the brink of disaster in Iraq.

This is not likely to work for the GOP candidates if Bush's surge policy fails. If the Iraq War ends the way the Vietnam War did in 1975, with a U.S. defeat, the next president is likely to be a Democrat, much as Carter won for the Democrats in 1976.

But it's worth remembering that Carter pretended to be a hawkish Democrat when running against then-incumbent President Gerald Ford — an Annapolis graduate and former nuclear submariner — and, at that, Ford almost beat him.

Democrats, to their credit, are not repeating all the errors of the Vietnam era. They do not disparage U.S. soldiers — quite the contrary, they claim to favor withdrawal as a means of protecting the troops.

Also, in the main, they profess to understand that the U.S. is involved in a long-term war on terror and favor a larger military, a better intelligence service and more forces in Afghanistan.

Still, there are reasons to doubt that, when it comes to new challenges, Democrats actually will be strong enough to protect the country and sustain the public's trust.

The Murtha proposal for de-funding the surge is cleverly drawn as a troop-protection measure, barring funds for deployment of units to Iraq that don't meet training, equipment or time-at-home standards.

But Republicans already are setting the stage to rightly characterize Murtha's plan as a denial of reinforcements for troops already in the field. And it's an attempt by Congress to micromanage a war, telling the commander in chief how to deploy his forces.

Moreover, Murtha announced his plans on an Internet program hosted by MoveOn.org, one of the most liberal elements of the Democratic coalition, evidence the McGovernite wing of the party is now in control of its foreign policy.

Will candidates Clinton, Obama, Edwards and others follow the Murtha line? Indeed, will moderate House Members like Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) and Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.)?

They'll be tempted, for sure, if polls continue to show — as last week's Fox News poll did — that a majority of voters (54 percent) oppose a funding increase for U.S. operations in Iraq.

But according to the Congressional Research Service, this would represent the first time ever that Congress has voted to cut funding during actual war operations. In the cases of Vietnam and Somalia, cuts were voted after U.S. forces had already returned home, designed to keep them from going back.

Chances are strong that the Murtha ploy won't really affect Bush's actions because the surge already is under way and can be paid for out of already appropriated funds.

But will the next step of Iraq doves be stronger measures to deny funds for future operations, perhaps imposing a deadline for U.S. involvement? And will the '08 candidates be herded into this posture, too?

There's a precedent for Democrats heading like lemmings off a left-wing cliff. It was in the 1984 campaign, when Democrats vied with each other to claim first authorship of the "nuclear freeze" idea, which would have left the Soviet Union with a monopoly of intermediate-range missiles pointed at Europe.

The freeze idea was utterly discredited when then-President Ronald Reagan succeeded in winning a Soviet stand-down by getting Germany to agree to deploy U.S. Pershing missiles on its soil.

It's unfortunately clear that the Democratic Party lacks any candidate representing the foreign-policy toughness of Presidents Franklin Roosevelt, Harry Truman, John Kennedy or Lyndon Johnson. But do its candidates want to follow in the footsteps of Carter and Kerry?

States Race To Set Earlier Primaries (CSM)

By Daniel B. Wood

The Christian Science Monitor, February 20, 2007

LOS ANGELES

California is poised to play the first card in what experts say will be a national game of "reschedule your state's primary." The stakes: which state can gain significant influence over the presidential nominating process.

California's bid to move its 2008 primary from June to Feb. 5 – already approved by the state Senate and expected to clear the Assembly this week – is intended to force presidential candidates to stump in the Golden State, addressing issues dear to voters here before the contest is all but decided by others. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) has said he will sign the bill.

But already, nine states have tentatively scheduled primaries or caucuses for Feb. 5, and more may pile on as states jockey to meet notification deadlines: May for Democrats, September for Republicans. Among the delegate-rich states considering that date: Illinois, New Jersey, and Texas. Florida has a bill pending that would leapfrog them by moving its primary to Jan. 29.

The irony in all the jockeying is that, with so much change afoot, no state may achieve its aim, analysts say. The probable outcome of a front-loaded primary schedule is an early winnowing of the candidate field, with Feb. 5 becoming a do-or-die date, and a clipped-back period of time in which voters can assess presidential hopefuls at town halls and in their living rooms.

"California and other states that are trying to play calendar games are apt to find out that their plans backfire," says Larry Sabato, a political scientist at the University of Virginia. "We are courting disaster."

Feb. 5 could become a de facto national primary, political analysts say, because candidates who underperform in that vote would have trouble attracting donations that allow them to continue campaigning. And the party nominations could easily be sewn up in the three weeks between the Iowa caucuses on Jan. 14 and the Feb. 5 sweepstakes – giving the public insufficient time to watch and test the candidates, they say.

"With that many states front-loading their primary dates, the presidential campaign may get closure sooner, but people in each party may end up regretting the choice," says Jack Pitney, a political scientist at Claremont McKenna College in California. He cites the meteoric rise in 2004 of Howard Dean, the early Democratic front-runner, who later flamed out when voters watched him more closely over months of campaigning.

"They may find out things about the anointed nominees that they don't like, but find them out too late," says Dr. Pitney.

If states such as Florida, Michigan, and Illinois follow California's lead, he and others say, presidential nominations for both parties could be sewn up 10 months before the general election in November.

"We are about to have the most extended presidential campaign in American history, and that is the last thing the public wants," says Mr. Sabato.

These assessments do not cancel out the rationale for California and other states that want more clout in who picks presidential nominees, analysts say.

"A Feb. 5 primary for California means California issues are finally going to be addressed by the candidates, rather than just farm or New England issues," says Robert Stern, president of the Center for Governmental Studies. "It means California voters – not just California donors like big Hollywood celebrities – [would] have a bigger say in the presidential primary."

If candidates are forced to consider California voters, concerns such as offshore oil drilling, illegal immigration, national security, and the environment might move up the issue agenda of candidates, say Mr. Stern and others.

Campaign styles and strategies may also be affected if more states move their primaries to Feb. 5. Campaigns in the early-voting states of Iowa, New Hampshire, and South Carolina have been characterized by up-close-and-personal meetings in coffee shops, meeting halls, and restaurants. If states with big populations and large terrain – like California – are added to the early-primary mix, candidates will no doubt adjust their money-raising and money-spending strategies.

"You won't see Hillary [Rodham] Clinton coming out to shake hands with voters in a small restaurant in L.A," says Stern. "The state is simply too big. She'll need to spend her money more on television ads, radio, organizing staffs and logistics."

A candidate would also need more money earlier, to even consider a presidential race. That would represent a big change, some say. The day would be over when a candidate could plan to build a viable candidacy by attracting enough voters in a small state, and hope momentum and funds snowball from there.

The only way to end the primary chaos is to pass a constitutional amendment that would create a more uniform primary voting structure, says Sabato. One idea, he says, is to create four regional primaries – one each in April, May, June, and July, with national party conventions in August. The order of the regional primary votes would change with each presidential election cycle, decided by lottery Jan. 1.

"This would kill the permanent campaign because no [candidate] would know where to start and would eliminate the slingshot effect of winning just a couple of early primaries and vaulting to national prominence," says Sabato. "It makes so much sense it will never happen."

Two Democrats Refuse Party Cash (POL)

By Josh Kraushaar

The Politico, February 20, 2007

Despite Democratic successes in last November's midterm, two rookie Democratic congresswomen already are rejecting financial assistance from their leadership, a striking move aimed at cultivating an independent image for voters back home.

Reps. Nancy Boyda of Kansas and Carol Shea-Porter of New Hampshire have declined to participate in the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee's "Frontline" program, which helps vulnerable members raise money early and receive logistical support for their re-election bids.

Twenty-nine members, including 24 freshmen, qualified for the program in mid-February. DCCC officials were not immediately available for comment. The DCCC official blog noted, however, that the campaign committee was not "writing off" Boyda and Shea-Porter and left open the possibility of helping both if they were subjected to GOP attacks.

Boyda would have been a prime candidate for assistance. She represents a solidly Republican district where President Bush received 59 percent of the vote against Sen. John F. Kerry, D-Mass., in the 2004 presidential election.

Boyda spokeswoman Shanan Guinn said the congresswoman wants to position herself as an independent heading into 2008.

"She's making her own decisions based on what people want her to focus on," Guinn said. "She ran an independent campaign in 2006, and her constituents want to see her run an independent campaign again."

When Boyda ran against Rep. Jim Ryun in 2004, she embraced the trappings of a modern-day campaign. She raised nearly as much money as Ryun, hired big-name Democratic consultants and spent plentifully on television ads.

Chastened by a 15-point defeat, Boyda in 2006 scaled back her operations and ran what one Democratic operative called a "Kansas-centric campaign." Her husband, Steve, served as her campaign manager. Instead of running expensive ads on television, she bought informational inserts in the local newspaper. She didn't receive support from the DCCC until the final weeks of her campaign.

While Boyda's ability to prevail against long odds worked in 2006, it will be difficult for her to run an under-the-radar campaign for a second time. Republicans have identified her as one of their top targets in 2008. And she's even drawn fire from Democrats after commenting she was planning to vote for President Bush's troop increase because her district voted for the president twice. (Instead, on Friday she voted for the Democratic resolution opposing the president's troop increase.)

Ryun is now seeking a rematch. He may face a primary challenge from state Treasurer Lynn Jenkins, who has been elected twice in landslides.

Shea-Porter's decision to bypass the DCCC program is less surprising. In 2006 the committee backed her primary opponent, Jim Craig, and didn't provide any money for her upset victory over Republican Rep. Jeb Bradley.

Shea-Porter shunned consultants throughout the whole bare-bones campaign, relying on a group of dedicated party activists. Her home's oven served as a repository for campaign literature. Her 82-year-old mother was the star of one of her campaign's two commercials. She spent $253,000 on her successful bid -- the lowest amount among winning challengers.

"I appreciated the offer," Shea-Porter said of the DCCC incumbent retention program. "I decided to run the campaign the way that I did before -- retail politics.

"I am happy to follow a grassroots campaign," she said. "But I am asking the Republican opponent to carry the same kind of campaign."

Shea-Porter added that she reserves the right to change her mind if her Republican opponent engages in negative campaigning.

She ended the year with about $68,000 in the bank, and has raised $7,380 since the election.

State Democratic Chairman Kathy Sullivan said Shea-Porter will soon be holding small fundraisers in New Hampshire and understands she will have to raise more money than in 2006. But Sullivan thinks her strategy to bypass the DCCC will benefit her politically in New Hampshire, where retail, grassroots politics rules.

"Will she drive the DCCC a little bit crazy because she's not the traditional D.C. candidate? Sure," Sullivan said. "But people like that here in New Hampshire."

Shea-Porter's low-budget, quirky campaign style will make her an inviting GOP target for 2008. With presidential and Senate races driving up turnout, Republicans believe that they'll be in better position to challenge her. Bradley has already declared he's running again in 2008, though he may face a primary challenge from the right.

But if dismay over the Iraq war remains a central issue, Shea-Porter could again be propelled by what proved to be a winning issue last year.

"She knows her district, she knows how she won," said Sullivan. "People like the fact she's independent. She likes telling the party bosses that they can't tell her what to do."

For Republican strategists, the decisions by Shea-Porter and Boyda to reject party help raise their political vulnerabilities in 2008.

"This confirms what we already know -- that these are going to be top pickup opportunities for us," said Julie Shutley, spokeswoman for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Slamming Tax Cuts Seen As A Risky Move (WT)

By Donald Lambro, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 19, 2007

Virtually all the Democratic presidential contenders have denounced President Bush's tax cuts and called for raising the rates on wealthier Americans, but Republican strategists say their plan will backfire in the 2008 election.

Bashing the Bush tax cuts as "tax cuts for the wealthy" has become the favorite Democratic mantra ever since he enacted his across-the-board tax-reduction plan in 2001 -- which included increased tax credits for families with children and lower tax rates for every income bracket.

Every Democrat seeking the presidential nomination who was in Congress at the time voted against the Bush tax cuts and has called for repealing some of the income-tax rate reductions if they are elected president. Most say their tax increases would hit only the very wealthiest Americans earning more than $200,000 a year.

Republican tax-cut advocates say: "Don't believe it."

If the Democrats campaign on raising taxes just for people at the top tax rate, "it will backfire on them for two reasons," said economic strategist Cesar Conda, a former chief domestic policy adviser to Vice President Dick Cheney.

"Number one: A lot of small businesses, small proprietorships, pay the top individual tax rate, so they will be raising taxes on small businesses and entrepreneurs. Number two: A lot of the polls I've seen suggest that the American people don't believe that the Democratic tax increases will stop at just the rich, that eventually it will hit the middle class," Mr. Conda said.

"The Democrats are falling into the trap of becoming the tax-and-spend party again," said Mr. Conda, now a private consultant and economic adviser to former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a 2008 Republican presidential candidate.

Some Democrats are also cautioning their party's presidential aspirants to be careful how they present their tax proposals to the voters next year.

"Democrats have to define themselves as proponents in the battle for the middle class, so that any tax increases they espouse, like rolling back part of the Bush tax cuts for the wealthy, should be used primarily for middle class tax cuts," said James Kessler, issues director for the Third Way, a centrist Democratic advocacy group.

"Each party comes into the political races with preconceptions. The preconceptions about the Democrats is that they are more likely to raise taxes than the Republicans, so you do have to be careful. Democrats need to have a series of middle class tax cuts that are real," Mr. Kessler said.

But with few exceptions, the Democratic contenders have railed against all of the Bush tax cuts without making distinctions in its provisions, blaming the tax cuts for everything from the budget deficits to fighting the war on terrorism.

"If we hadn't passed the big tax cuts last spring that undermined our fiscal responsibility and our ability to deal with this new threat of terrorism, we wouldn't be in the fix we're in today," Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York said in the fall of 2001 after the September 11 attacks.

Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, also a tax-cut critic, wrote in his best-selling book "The Audacity of Hope" that Mr. Bush's tax cuts worsened perceived wage stagnation and income inequality. Although he was not in the Senate when the tax cuts were passed, he voted last year against extending the capital-gains tax cut and for repealing it.

More recently, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina proposed increasing the tax rate for the top 35 percent in order to raise up to $120 billion to pay for his universal health care plan.

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson may be the only exception among the Democratic candidates. In his first term as governor, Mr. Richardson reduced income-tax rates across the spectrum, as Mr. Bush did, cutting the state's top income-tax rate from 8.2 percent to 4.9 percent over five years.

Matching Free Trade With Taxes (WP)

The last time a Democrat controlled the White House, he defended globalization. He understood that trade creates losers, and he sought to assist them with progressive tax and spending policies. But today's leading Democrats are flirting with the opposite approach. They are forthright in their complaints about trade. But, with the notable exception of John Edwards, they are surprisingly reluctant to propose tax hikes.

You can see why Democratic sentiment has shifted. Globalization is no longer what it was when Bill Clinton shepherded the North American Free Trade Agreement and the Uruguay Round through Congress. China's economy has quadrupled in size; India has emerged as a competitor; the sense of insecurity has spread from a handful of vulnerable industries to much of the economy. And yet if they reverse the Clinton formula, the Democrats will be doubly wrong. They will be swallowing left-wing propaganda about trade and right-wing propaganda about tax cuts.

Paradoxically, the changes that have made globalization less popular have rendered resistance to it less fruitful. Back in the 1980s, trade put pressure on big, vertically integrated industries: cars, electronics. In the new world of outsourcing and global supply chains, vertically integrated enterprises have been sliced into discreet processes; trade now puts pressure on tasks rather than on industries. Back-office administration and phone-based customer support may shift to India, and this shift may affect industries from banking to medical services. The manufacturing and assembly of components may be outsourced to Mexico or Asia, and this change may affect everything from toys to telephones.

So trade now threatens workers in more industries. Even if it still causes less dislocation than technological change, we shouldn't be surprised that anti-globalization sentiment has sharpened. But the advent of competition in tasks also renders protectionist remedies less sensible than ever.

In the era of vertically integrated industries, there was a superficial plausibility in the economic-nationalist case for trade barriers. Big American corporations that did nearly all of their production at home were up against Japanese and German rivals that were equally rooted in their own countries: "If they win, we lose" was an understandable attitude. But now this picture has been scrambled. America Inc. had become Global Inc.: It's hard to erect trade barriers without disrupting corporate America's supply chains. The world's fastest-rising trader illustrates the point. More than half of Chinese exports are made by subsidiaries of foreign companies.

Advocates of trade barriers want to protect workers as well as corporations, but this rationale is also fraying. The old case for tariffs was based on the fact that trade-affected workers were often geographically clustered: If cheap Asian steel hammered a Midwestern steel town, protectionists argued that steelworkers could not be expected to adapt and find new jobs because steel was the sole prop of their communities. But the new competition in tasks rather than industries renders the tragedy of the company town increasingly rare. If a data-entry clerk loses her job in Omaha, she can probably find other work without having to move.

So trade protectionism, which always damaged economic growth, has now lost the few arguments that supported it. Globalization has caused understandable anxieties, but tariffs are a useless therapy. The alternative of helping globalization's losers with tax-financed spending programs is more promising by far. For, contrary to what conservatives routinely assert, tax-and-spend programs need not be bad for the economy.

Consider the work of Peter Lindert of the University of California at Davis. In a magisterial work published three years ago, Lindert analyzed tax-financed transfers across rich economies and found no correlation with the rate of growth or with gross domestic product per person. This, Lindert continued, should not be surprising. What matters for growth is less the quantity of tax and spending programs than their quality.

Lindert is no party-line liberal. He argues that high taxes in Europe don't damage growth because they hit consumption and labor rather than savings and capital: This is an uncomfortable point for those who want the tax system to be progressive. But Lindert also argues that high taxes are compatible with growth if the revenue is spent well. Investments in education and public infrastructure boost a country's growth rate. Programs that break the link between employment and health insurance enhance the flexibility of workers. Subsidized child care keeps women in the workforce, encouraging employers to invest in training them.

None of this suggests that high taxes are risk-free, especially if they finance programs with no growth payoff -- such as entitlements for the elderly. But knee-jerk opposition to raising taxes is misguided. The government could and should spend more on making health care portable and retraining displaced workers. That is a much better bet than protectionism.

In Iowa, The Living Room Has Fallen Out Of Favor (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

DUBUQUE, Iowa, Feb. 18 — Iowa, with its first-in-the-nation presidential caucuses, has been celebrated for 30 years for its intimate campaigns where future presidents would perch on living room couches or sit at kitchen tables and take questions from 20 or 30 people late into the night.

But it was standing room only on Sunday afternoon at the Grand River Center here, where hundreds of people showed up for a forum with John Edwards, a Democratic candidate for president. When Mr. Edwards asked for questions, dozens of hands shot up. Many were still up when he called an end to the meeting.

Mr. Edwards's experience has been shared by most of the major candidates on recent visits to Iowa, almost a year before the caucuses. It is evidence of what appears to be the demise of the living room campaign, signaling a potentially profound change in the way presidential campaigns are conducted here, and to a lesser extent in New Hampshire.

A chapter in American political history that began in 1976 when Jimmy Carter rose from obscurity by working the living rooms and kitchens of Iowa may be drawing to a end. It is, at least for this election cycle, the victim of an era of celebrity candidates tracked by busloads of reporters, and of intense interest in the 2008 race among voters, who are turning out in numbers that would fill many, many living rooms.

"Perhaps it's time to write the obit to the living room," David Yepsen, the state's premier political columnist, wrote in The Des Moines Register after Senator Barack Obama drew thousands of people to a gym in Ames. "They are now relics of past campaigns, as ancient as the torchlight parade. Rock-star candidates need room for their fans and the gawkers."

Chuck Larson, a former chairman of the Iowa Republican Party and a senior adviser to the campaign of Senator John McCain, said that when Mr. McCain planned his campaign stops here for this weekend, he did not even try to set up the kind of small gatherings that were once Iowa's signature political events. "For any candidate of significance, I think those days are in all honesty gone," Mr. Larson said Sunday.

To a certain extent — and with all due respect to veteran chroniclers of the American political system given to nostalgia and perhaps idealized memories of past Iowa journeys — this may not be an entirely bad thing.

The events for Mr. Obama, the Democratic senator from Illinois, were bustling with young faces that were not familiar to many Iowa political activists. The crowds turning out for the candidates suggest that this extraordinarily competitive and wide-open campaign, taking place amid a nationwide debate on the war in Iraq and on the heels of the Democrats' recapturing of Congress, has engaged Americans in a way they have not been engaged in a long time. While the sites may be bigger and less intimate, candidates like Mr. Edwards and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton are still inviting question after question.

Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton have also at least tried to have some smaller gatherings, but there is no getting around the fact that living rooms have given way to hotel ballrooms, coliseums and gymnasiums.

Some Iowans have noticed the change. They wonder if, or perhaps hope, this is a passing phase.

Theresa Grutz, a special education teacher from Dubuque, lamented the change as she took her place at Mr. Edwards's forum here. "You get to ask questions," she said of the more intimate gatherings. "You keep asking them and you keep asking them until you get an answer, and not a sound bite."

Mr. Larson argued that there were some advantages to the new style. Mr. McCain saw 1,200 potential caucusgoers in three events on Saturday, compared with perhaps 100 he could have met in private homes. Mr. Larson said smaller meetings were less crucial because of the advent of Internet video streaming.

On the other hand, candidates have lost the laboratories that gave them a chance to learn about issues and formulate responses to tough questions, and make beginner mistakes, out of sight of rival campaigns and reporters.

Jennifer O'Malley, the Iowa director of Mr. Edwards's campaign, said the more personal campaigning, with candidates spending time with voters, was critical for caucuses, in which people need to be particularly motivated to turn out for two hours on a Monday night.

"A conversation with voters is much more important than a television ad," she said.

Some campaign officials said they expected voters' attendance to die down and news media interest to fade as the candidates continued an exhausting trudge across the state, before exploding again in the final weeks, as has historically been the case. Of course, that might just mean that a crowd of 800 would drop to 400.

Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama have gamely tried to replicate the living room experience, but it has not worked particularly well.

A Clinton event in Cedar Rapids was, unusually though understandably, invitation-only. Even so, the house became so crowded that people had to peer around corners and over shoulders to catch a glimpse of Mrs. Clinton. To deal with the crush of national reporters — a big part of the problem — her campaign assigned one to act as pool correspondent and share the information; inevitably, however, others sneaked in.

Last week, Mr. Obama's campaign aides scheduled one session in the home of Tom and Patti Friend of Iowa Falls. But after the Friends put a notice of the event in the newspaper, 200 people showed up, spilling out of the living room. When Mr. Obama walked through the door, the booming applause made it clear that the gathering was not so intimate after all; he had to climb up the stairs to find a speck of floor to speak from.

One day after Mr. Obama appeared there, he bounded onto the stage at the Field House at the University of New Hampshire in Durham. Christine Sohl, who arrived early to get a seat about 20 rows back, recalled meeting a little-known governor named Bill Clinton in a group of no more than 20 people.

Four campaigns later, she strained to see Mr. Obama. "This is as close as we'll get," she said.

Campaigns Find New Homes In Iowa (USAT)

By Judy Keen, Usa Today

USA Today, February 19, 2007

Downtown Des Moines rents getting too pricey

Development in downtown Des Moines is forcing some presidential campaigns to locate their offices in the suburbs, ending an era when cheap, temporary headquarters were clustered in the city center.

For years, it's been easy to walk between many candidates' offices, downtown hotels for news conferences and favorite eateries such as 801 Steak & Chop House, frequented by reporters and political operatives with expense accounts.

Hanging out downtown was part of the charm of the presidential primary season, when everyone working the campaigns camped out in Des Moines for weeks. Now, many campaign headquarters are 7 or 8 miles away.

"Candidates want inexpensive space. They're going to have to move out of town to get that right now," says Dennis Connolly, a commercial real estate agent in Des Moines since 1977. "There's a lot of tearing down and putting up new structures downtown."

Iowa hosts the nation's first presidential voting in its caucuses, and Des Moines is the political and geographic center of the state.

Parts of "candidate row" on Locust Street have been replaced by a new park, Western Gateway, and new buildings around it. Other downtown buildings were demolished or converted to apartments and condos.

In 2003, the headquarters of Democratic Sen. John Kerry and Vermont Gov. Howard Dean were a block apart on Locust. The building Kerry's campaign occupied now displays antique cars. Dean's former headquarters is in a building about to be renovated.

Democratic Sen. John Edwards' office was four blocks away on Grand Avenue. That space, a former auto dealership, is vacant. Edwards' office this year is east of downtown.

"There were wonderful opportunities four years ago for campaigns with vacant buildings downtown that landlords couldn't rent," says Susan Ramsey, spokeswoman for the Greater Des Moines Partnership, which helps businesses locate or expand. "Those opportunities don't exist any longer."

Instead, campaign offices are scattered elsewhere:

•The national headquarters for Tom Vilsack, a former Iowa governor seeking the Democratic nomination, is on the city's western edge. "We're closer to the airport, closer to the freeway and there's plenty of growth space," spokesman Josh Earnest says.

•Sen. John McCain's campaign didn't even consider locating downtown, says Dave Roederer, state chairman of the Arizona Republican's campaign. The suburban Urbandale office is cheaper, "especially when you factor in the parking," he says.

•Former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee's staff will soon move to Urbandale, about 8 miles from downtown.

"People don't want to drive all the way downtown at night to volunteer," says Eric Woolson, a spokesman for the Republican's Iowa campaign.

•The headquarters of former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney's Republican campaign also will be in Urbandale.

"It just makes a lot more sense in terms of finding volunteers" who live there and in nearby West Des Moines and Clive, says Tim Albrecht, a Romney spokesman. "At the end of the day, it's all about location."

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

Following the example of Eliot Spitzer, state attorneys general have had a field day using their power to accuse all and sundry of wrong-doing. So it's only fair that a little sun is now beginning to shine on the cozy business relationships between these AGs and their trial lawyer buddies.

The sight won't be pretty, judging from a recent Associated Press report that former California AG Bill Lockyer's office concealed tens of millions of dollars in contracts with lobbyists and legal firms. California has an open-records law so the public can see how officials spend their money. Yet Mr. Lockyer's office incorrectly labeled dozens of contracts "confidential" and thus kept them out of public sight.

Now state treasurer, Mr. Lockyer says this was just a simple mistake. But the records sure are revealing. The law firm of Cotkin, Collins and Ginsberg received a $2 million contract to work on an insurance case. That same firm has donated to Mr. Lockyer's political committees. Two other no-bid contracts, worth as much as $489,000, went to the Ferguson Group, a Washington lobbying outfit. Ferguson's president was the legislative director for former California Congressman Vic Fazio, a Lockyer pal.

Going back to 2003, Mr. Lockyer's office labeled as "confidential" more than 1,700 contracts valued at more than $100 million. The AP asked California's Department of Justice -- now run by Attorney General Jerry Brown -- to inspect a sample of 131 contracts. That review found that only 12 deserved to be confidential. One test of Mr. Brown's desire for honest government will be whether he now allows a review of all contracts.

This episode also has Californians calling for legislation to require its AG both to publicly disclose contracts and subject them to competitive bidding. A movement -- led by the American Legislative Exchange Council and the Institute for Legal Reform -- is also spreading for model legislation known as the "Private Attorney Retention Sunshine Act." So far, seven states have adopted some variant of legislation, and West Virginia and Mississippi are debating whether to follow suit.

Mississippi is a fitting place for this fight, as it may well be the birthplace of AG-tort bar collusion. In the 1990s, then-Attorney General Mike Moore hired several tort lawyer friends to take the lead in his mammoth tobacco suit. Trial lawyer Dickie Scruggs later acknowledged making hundreds of millions of dollars in contingency fees; not bad for government work.

Current AG Jim Hood struck an equally suspicious deal as part of his $100 million settlement in 2005 with MCI/WorldCom over back taxes. Mr. Hood hired attorney Joey Langston as outside counsel to represent Mississippi in negotiations with MCI. Mr. Langston's firm shared half of $14 million in legal fees as a result of the settlement. You won't be shocked to learn Mr. Langston was Mr. Hood's largest individual campaign contributor.

As a reaction to this mutual back-scratching, the Mississippi senate earlier this month passed a sunshine act to require the AG to solicit proposals from at least three law firms for contracts larger than $1 million; it would also set up a review board to inspect proposals. Mr. Hood went bananas, claiming it was a "politically motivated" bill designed to "prevent the state from catching" corporations that defraud consumers. He's rallying Democrats to oppose the bill. The office of West Virginia AG Darrell McGraw has been similarly dismissive of legislators' desire to spotlight his trial-bar contracts.

You have to smile at their nerve. These are the same AGs who deplore the mere appearance of a "conflict of interest" in business, and who justify their lawsuits as protecting state consumers. Yet they don't seem to think it's a conflict if their offices sign contracts with law firms that return a cut of their profits back to the AGs as campaign contributions.

Even worse, these contracts often include contingency fee deals that guarantee outside lawyers a slice of any settlement. This means the AGs can initiate legal proceedings against an industry with little risk to the state, while the outside attorneys have every incentive to push for the highest dollar settlement. Doing justice takes a backseat to the big-dollar payout. This AG-tort bar alliance confronts companies with a double whammy that makes it far more risky to fight a lawsuit. Even companies that are unfairly sued are inclined to settle, and the AGs can thus impose new rules and regulations via lawsuit rather than having to pass legislation.

State attorney generals have become an unchecked source of government abuse in recent years, combining political ambition with the awesome power to prosecute. They need to be reined in, and a good place to start is by exposing their sweetheart contracts with their trial lawyer friends and campaign contributors.

New York's Bully Governor (NYT)

Almost everybody who voted for Gov. Eliot Spitzer last year realized that he would not tread lightly. In fact, Governor Spitzer's pugilistic tendency was probably a main reason for his landslide victory. It is also why 60 percent of New Yorkers recently agreed with Mr. Spitzer that he is just the "steamroller" that is needed for one of the worst legislatures in the country.

Nevertheless, those lawmakers seemed stunned when Mr. Spitzer came out slugging after they exhibited some of their lesser instincts. When the governor began openly criticizing individual legislators in their home districts, the Albany crowd went into culture shock. They talked about how Mr. Spitzer was not playing by the rules. They talked about how he was upsetting the political etiquette. Joseph Bruno, the Senate leader, whined to reporters last week that the governor was a "bully." Maybe so. But a bully is just what New York needs right now — a governor strong, smart and articulate enough to break up the Albany cartel.

The downturn in Mr. Spitzer's relations with the legislative establishment came earlier this month when legislators, particularly Mr. Spitzer's fellow Democrats in the Assembly, reneged on a deal to pick a new state comptroller. Instead of choosing one of three finalists picked by former comptrollers, they decided on Assemblyman Thomas DiNapoli, who is far less qualified. Legislators who celebrated this big, in-your-face victory over the governor should by now be worrying about their jobs.

Minutes after that vote, the governor went on the attack. As he traveled around the state to promote his budget, he added criticism for two fellow Democrats who had voted for Mr. DiNapoli — Assemblymen George Latimer of Westchester and William Magnarelli of Syracuse. That sent a loud signal that individual lawmakers can no longer hide behind their leaders and coast to re-election.

Mr. Spitzer and his staff are also taking other detours around the ultrapowerful legislative leaders — Mr. Bruno and Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver. If Mr. Spitzer can break these two leaders' stranglehold on public policy, more power to him.

Other governors are undoubtedly watching to see if Mr. Spitzer's high-intensity strategy will work over the long term. Both California's Arnold Schwarzenegger and New Jersey's Jon Corzine have been forced to make peace with wayward legislatures to get anything done. Mr. Spitzer will also have to negotiate with lawmakers to get a budget, begin reforms and pass the progressive laws the state has needed for some time. But unlike other governors who spend too much time wooing and not enough time challenging, Mr. Spitzer can now negotiate his reform agenda from a position of strength.

Blair Backs Tougher Gun Laws For Youths (WP)

By Mary Jordan, Washington Post Foreign Service

LONDON, Feb. 18 -- Prime Minister Tony Blair announced Sunday that he wanted to lower to 17 the age at which a mandatory five-year sentence could be imposed for illegally possessing a gun. The announcement followed the shooting deaths of three teenagers.

Britain has strict gun laws, and even most of its police officers do not carry guns. But a recent spurt in shootings and youth gang violence has alarmed many Britons and led to armed police patrols in areas of south London.

Currently, defendants older than 21 must serve a minimum five-year prison sentence if convicted of illegally possessing a firearm. But Blair, in an interview with the BBC, said, "We've got to lower that age . . . down to the age of 17."

Speaking ahead of an emergency summit on gun crime this week, Blair said his government is seeking to overhaul violent crime laws, including adding penalties for gang membership and measures to protect people who testify against gangs.

Police said gun crime fell last year, but 2007 has started with several shooting deaths.

In the past two weeks, James Smartt-Ford, 16, was gunned down at a south London ice rink and Michael Dosunmu, 15, was shot and killed by a gunman in his bedroom. Eight days later, Billy Cox, 15, was shot dead at his home, also in south London. Another man was shot and killed Saturday in London, and three people were injured in two weekend shootings in Manchester, in northwest England.

The killings, particularly those involving young people, have underscored the menacing culture of youth gangs, armed with knives, hammers and, increasingly, guns.

Although gun crime is still relatively uncommon here -- there were 50 firearm-related killings last year in England and Wales -- many Britons are concerned that young people see them as a cool accessory.

"We have got to analyze what is going wrong here," Blair said. "Is it a general state of British society, British young people? And I think it isn't. It is about a specific problem within a specific criminal culture to do with guns and gangs."

Some say the shootings are a symptom of troubled British youths and families.

"The issue here is the circumstances they grow up in, the broken families -- and that's not confined to any one sector of society -- and the massively rife drug culture," David Davis, a leading member of the opposition Conservative Party, said Sunday. "The problems have been growing for a decade."

Will Deal Give N. Korea Millions In Cash? (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball And Richard Wolffe

Newsweek, February 19, 2007

Hard-liners already loathe the new deal in which Kim Jong Il's regime has agreed to halt activity at its main nuclear plant in return for emergency oil supplies. John Bolton, who recently departed as U.S. envoy to the United Nations, told NEWSWEEK: "We violated the principle that we don't reward bad behavior." Promises to ease North Korea's economic squeeze are among key elements of the deal (struck by the United States and other participants in the Six-Party diplomatic talks). Among the provisions of the agreement are promises by the United States to begin direct talks with North Korea about "moving toward full diplomatic relations," and that Washington will take steps to remove Pyongyang from its official list of state sponsors of terrorism. In return, Pyongyang agreed to "shut down and seal" its main nuke reactor at Yongbyon.

But Pyongyang may also get access to controversial bank accounts. Meeting in Beijing three weeks ago, North Korean and U.S. Treasury officials held detailed talks about 52 bank accounts in Macau's Banco Delta Asia that the Macau government froze after Washington in 2005 accused the bank of money laundering. The 52 accounts, containing about $24 million, were frozen on suspicion that North Korea was using them for illicit purposes. Washington is still threatening to issue an order curbing U.S. banks' dealing with Banco Delta Asia, which has now been taken over by the government of Macau. But U.S. officials, who asked for anonymity due to the sensitivity of the subject, indicated that following further discussions with Washington, it is possible Macau authorities may lift restrictions on some of the accounts, enabling Pyongyang to regain some of its cash.

Administration hard-liners appear to have been unable to thwart diplomacy. Former officials close to Vice President Dick Cheney, who asked not to be identified characterizing his views, suggest he does not like the deal but believes there are enough get-out clauses to ensure either that Pyongyang complies or the whole bargain collapses. Cheney had long influenced North Korea policy through powerful bureaucratic allies who battled what they viewed as State Department appeasers. But Bolton, a leading hawk on North Korea, left the administration when Congress refused to confirm him as permanent U.N. ambassador. Robert Joseph, another key hard-liner, is soon to leave his job as State Department under secretary for arms control. Cheney himself may be the last hard-liner. But White House aides, along with the veep's allies (anonymous when discussing the men's relationship), acknowledge that Bush relies far less on Cheney's judgment now than he did earlier in his presidency.

Hold The Applause (USNEWS)

By Thomas Omestad

U.S. News and World Report, February 19, 2007

Last week's nuclear deal with North Korea, said a smiling Condoleezza Rice, took "patient, creative, and tough diplomacy." All true, but the secretary of state's upbeat summary masked an array of obstacles that had to be overcome merely to start down the long road toward stripping North Korea of any nuclear weapons and facilities. The obstacles included not only the North's legendary obstinance but also bitter disputes within the Bush administration. President Bush now appears to have sided with those who favor engaging Pyongyang over those who want to squeeze it in hopes of hastening the "evil" regime's collapse. "Rice was convinced, and that convinced the president," said Michael Green, Bush's former top Asia hand at the National Security Council.

And yet for all the relief by fatigued negotiators from the United States and five other countries, the hardest tasks have been left for the future. In its first phase, the accord will not eliminate any of North Korea's nuclear weapons. Experts estimate the North now has between four and 13 bombs' worth of plutonium.

Administration officials have insisted they would not reward the North's nuclear "bad behavior." But that, hard-line critics complain, is just what the deal does. Paradoxically, their assertion that North Korea had bested the United States is shared by some deal backers. Their complaint: The years of delay allowed Pyongyang to multiply its plutonium stockpile since the crisis erupted in October 2002. Says a former U.S. official, "We could have done this four years ago and gotten a better deal."

The "ABC" policy. The new accord brought immediate comparisons with the Clinton administration's 1994 bilateral pact that until 2002 delivered fuel aid, among other benefits, for a reactor freeze. The Clinton approach was the foil against which hawks rallied, dubbing the Bush policy "ABC"-Anything but Clinton. The idea was to do nothing to abet the survival of Kim Jong Il's repressive regime. Last week, Rice argued that the new pact should be more durable because it is multilateral, backed up by power players like Russia, South Korea, Japan, and, especially, China. U.S. News has learned that China, host of the talks, pushed back on Pyongyang for nearly scuttling the accord by demanding even more energy aid.

The agreement builds on the September 2005 joint principles for denuclearizing the North in exchange for security guarantees and economic and political benefits. Pyongyang is now obligated to halt and seal its Yongbyon reactor within 60 days, verified by U.N. inspectors. It will receive initial aid of 50,000 tons of heavy fuel oil. As it disables nuclear facilities in a second phase, it gets 950,000 tons of fuel oil-all told worth $250 million to $300 million.

Key move. U.S. officials also will try to rapidly resolve a dispute with North Korea over money-laundering sanctions that nearly derailed progress in the nuclear talks. Five working groups will meet on security, political, and economic issues. One will focus on normalizing U.S.-North Korea ties. Washington agreed to "begin the process" of removing the North from the U.S. terrorism list and from countries sanctioned under the Trading with the Enemy Act. That could be key for Pyongyang. "They want a normal, long-term relationship with the United States," says Stanford University scholar John Lewis, who has visited North Korea 15 times.

Bush, Howard Discuss North Korea, Wars In Iraq And Afghanistan (AFP)

AFP, February 20, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0133715

WASHINGTON - US President George W. Bush spoke with Australian Prime Minister John Howard about the North Korea nuclear deal and the military campaigns in Iraq and Afghanistan, the White House said.

Bush spoke to Howard by telephone as US Vice President Dick Cheney headed to Japan and Australia to discuss their roles in Iraq and Afghanistan and common challenges like China's rise and North Korea's nuclear program.

The two leaders spoke a week after a breakthrough nuclear deal was reached at talks in Beijing between the United States, the two Koreas, China, Japan and Russia.

Bush and Howard "discussed the recent agreement at the Six Party talks," White House National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe said in a statement.

Under the deal, the Stalinist regime has 60 days to shut down its main Yongbyon nuclear reactor and allow United Nations nuclear inspectors back into the country.

The energy-starved regime would in turn receive a first tranche of 50,000 tonnes of fuel oil -- part of an eventual one million tonnes and additional diplomatic, security and other guarantees if it permanently disables its key nuclear facilities.

Bush and Howard also discussed the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Australia contributes troops to both efforts.

"The president thanked the prime minister for Australia's continuing support in Iraq and Afghanistan," Johndroe said.

Bush and Howard also discussed "the detainee issue and shared expectations of a fair and orderly process," he said without elaborating.

The Australian government has been pressing Washington to try as soon as possible Australian terror suspect David Hicks, who has been held at the US military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba for more than five years.

Hicks, 31, was captured in Afghanistan in late 2001 where he was alleged to have been fighting with Taliban forces against US troops.

Cheney's Influence Lessens In Second Term (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

Mistrustful of North Korea and its willingness to keep promises, Vice President Cheney worked hard in President Bush's first term to prevent talks aimed at halting that country's push to develop a nuclear bomb. At one point three years ago, he even bypassed the State Department to intervene in delicate negotiations over Pyongyang's nuclear activities.

But this month Cheney stayed out of the way as a top State Department negotiator wrapped up a nuclear agreement with North Korea -- a deal that many of the vice president's conservative allies consider foolhardy and that some of his own staff are said to find hard to swallow.

The contrast underscores the vice president's shifting status in Washington. There is no evidence that Cheney's close relationship with Bush has been lessened. But there is also little doubt that the causes he has championed -- a tough skepticism of negotiations with dictatorships such as North Korea and the forceful exercise of presidential authority -- are being rethought within the Bush administration, according to officials inside the government and experts outside it.

The North Korea deal is only the latest example of a new pragmatism forced on the administration by a series of court decisions, the deteriorating situation in Iraq and -- perhaps most of all -- the Democratic takeover of Congress.

The White House has made a concerted effort to be more conciliatory with Capitol Hill; to make rhetorical nods to issues such as global warming and income inequality, which drew little attention in Bush's first term; to permit court review of secret wiretapping of terrorism suspects; and to make new diplomatic initiatives in the Middle East and elsewhere.

"There's no question in the current political situation that Cheney has lost clout," said Leslie H. Gelb, former president of the Council on Foreign Relations. "He's lost clout because Bush has to prove he's not an international confrontationalist, warmonger and diplomatic bungler. If you have such a reputation, you can't function as president."

It hasn't helped Cheney that his former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby -- who had aggressively advanced the vice president's interests through a sometimes hostile bureaucracy -- has been sidelined because of his role in the Valerie Plame case. The government's perjury case against Libby will go to the jury this week after a trial that exposed the vice president's large behind-the-scenes involvement in seeking to discredit Joseph C. Wilson IV, a former ambassador who accused Cheney and other administration officials of twisting intelligence in the run-up to the Iraq war.

Some conservatives close to the administration see Libby's resignation after his indictment in late 2005 as part of the unraveling of a Cheney network, leaving a void that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, the engineer of the North Korea deal, has exploited. Others who have departed include Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld; his deputy, Paul D. Wolfowitz; and lower-level aides with long-standing ties to Cheney.

One former administration official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to talk more candidly, said Cheney's office has "disappeared" on foreign policy under Libby's replacement, David Addington, and the vice president's foreign policy adviser, John P. Hannah. "Addington and Hannah are smart people, but they are no Scooter. Scooter worked 25 hours a day and he had Addington and Hannah working for him, so it was a powerful combination," this source said. "The result is that Cheney is taking a back seat, and there is no check or balance on Condi in foreign policy. It is what Condi decides and what the president agrees to."

Figuring out how much influence Cheney has is a longtime Washington parlor game -- but the answer is ultimately unknowable, given that almost all of his advice is offered privately, and both the president and his No. 2 zealously guard the details. The two meet for a private lunch once a week, share intelligence briefings and get together with staff for policy discussions.

Only 37 percent of Americans view Cheney favorably, according to the most recent USA Today-Gallup poll, but he remains an important emissary to key constituencies, foreign and domestic. He elicited laughter last week when, speaking to the National Association of Manufacturers in the middle of a snowstorm, he quipped, "The good news is, the federal government is shut down today -- so everybody's safe." He left yesterday for a long-planned trip to Australia and Japan, where he is expected to reassure the allies about the North Korea deal.

Cheney still shows up two or three times a month at policy lunches for Senate Republicans. "I know that he is very comfortable fundamentally with the approach the Bush administration has taken to the war on terrorism, which is go after them hard, keep them on the run and empower moderates," said Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.).

But many who know Cheney believe he is out of step with the current tenor of the administration, noting that he has offered none of the concessions of error that Bush has tried out recently to regain lost credibility on Iraq.

"Dick was always very realistic," said Kenneth L. Adelman, the Reagan administration arms-control official who has known Cheney for more than three decades. "I don't really understand how month after month he gets briefings showing Iraq's getting worse and worse, and he engages in all this happy talk. Bush has become more realistic. Certainly [Defense Secretary Robert M.] Gates is more realistic, so the happy talk from the Pentagon is over. Yet Cheney is still stuck in the mold."

The negotiations for the North Korea deal showed how much things have changed in Bush's second term. Three years ago, when Cheney's influence was at its peak, U.S. negotiators had rigid instructions to demand that Pyongyang dismantle its programs before receiving benefits, and had almost no authority to speak directly to North Korean officials.

This time, in meetings with Chinese and South Korean officials in Vietnam in November, Rice raised the idea of obtaining an "early harvest" -- a freeze on North Korea's main nuclear facility -- to start the process, administration officials said. She empowered her chief negotiator, Christopher R. Hill, to work out the details during a one-on-one meeting with the North Koreans in Berlin last month.

Under the deal, North Korea would receive an initial supply of fuel oil for the freeze. Pyongyang also promised to disable the facility and take further steps toward denuclearization in return for additional economic, energy and humanitarian assistance. The accord left for future negotiations the question of what to do with North Korea's existing nuclear weapons; Pyongyang declared itself a nuclear power in October after exploding a nuclear device. Many conservatives worry that the new arrangement could relieve North Korea of pressure from the United States without any guarantee it will eventually get rid of the weapons.

Lea Anne McBride, Cheney's spokeswoman, said he supports the plan and agrees with Bush that the North Koreans "have to prove themselves by following through on the deal."

Sources who have spoken with administration officials said Cheney's staff is not happy with the agreement, and former administration officials said they have a hard time believing that Cheney does not share those sentiments. They pointed, for instance, to the agreement's language calling for new "working groups" to settle outstanding issues, something they said he has long opposed.

But some Cheney associates said they doubt he will work against the plan. "The one thing about Cheney is he has never done anything the boss didn't want him to do," said a longtime friend from previous administrations, who suggested that Cheney's acquiescence in the nuclear deal may have been a tactical concession, given the United States' eroding position in the world.

"I think he's someone who is very strategic in his thinking," said Aaron L. Friedberg, a Princeton University professor who served as an adviser to Cheney on national security from 2003 to 2005. "He's prepared to make adjustments and trade-offs as the situation warrants. . . . I suspect in a number of situations he would have preferred to push harder and take a tougher stand, but he has always been a pragmatist."

Cheney Due In Japan To Push NKorea Deal (AFP)

AFP, February 20, 2007

US Vice President Dick Cheney has headed to Asia with his first scheduled stop in Japan, a key US ally which has voiced increasing concern about the White House's approach on North Korea and Iraq.

Cheney will also travel to Australia and the US Pacific territory of Guam on a trip that comes on the heels of a breakthrough deal on North Korea and plans to deploy more than 20,000 extra US troops to insurgency-plagued Iraq.

The vice president will take pains to thank Japan and Australia for their help in Iraq and Afghanistan and may urge them to consider ways to beef up their presence in both war-torn countries, a senior US official said.

"We will talk about where there are places where we need to have more done, what other contributions we and other countries can make to the efforts of both those conflicts," the official told reporters on condition of anonymity.

In Tokyo, Cheney will aim to dispel any worries about the North Korean deal, emphasising that it is only a good "first step" towards stripping the regime of its nuclear weapons programmes, he said.

Japan has refused to fund the deal, under which North Korea would receive badly needed fuel aid, due to an emotionally charged row over Pyongyang's past abductions of Japanese citizens.

"I think it's reasonable to expect very serious discussions on North Korea and also some other issues that we are jointly faced with," a senior Japanese official who declined to be named said ahead of Cheney's visit.

On Wednesday, the US vice president will meet with top leaders including Prime Minister Shinzo Abe, and have an audience with Japan's emperor and empress.

Cheney will not, however, meet with Defense Minister Fumio Kyuma, who last month sharply criticized the decision to invade Iraq. A US official said Cheney's schedule was "locked in place" before Kyuma requested a meeting.

Officially pacifist Japan took the landmark step of sending troops to Iraq on a non-combat mission but former prime minister Junichiro Koizumi withdrew them before handing over power to Abe in September.

The Japanese official downplayed disagreements between the allies, saying Abe had "reiterated support for US policy and the determination of his government to carry out various measures of cooperation."

But a poll carried Tuesday by the Asahi Shimbun showed that 57 percent of Japanese shared Kyuma's view that President George W. Bush was wrong to invade Iraq.

An overwhelming 81 percent backed Abe in refusing to fund the North Korea deal, with only 11 percent expressing opposition, said the liberal newspaper's poll of 1,940 voters.

Cheney will meet Friday with Australian opposition leader Kevin Rudd -- at Rudd's request, the US official said. Rudd has said his Labor Party would not back any increase in the number of Australian troops in Iraq, even military trainers.

However, Prime Minister John Howard said Monday Australia might send up to 70 additional military instructors to Iraq and deploy more troops in Afghanistan.

Cheney will meet on Saturday with Howard, who has complained about US handling of the country's sole terror suspect jailed at Guantanamo Bay, David Hicks, the so-called "Australian Taliban."

Listen, Mr. Cheney (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 20, 2007

WHEN Shinzo Abe meets Dick Cheney in Japan this week, a special kind of chemistry will be in effect. The hawkish Japanese prime minister and the bellicose U.S. vice president, self-described friends, have more in common than declining poll numbers. They both have war on their minds.

What we have on the one side is Abe, a historical revisionist, glorifying the losers of the last world war to reshape the past. On the other side you have Cheney, a hard-line unilateralist who has been one of the biggest planners and defenders of the American-led war in Iraq.

Cheney is visiting Japan this week, according to the White House, to thank officials there for "their efforts in Iraq and Afghanistan." Japan has sent noncombat troops to Iraq and has supplied logistical support in Afghanistan. But even as backing for the Iraq war continues to slip at home, Cheney will arrive in a Japan roiled by its own debate about rising militarism.

The latest example came when Japanese Defense Minister Fumio Kyuma suggested last month that the war in Iraq was a mistake. He was criticized roundly by Abe's people. Now, apparently as a punishment, the Bush administration asked Japan not to schedule a meeting between Cheney and Kyuma during this week's visit.

Thus, Cheney will snub the defense chief, the very person he would be expected to talk to in a visit focusing on defense and security issues. The message seems to be: Friends don't criticize friends. Japan, historically the bully of Asia, instinctively understands such threatening behavior.

There was no rational reason for Japan to get entangled in Iraq, and there's even less reason to become involved in Iran. However, Cheney appears bent on whipping up support for a reluctant Japan to continue to follow the Bush administration's lead in the war-torn Mideast. In refusing to meet with the defense minister, Cheney seems to be saying, in effect, that a silent nod to the wise is sufficient.

But the Japanese can say no, and why shouldn't they? What does the long-term Japan-U.S. relationship get out of this temporary subservience? Is it really in the interest of the Japanese people to bind their fate to the declining fortunes of the Bush-Cheney team?

Or might this be a good time, as opposition leader Ichiro Ozawa belatedly suggested a few weeks ago, to point out the obvious folly of U.S. ways, as a friend would, helping a friend?

Japan has yet to finish apologizing for the mess it made the last time it went to war, so why drag it into a new one?

The U.S. occupation of post-World War II Japan, with the attendant promulgation of a unique "peace constitution," was designed to make a former warrior nation allergic to war, and it largely succeeded. It is not only Japan's neighbors who get upset when Japanese pols visit the Yasukuni war shrine, which honors Japanese war criminals among the war dead; in fact, more than half of those polled in Japan are against such visits as well. From time to time, veteran U.S. voices, such as former Rep. Henry Hyde (R-Ill.), remind us that official visits to a shrine that makes a mockery of such events as Pearl Harbor and Nanjing do not serve U.S.-Japan interests either.

Likewise, Japan should listen carefully to what other American statesmen are saying about Tokyo's whitewash of critical history questions. A motion by Rep. Mike Honda (D-San Jose) calling for an apology on the oft-denied issue of Imperial Japan's "sex slaves" and other wartime injustices is not anti-Japan bullying but a nudge, from a friend to a friend, saying we need to agree on basic facts for the relationship to go forward.

The widespread Japanese commitment to peace, after the devastation of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, extends to an understandable abhorrence of nuclear weapons. Yet military analysts say that U.S. ships armed with nuclear weapons routinely pull into Japanese ports such as Yokosuka and Okinawa — making a sham of Japan's "three nonnuclear principles" (not possessing, producing or permitting nuclear weapons into the country).

Cheney is scheduled to have a photo-op aboard the U.S. aircraft carrier Kitty Hawk during his visit — an insensitive move that might well come to be regretted as a "mission accomplished" moment for the vice president. Tokyo's flamboyant mayor, Shintaro Ishihara, has already primed the public by asserting — without apparent evidence — that the Kitty Hawk is nuclear-equipped.

Instead of posing on the carrier, Cheney should take the time to hear what Kyuma and other Japanese critics of the Iraq war have to say.

South Korean, US Officials To Meet On North Korea Nuke Accord (AFP)

AFP, February 20, 2007

South Korea's deputy foreign minister has headed to Washington for talks with US officials on ways to follow up on last week's deal on scrapping North Korea's nuclear programme, his ministry said.

Shim Yoon-Joe was to hold talks with US Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns during his visit from Tuesday to Saturday, the ministry said.

He would also meet other officials including John C. Rood, assistant secretary of state for international security and nonproliferation, and Jack D. Crouch II, deputy national security advisor.

At six-nation talks in Beijing last week, North Korea agreed to start disabling its nuclear facilities in exchange for badly-needed energy aid.

As a first step it will shut down and seal its Yongbyon reactor within 60 days, admit UN nuclear inspectors and receive 50,000 tons of heavy fuel oil or equivalent assistance in return.

Further steps to disable nuclear facilities would be rewarded with up to 950,000 tons of heavy oil or other aid.

Critics say the deal does not address the North's existing weapons or plutonium stockpile, or its suspected uranium-based weapons research programme. Supporters call it a good start.

The agreement is "the first step in a long series that includes the complete renunciation of nuclear weaponry and facilities within North Korea," White House spokesman Tony Snow said Sunday.

"If they are going to get the benefits down the road including ultimately as much as a million tons of heavy oil, they've got to perform."

Seoul officials point out that the North must eventually submit a list of its nuclear facilities and programmes, including any uranium-based one.

Shim's US trip precedes a planned visit by South Korea's Foreign Minister Song Min-Soon early next month, Yonhap news agency said.

The Plan That Moved Pyongyang (WP)

By Philip Zelikow

In 2006, the headlines from North Korea were depressing. Pyongyang was headed down the path of escalation: missile tests in July, testing a nuclear weapon in October. Now, 2007 has opened with encouraging news -- a breakthrough in Beijing. In effect, the agreement announced last week was answering the bomb test with a successful test of diplomacy. But this deal makes more sense if we understand the broader strategy, set in motion some time ago, that is starting to play out.

In 2005, the United States energized its flagging North Korea efforts on two tracks. One was diplomatic, the other defensive. The diplomatic strategy was never just about North Korea. The Korean Peninsula has repeatedly been a battleground for the great powers in Northeast Asia. The United States, particularly Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her deputy, Robert Zoellick, saw a way to break this mold: China, Japan and Russia were flexing new diplomatic muscle. The North Korean problem could be an opportunity to unite potential rivals in common effort, an enterprise without precedent in Northeast Asia.

The defensive approach responded to North Korea's outlaw strategy for economic survival. Protecting the integrity of the international financial system was just one of the ways to show the North's leaders that trafficking in contraband was not a sustainable solution to their problems.

By late 2005, both policies had been set in motion. In September, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill and his counterparts from South Korea, North Korea, China, Japan and Russia had negotiated a joint framework for comprehensive diplomatic action. Meanwhile, enforcement actions that had been pending against North Korea's partners in money laundering, such as Macau's Banco Delta Asia, were rolled out.

Then the Bush administration paused. It had been preparing to follow up with new diplomatic initiatives, but the administration was uncertain and divided about how much further to go until North Korea moved. As for the North Koreans, they were indeed hit hard as members of the international financial community became increasingly reluctant to handle their suspect transactions. Furious, they boycotted the six-party talks and tried to advertise their own strength, a course that culminated in the nuclear test last October.

After that test, Rice leaned hard on the regional diplomatic relationships she had nurtured. First -- and fast -- came U.N. Security Council Resolution 1718, the most potent action against North Korea that the United Nations had taken since 1953, when the Korean War was suspended.

Having shown the North that it had underestimated regional solidarity, the United States next moved to change the dynamic, to break the cycle of escalation. That month, Chinese President Hu Jintao and President Bush came to a strategic understanding about North Korea. They agreed that diplomacy needed to be given another chance. But the diplomacy couldn't just be a gloss, busywork that only gave the appearance of action.

To turn this strategic understanding into policy, Rice developed a two-stage strategy. First the six parties would move quickly to offset the nuclear test with unprecedented commitments from the North Koreans to stop and reverse their nuclear development and to bring back the system of monitoring by the International Atomic Energy Agency. Some called this an "early harvest" -- testing whether the ground could yield anything fruitful.

If it did, then in the second stage the six parties would follow up. But rather than returning to the old, painful pattern of piecemeal nuclear bribery, the diplomacy would have to move simultaneously on multiple fronts: scrapping the nuclear program, building normal economic cooperation, tackling the normalization of relations and -- perhaps most engaging -- getting at the unresolved issues of the Korean War.

Thus, later in October, Rice shuttled across Northeast Asia to reassure allies and win support for this diplomatic design, especially in Beijing.

Pressure had its place. So did diplomatic ingenuity. One Chinese official said to Rice, "It is better to play with two hands." And talking with the North Koreans would not be a problem, Rice concluded, if doing so did not undermine the vital regional foundation and if the North Koreans actually had something to say.

Last week's deal, skillfully negotiated by Rice and Hill with their counterparts, delivers a plan for the "early harvest." A "good, initial step" was Rice's careful phrase. The broader context in which the agreement was reached helps explain what she meant. The United States and its negotiating partners have successfully carried out a diplomatic test.

The next two months will show whether the design remains valid. Rice has agreed to a six-party meeting of foreign ministers, including the North Koreans. We will see whether the Bush administration and its counterparts can launch the second stage, when the desired outcomes to be produced from this diplomacy may finally come into view.

Head Of UN Nuclear Agency Gloomy On Iran Breakthrough (FT)

By Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, February 20, 2007

Mohamed ElBaradei has not given up hope that the US and Iran will one day sit down and negotiate their -differences away, but in the much shorter term his prognosis is bleak.

Tomorrow, in his capacity as director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, the United Nations' nuclear watchdog, Mr ElBaradei is due to certify that Iran has failed to comply with UN demands to halt sensitive parts of its nuclear programme.

"I will continue to make a last-ditch effort to try to convince them that it is in their interest to find a way to go into negotiations," he told the Financial Times in an interview in London. "If that doesn't happen, and I don't see that it is going to happen overnight, I will have to report negatively."

He adds, however, that there will still be scope for a diplomatic breakthrough until the week of March 5, when the IAEA board meets and the issue is taken out of his hands.

Mr ElBaradei makes little attempt to disguise his lack of enthusiasm for the US's drive to impose more sanctions on Tehran and push the Islamic republic into suspending activity related to uranium enrichment, which can produce both nuclear fuel and weapons grade material.

In December the UN Security Council agreed sanctions on the transfer of -missile and nuclear technology to Iran, and the issue is set to return to New York after Mr ElBaradei's report tomorrow.

"Our experience without exception is that sanctions alone do not work and in most cases radicalise the regime and hurt the people who are not supposed to be hurt," he says. "If you create an environment in which Iran feels isolated, in which Iran is subject to further sanctions, then some of these worst case scenarios could take place, because then you would put the hardliners in the driver's seat."

In his eyes, the suspension of Iran's current "research and development" enrichment activities is no longer the real issue.

Far more important for him is ensuring that Tehran does not install an industrial scale capacity of 3,000 centrifuges - enough to begin producing fissile material for a bomb - within months, further limit the work of UN inspectors, or leave the Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty.

As for the perpetual rumbles that Washington or Israel might yet contemplate the use of force, "even if [the Iranians] were not going to develop a nuclear weapon today, this would be a sure recipe for them to go down that route . . . Go for the military option and then either you'll have a repeat of North Korea [which has developed nuclear weapons] or you have a repeat of Iraq, and these are not our greatest achievements as civilised human beings."

Instead, Mr ElBaradei has been championing the idea of a "time-out" in which both Iran's nuclear programme and the sanctions targeted against it would be put on ice.

He acknowledges that the idea would allow the two sides to act simultaneously, rather than demanding that Tehran must halt enrichment as a precondition for any further steps.

"It's just a question of how to get both sides to the negotiating table while saving face," he says.

"The Iranian issue will only be resolved when the US takes a decision to engage Iran directly . . The nuclear issue is the tip of the iceberg."

Russia expects delay to Tehran reactor

By Neil Buckley in Moscow and Gareth Smyth in Tehran

Russia warned yesterday that the launch of the Iranian nuclear reactor at Bushehr could be delayed because Tehran had fallen behind with payments and because of problems with sourcing some equipment from third countries.

Officials from Russia's atomic energy agency and from Atomstroiexport, the Russian contractor building the station, said Tehran had not made payments for more than a month, after insisting on paying in euros instead of dollars.

Tehran has been shifting transactions to euros, but has also admitted difficulties in raising finance due to western banks and financiers reducing involvement after US pressure.

Bushehr was excluded, at Russian insistence, from December's UN Security Council resolution giving Iran a 60-day deadline, expiring tomorrow, to end its nuclear activities.

A Twofold Approach To Tehran (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon And Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

As Iran's power in the Middle East grows, the Bush administration is pursuing a two-pronged strategy of directly challenging Tehran in places such as Iraq and Lebanon, while seeking to exploit fissures believed to be emerging in Iran's social and political systems.

The strategy includes military movements to underscore American resolve as well as financial pressure to drive a wedge between Iran's leaders and the country's merchants. Friday, the Treasury Department announced sanctions on three Iranian energy companies.

U.S. officials say the strategy isn't designed to court a war. Still, it is fraught with risks. Iran could misread or overreact to some American moves; strategists at the Pentagon say U.S. attempts to target Iranian agents operating inside Iraq could stoke a larger response from Tehran's paramilitary forces, such as the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps.

There are signs this escalating pressure is having some effect on Iran and opening opportunities for advancement in U.S. foreign policy, whether containing Iran's nuclear ambitions or underpinning a democratically elected government in Lebanon. But rather than seeking a quick fix to the contest against Iran, Bush administration officials say they are bracing for a long struggle to curb Tehran's influence in the region.

"We are convinced that sooner or later the costs will be so high that they [the Iranians] will have to come to the negotiating table," said Nicholas Burns, the State Department's point man on Iran. "I don't believe a conflict with Iran is inevitable. ... We've got time."

U.S. efforts to confront Iran are driven by decade-old fears that the Islamic republic will seek to export its anti-American, revolutionary doctrine across the Middle East. Iran's growing influence in the region also could further embolden Islamist militias like Hezbollah and Hamas fighting Israel and imperil U.S. access to Mideast energy reserves.

Many Middle East analysts are skeptical about the Bush administration's ability to induce political change in Iran. Siding with Saddam Hussein in the 1980-88 Iran-Iraq War, Washington further radicalized Iranian society while strengthening Iraq's despot. Attempts by the Reagan and Clinton administrations to reach out to relative moderates in Iran resulted in diplomatic frustrations and political embarrassments.

U.S. officials mapping the emerging strategy toward Iran have depicted a security posture that, in many ways, echoes the containment Washington employed against the Soviet Union during the Cold War. This entails confronting pro-Iranian groups wherever they operate in the world, while using economic and military tools to undermine the government in Tehran.

The administration has sought to stoke internal opposition to President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad by increasingly choking off his country's ties to the global economy. White House officials say Tehran's business and clerical elite are increasingly at odds with the Iranian president's confrontational stance toward the international community on issues like Iran's nuclear program and Israel's right to exist, and they fear his stance could isolate them internationally.

The Treasury is moving to exert more pressure on Tehran by imposing financial sanctions on three Iranian companies allegedly involved in supporting Tehran's nuclear program. The policy prohibits U.S. companies from doing business with the three firms, which are all owned by the Atomic Energy Organization of Iran, and freezes any assets they may have in the U.S.

U.S. officials say these measures underpin a wider push by the international community to impose financial penalties, through the United Nations, on Iranian companies and individuals believed to be aiding Tehran's alleged pursuit of nuclear weapons.

Jitters in Iran's financial markets and the poor showing of candidates associated with Mr. Ahmadinejad in recent Iranian elections are fueling optimism within the Bush administration that such measures are starting to have an impact. U.S. officials also point to recent editorials in Iranian state-owned newspapers criticizing many of the Iranian president's policies.

"This is not a monolithic government" in Iran, Mr. Burns said last week in a speech at the Brookings Institution, a Washington think tank. Disaffected ethnic groups are stoking opposition to the government. Last week, an ethnic Baluchi separatist group claimed responsibility for bombing a bus carrying Revolutionary Guard cadres in the eastern province of Sistan-Baluchistan. Tehran had originally blamed the attack on the U.S. While Washington has denied involvement, some U.S. officials say, the U.S. should exploit Iran's ethnic fissures to restrain Tehran. Ethnic Kurd, Turk and Arab minorities have historically opposed Iran's largely Persian central government.

The largest potential flashpoint between Iran and the U.S. remains Iraq. President Bush pledged to increase efforts to choke off what he says is Iran's funneling of munitions and arms to Shiite militias there. Critics say the White House is overstating Iran's involvement in Iraq's discord, potentially to blame Tehran for some U.S. setbacks. Senior Bush administration officials say drawing redlines in Iraq is crucial to blunting Tehran's ambitions throughout the region.

Elsewhere in the Middle East, the U.S. and its allies have intensified proxy battles against Iran in recent weeks. In Lebanon, the U.S. and Saudi Arabia have increased economic and military aid to the government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora to ward off efforts by Hezbollah -- Lebanon's radical Shiite group, which is backed by Iran -- to grab more power. The Bush administration has also increased aid to the Palestinian Authority and its leader, Mahmoud Abbas, in a bid to blunt the power of Iranian-funded Hamas.

Critics of the Bush administration's Iran strategy say successes may prove short-lived. U.S. efforts to arrest or kill Iranian agents in Iraq could fuel a backlash by Iranian-backed Shiite groups in Iraq and other countries and potentially spark a wider Middle East war, they say.

Pushing for the removal of Mr. Ahmadinejad, the Iranian president, meanwhile, is unlikely to significantly moderate Iran's positions, many Iran experts say. For one, the president's popularity could rise if Washington is seen as overtly trying to topple him. Many other Iranian officials have voiced a commitment to maintaining Iran's nuclear program, and Iran's broader society is seen to be behind it.

Iran Launches Large-scale War Games (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini

AP, February 20, 2007

Iran began its largest war games in almost a year Monday, just two days ahead of a U.N. Security Council deadline for Iran to halt uranium enrichment or face further economic sanctions.

The elite Revolutionary Guards began three days of ground maneuvers, state-run media reported Monday.

State television said the exercise is the biggest since last March and is taking place in 16 of Iran's 30 provinces. The broadcast said an estimated 60,000 troops are participating in the maneuvers.

"All weapons possessed by the Guards' ground force ... including new weapons, will be tested during the war games," Gen. Mohammad Reza Zahedi, commander of the Guards' ground force, was quoted by the official Islamic Republic News Agency as saying Monday.

The Revolutionary Guards is an elite military corps with more than 200,000 members and its own naval and air forces. It is independent of the regular armed forces and controlled directly by the supreme leader. It oversees vital interests such as oil and natural gas installations and the nation's missile arsenal.

In January, the Guards held three days of war games.

The Security Council approved a resolution against Iran on Dec. 23 that imposed economic sanctions and gave Iran 60 days to halt uranium enrichment, otherwise it will consider additional measures.

As tensions mount over Iran's nuclear standoff with the West, the United States and Iran have pursued an escalating series of military moves, with Washington sending more aircraft carrier battle groups to the region and Iran responding with more frequent maneuvers.

The United States and several of its Western allies believe that Iran is using its nuclear program to produce an atomic weapon — charges Iran denies, saying its aim is to generate electricity.

Iran has said it will never give up its right under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty to enrich uranium and produce nuclear fuel. Enriched to a low level, uranium is used to produce nuclear fuel but further enrichment makes it suitable for use in building an atomic bomb.

Russia Will Slow Work On Iran's Nuclear Plant (NYT)

By Andrew E. Kramer

MOSCOW, Feb. 19 — Russia said Monday that it would slow work on Iran's nearly completed Bushehr nuclear power plant.

Russia contended that Iran had not made the last two $25 million monthly payments, in a dispute about whether it could pay in euros instead of dollars.

The move added a new twist to the deeply contentious project to build a Russian-designed light-water reactor in Iran, a decade-old deal that is a factor in the United States' concerns over Iran's nuclear ambitions.

The dispute, which became public on Monday, will delay, perhaps by a year, any delivery of nuclear fuel to Iran, Russian officials and experts said. Low-enriched uranium fuel was scheduled to be shipped next month.

"The accounts are not being paid," said Ivan A. Dybov, spokesman for Rosatom, the Russian nuclear agency. What is at issue, he said, is a request made last month by an Iranian bank to settle accounts in euros rather than dollars. The Iranian government has a stated policy of settling contracts and holding reserves in currencies other than the dollar.

As part of its effort to halt Iran's nuclear program, the United States has encouraged European banks to freeze Iranian dollar-denominated accounts.

An Iranian official denied that the country had been late in making payments. "We have made all the payments so far based on the contract and the agreed installments," said Muhammad Saeedi, the deputy director of the Atomic Energy Organization, the official IRNA news agency reported.

"We will try to come up with a solution for the financial problem of the Russian contractor, which is their problem, not the problem of the Iranian side, in the next few days," he added.

A former Iranian president, Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, said, "World powers are trying to dominate international organizations and deny Iran's right, but we expect our friends to stop such moves," IRNA reported.

A United Nations ultimatum to Iran to halt uranium enrichment expires on Wednesday. But the commercial arm-twisting was also in keeping with the Kremlin's policy lately of pumping up the bottom line across a spectrum of state businesses, from oil and gas to nuclear power.

Analysts say rising prices for steel and heavy machinery have probably made the Bushehr project unprofitable.

Russia refused payment in euros without opening the contract to renegotiation, Mr. Dybov said. The Iranians settled less than 25 percent of the bill in January and missed February's payment entirely, he said. "We aren't turning down the euros" on principle, Mr. Dybov said, but he added that any change must be incorporated in a contract amendment. The payment conditions and the exact amount of the shortfall are commercial secrets, he said.

Russian officials also cited as a cause of the delay a holdup in the delivery of safety equipment for the reactor from an unspecified third country. The plant was scheduled to begin operations in September.

Now, they probably will not begin before mid-2008, said Andrei Cherkasenko, a board member of the Russian state nuclear power company Atompromresursy, the Russian press agency Interfax reported.

The conflict was not the first dispute between the countries over the plant. "From time to time, the Russians get fed up with the Iranians" and work slows, Rose Gottemoeller, the director of the Carnegie Moscow Center, said in a telephone interview. "The Russians have been very canny in using the Bushehr project to back up their diplomacy" by modulating the construction schedule, she said.

Iran Cash Lapse Puts Nuke Plan In Peril (WT/AP)

By Vladimir Isachenkov

The Washington Times, February 20, 2007

MOSCOW -- The opening of a Russian-built nuclear power plant in Iran could be delayed because Iran has fallen behind in payments, Russian officials said yesterday.

A top Iranian nuclear official swiftly denied that payments had been disrupted, in the latest dispute surrounding the deal at the heart of the two countries' nuclear cooperation.

Under an agreement reached last year, Russia was to ship nuclear fuel to Bushehr -- Iran's first nuclear plant -- by next month and open the facility in September, with electricity generation to start by November.

Iran agreed in a separate deal to return to Russia all spent fuel from the plant in southern Iran for reprocessing. The move was intended to assuage global concerns that the fuel could be diverted to make nuclear weapons.

Iran broke the schedule of payments this year under the $1 billion contract, said a Russian official who asked not be named because he was not authorized to speak to the press.

He said the Iranians blamed the delay on the need to switch payments from dollars to euros.

"The launch schedule definitely could be affected," said Sergei Novikov, a spokesman for Russia's nuclear power agency.

Mohammad Saeedi, the deputy head of the Atomic Energy Organization of Iran, denied that Tehran had been late in making payments.

DOJ_NMG_0133725

"Iran has had no delay whatsoever in making payments for the Bushehr nuclear power plant," Mr. Saeedi was quoted as saying by the Islamic Republic News Agency.

The dispute erupted during persistent diplomatic efforts to persuade Iran to halt uranium enrichment in order to allay international fears that it could be seeking nuclear weapons.

Although a delay in opening Bushehr is likely to anger Iran, Russia gave no indication that it was maneuvering to scrap the deal, which has provoked Western criticism.

Russia emphasizes that Iran has the right to a peaceful nuclear energy program, and President Vladimir Putin and other officials have said that the Bushehr contract would be honored.

Mr. Putin's increasingly defiant posture toward the United States makes it unlikely that the Kremlin would opt out of the agreement.

"Russia remains firmly committed to the Bushehr deal, and Putin's recent statements make a change in attitude highly improbable," said Yevgeny Volk, head of the Heritage Foundation's Moscow office.

In December, Russia supported a U.N. Security Council resolution imposing limited sanctions against Iran over its refusal to stop uranium enrichment, but only after a proposal imposing restrictions on the Bushehr plant was dropped.

The United States and some allies say Iran's nuclear program is aimed at developing nuclear weapons. Iran maintains it is intended only to generate electricity.

Word of the Bushehr delay surfaced as Iran hurriedly arranged talks today with the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) just ahead of the U.N. nuclear watchdog's report that could expose Tehran to even broader sanctions over its disputed nuclear program.

Iran's top security official, Ali Larijani, will meet with IAEA director Mohamed ElBaradei, who in a report to the Security Council later this week is expected to confirm that Tehran has defied a 60-day council deadline to stop enriching uranium.

Separately, Mr. ElBaradei said in a published interview Iran would be able to install 3,000 centrifuges as the basis for "industrial-scale" enrichment in six to 12 months.

Gholamreza Aghazadeh, who heads Iran's nuclear programs, is pushing for an even earlier completion date, according to a report by diplomats who visited Iran two weeks ago.

Mr. ElBaradei told the London-based Financial Times newspaper that it was too late for the world to deny Iran enrichment know-how, meaning that only diplomatic compromise, not sanctions, could resolve the crisis.

Soaring Energy Use Puts Oil Squeeze On Iran (WSJ)

By Bill Spindle

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

AHVAZ, Iran -- Iran sits on one-tenth of the world's known oil supplies but is using so much energy these days it may start rationing gasoline as soon as next month.

Part of the reason lies with people such as 42-year-old Seyd Jessem Moosavi. No one in Mr. Moosavi's family had an automobile when he was growing up. He was the first to buy one, followed quickly by his father. Now all five of his brothers have cars, and Mr. Moosavi just bought one for his 25-year-old son.

He also recently opened a car wash, where he stood on a recent afternoon in this southern Iranian city directing customers from the busy street to his corps of young scrubbers. "With no car wash in the neighborhood and more and more cars, I thought this would be good," he said.

Mr. Moosavi's booming new business underscores one of the biggest challenges facing Iran today. As the country has grown wealthier selling oil and gas, Iranians have themselves become large consumers of energy. Government subsidies, which make energy nearly free to consumers and businesses, stoke the demand further.

At the same time, a combination of Western sanctions and Iranian policies has discouraged foreign investment in oil fields, causing production to stagnate. The result: Iran's oil exports could dry up in as little as a decade, according to some who have studied the situation.

That's a looming disaster for Iran, which derives about 85% of its export income from the sale of oil. "The industry is in a crisis," says Mehdi Varzi, a former Iranian diplomat and national oil company official who heads a London-based consulting company, Varzi Energy.

The impact would be felt far beyond Iran. The country produced 3.8 million barrels of oil a day in 2006, almost 5% of the world's total supply, according to the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries. It exported an average of about 2.5 million barrels of that each day. Should those sales decline, Iran's largest customers, Japan and China, would scramble for other supplies, pushing up prices for everyone.

Avoiding an export squeeze is one reason Iran argues it needs to consider nuclear energy. But that ambition has contributed to a diplomatic impasse with the West. Bush administration officials describe Iran's nuclear program as little more than a ruse to conceal what they say is a hidden effort to build nuclear weapons. Iranian officials deny that, arguing that nuclear plants could handle some of the soaring domestic energy demand, leaving more oil and gas to export and avoiding difficult domestic choices.

Indeed, several other Middle East countries -- including Egypt and the world's largest oil exporter, Saudi Arabia -- also are investigating nuclear energy programs, citing similar reasons.

More Vulnerable

Iran's energy woes could make it more vulnerable to international economic sanctions, say officials from the U.S. and other countries who favor strengthening the set of punishments the United Nations Security Council has placed on the country. Even many Iranian officials concede that the longstanding ban the U.S. has placed on American oil companies working in Iran has hampered the country's ability to develop its oil fields adequately.

Others, however, suggest that sanctions can also make it easier for the Iranian regime to blame outsiders for the disruptions that solving the problem could entail.

Once seen as little more than a giant petrol station to the world, Middle Eastern oil suppliers are now becoming some of the largest consumers of energy anywhere. They are attempting to diversify their economies, often by encouraging energy-thirsty industries such as refineries and processing of metals like aluminum. Meanwhile, record numbers of young people are growing up and establishing households. Already, the Middle East and North Africa's population of some 300 million consumes almost as much oil as 1.2 billion Chinese.

Iran, where a huge population bulge is reaching adulthood, is confronting the export crunch earlier and more acutely than others. Iran already consumes more oil than all but 15 other countries on earth, according to the International Energy Agency, which monitors the world energy market. In 1995, Iranians used the equivalent of 34% of the oil they pumped from the ground, exporting the rest. Last year they used 40%. In Iran's natural-gas industry, the pinch has already begun. Although Iran has 15% of the world's gas reserves, the country imported more than it exported in 2005. In January, Iran briefly cut off gas exports to Turkey as the Iranian government struggled with a surge in domestic use during a stretch of cold weather.

Iran's leaders are keenly aware of these problems. But in recent years, they've avoided making difficult choices as global oil prices climbed. Export revenues rose even as the amount of oil exported has remained steady or even fallen.

Nonetheless, the situation is already wreaking havoc with the government's budget. Iran subsidizes most energy, including gasoline, diesel and many other refined products. Consumers and businesses alike benefit. Overall, energy subsidies cost the government as much as $40 billion, equivalent to almost a quarter of the country's entire economic output, according to Bijan Zanganeh, a former Iranian oil minister. That spending is fanning inflation in the broader economy. "It's unacceptable and it can't continue," he says.

Yet in Ahvaz, it's clear that pushing oil and gas production higher and demand lower won't be easy. Khuzestan province, the center of the country's energy industry, already generates 17% of Iran's electricity. But that's not enough to keep electricity flowing here in the provincial capital all the time.

Residents of the city, whose population has grown by one-third in the past decade to 1.3 million, are packing more people into the warrens of apartment blocks within the older city center. And they're also moving into new housing sprouting up all around the fringes of the city.

Meanwhile, inexpensive consumer appliances have flooded the country in recent years from low-cost manufacturing bases like China and Turkey. Even young couples of modest means can now afford new refrigerators, air conditioners, and microwave ovens. Better-off ones buy the luxury items -- blenders, juicers, egg cookers and coffee makers -- that fill an ever-widening number of shops in the heart of the city's traditional bazaar.

The appliance section alone now takes up two city blocks, side-by-side with vendors displaying barrels of pistachios and dates and clothing. "Financially, I'm able to afford it now," says Vahid Javadi, a 33-year-old schoolteacher, shopping in the bazaar for a washing machine with his wife.

Ibrahim Marwani, a 40-year-old electrician, spends most of his workdays trying to upgrade rickety old electrical wiring for customers. "These days, they want to overhaul everything," he says. He had to redo the wiring in his own house, he says, to keep up with the growing need for power as he's purchased two refrigerators, two televisions, a stereo, DVD player and two air conditioners that "run around-the-clock" during summer days when temperatures regularly reach 110 degrees.

Some of the Middle East's first oil came from wells not far from Ahvaz, starting in 1908 when Persia's British overseers began drilling operations in the nearby desert. Ever since, Khuzestan Province has been the center of Iran's ascent to the ranks of the world's top oil producers.

Under the regime of the last Shah, Mohammad Reza Pahlavi, Iranian oil production reached 6.6 million barrels per day in 1974, five years before the revolution ushered in Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini and the Islamic Republic that rules the country today. Oil production crashed as the turmoil of the revolution segued into an eight-year war with next-door-neighbor Iraq. Oil fields and refineries were bombed and crucial maintenance ignored. By the early 1980s, only about 1.3 million barrels per day were being pumped from the ground.

Ahvaz and the nearby port and refining centers of Abadan and Khorramshar were especially hard hit. Saddam Hussein's Iraqi forces invaded Khorramshar, and shelled Ahvaz and Abadan. Many residents fled. When the war ended in 1988, the cities were key to an intense program, pushed along by national desperation, to get the country's oil industry back on its feet.

In Abadan, one of the country's largest refineries, largely destroyed by Iraqi shelling, was slowly brought back into operation. It still only processes about half the 630,000 barrels a day of crude it did at its prerevolutionary peak. But residents of the city still point to that comeback with pride, since it was accomplished with very little foreign capital or expertise. Oil production also climbed back to close to 4 million barrels a day in the late 1990s.

Those comebacks, which were achieved with little outside assistance, helped the clerical government in Tehran consolidate its power. But many of Iran's producing oil fields are now old and overall could be losing production of as much as 500,000 barrels a day each year. That shortfall has to be made up with new production or the country's overall oil output will fall.

Yet to keep up exports, Iran will also have to keep ahead of Iranians' own thirst for gas and oil, which is growing at a double-digit pace. So far, it is losing the race.

Much of the problem is waste. A recent study by a parliamentary committee said that 18.5% of the country's electricity is lost before it even reaches consumers, due to rickety infrastructure, corruption and mismanagement.

Bigger Problem

But an even bigger problem is the consumers themselves. That's because subsidies make energy practically free in Iran, discouraging any serious energy conservation. Gasoline, for example, costs about 40 cents a gallon at the pump. That's encouraged an explosion of use, as Iranians add new cars while continuing to use fuel-guzzling old models. It has also encouraged a brisk smuggling trade as Iranians buy millions of gallons of fuel at the subsidized price and truck them into neighboring Pakistan, Turkey, Afghanistan and Iraq for sale at market rates.

Demand has now far outstripped the country's refinery capacity. The government has shelled out at least $7 billion on gasoline imports alone so far this fiscal year, which ends in March. Much of that money was drawn from the country's rainy-day oil surplus fund, which is supposed to be used only on capital projects or during periods when global oil prices are low.

Next year, if nothing is done to change the situation, the bill could top $9 billion, government officials have warned. So plans to begin rationing fuel are being drawn up. But the government nixed a similar initiative last year for fear of a political backlash. This time, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad says the government is serious about cutting back consumption, though he acknowledged recently it's politically impossible to get rid of subsidies and raise pump prices the 40% to 50% that would require anytime soon.

In Ahvaz, gasoline quotas aren't likely to win the government many fans. "I'm concerned," says 29-year-old taxi driver Farzad Mesbinia, adding that he heard that if rations are imposed he would be limited to 5.8 gallons of subsidized gasoline a day. "With that, I can't get by," he says as he inches his cab forward in two long queues at a busy gas station here.

Massive Plan

To alleviate these problems, and the looming export squeeze, the government has also embarked on a massive plan to try to boost oil and gas production. But there are problems with both initiatives. The Azadegan oil field, located about an hour's drive west of Ahvaz near the border with Iraq, underscores some of them.

The field, discovered in late 1990s, is among the largest deposits in the world. It holds about 26 billion barrels oil and could one day produce as much as 260,000 barrels a day, Iranian officials estimate. It's the kind of field U.S. oil majors would be keen to help develop, were it not for U.S. government sanctions on Iran preventing them from participating. In 2004, Iran signed a deal to allow a Japanese company, Inpex, to take a 75% stake in the field and develop it. But for years, the project remained stalled by the need to remove land mines left from the war. The U.S. also urged Japan behind the scenes to scale back its involvement in the project, as Iran's confrontation with the international community over its nuclear program has escalated.

After years of dispute between the Iranians and Japanese over why the project wasn't proceeding, Inpex's 75% stake was cut to 10% last year. Management of the project was handed over to an Iranian company. The upshot: Little progress has been made in getting the oil out of the ground -- and without significant new foreign participation that's unlikely to change, according to many observers inside and outside Iran's oil industry. Overall, industry officials estimate between $100 billion and $120 billion is needed to get Iran's oil production back on track.

Adding refinery capacity in hopes of cutting fuel imports has proved an equally tough slog, although the Iranian government has now allotted $16 billion to the task of building three new refineries and boosting the capacity of the existing ones, including the one in Abadan.

In addition to that, the government has taken the unprecedented step of allowing some private entrepreneurs to step into the energy game. Jamal Hayat is hoping to take advantage of that opening.

Born in Ahvaz, Mr. Hayat moved with his parents to Tehran as a youth. He calls Khuzestan Province "the ideal place" for a $50 billion refinery and electrical power plant he and his brother, who was born in Abadan, are trying to build between the two cities of their births. "This is the province of black gold," says Mr. Hayat.

Five years after the brothers approached Tehran officials for permission to build the refinery, however, the planned site for the plant remains a fallow field in the desert. The Hayat brothers now hope to complete construction in a year.

Europe And The Mullahs (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

On the record, Europe claims to be as concerned as America about a nuclear-armed Iran. The record also shows, however, that Europe's biggest countries do a booming business with the Islamic Republic. And so far for the Continentals, manna trumps security.

The European Union -- led by Germany, France and Italy -- has long been Iran's largest trading partner. Its share of Iran's total imports is about 35%. Even more notable: Its trade with Tehran has expanded since Iran's secret nuclear program was exposed. Between 2003 and 2005, Europe's exports rose 29% to €12.9 billion; machinery, transport equipment and chemicals make up the bulk of the sales. Imports from Iran, predominantly oil, increased 62% to €11.4 billion in that period.

In the absence of an official embargo against Tehran, private EU companies have sought commercial opportunities in Iran. But the real story here is that these businesses are subsidized by European taxpayers. Government-backed export guarantees have fueled the expansion in trade. That, in turn, has boosted Iran's economy and -- indirectly by filling government coffers with revenues -- its nuclear program. The German record stands out. In its 2004 annual report on export guarantees, Berlin's Economics Ministry dedicated a special section to Iran that captures its giddy excitement about business with Tehran.

"Federal Government export credit guarantees played a crucial role for German exports to Iran; the volume of coverage of Iranian buyers rose by a factor of almost 3.5 to some €2.3 billion compared to the previous year," the report said. "The Federal Government thus insured something like 65% of total German exports to the country. Iran lies second in the league of countries with the highest coverage in 2004, hot on the heels of China."

Iran tops Germany's list of countries with the largest outstanding export guarantees, totaling €5.5 billion. France's export guarantees to Iran amount to about €1 billion. Italy's come to €4.5 billion, accounting for 20% of Rome's overall guarantee portfolio. Little Austria had, at the end of 2005, €800 million of its exports to Iran covered by guarantees.

The Europeans aren't simply facilitating business between private companies. The vast majority of Iranian industry is state-controlled, while even private companies have been known to act as fronts for the country's nuclear program. EU taxpayers underwrite trade and investment that would otherwise be deterred by the risks of doing business with a rogue regime.

It's also hard not to see a connection between Europe's commercial interests and its lenient diplomacy. The U.N.'s December sanctions resolution orders countries to freeze the assets of only 10 specific companies and 12 individuals with ties to Iran's nuclear program. Europe's governments continue to resist U.S. calls for financial sanctions, and the German Chamber of Commerce recently estimated that tougher economic sanctions would cost 10,000 German jobs.

As if on cue, Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier last week detected in Tehran a "new ambition" to resume talks. The last time the Europeans promoted such diplomatic negotiations, Iran won two more years to get closer to its goal of becoming a nuclear power. In 2004, according to the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung daily, then-Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer told Iranians to consider Europe a "protective shield" against U.S. pressure. The EU continues to provide a shield for its business interests in Iran, and thus a lifeline to a regime that is unpopular at home and sponsors terror abroad.

Mideast Talks Conclude With Little Result (NYT)

By Helene Cooper And Steven Erlanger

JERUSALEM, Feb. 19 — An American-sponsored meeting between Israeli and Palestinian leaders meant to start a new peace initiative after six years ended Monday with little more concrete than a promise to meet again.

For most of its period in office, the Bush administration has kept a hands-off stance in Arab-Israeli peace negotiations, but the meeting was evidence of a new commitment by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to try to improve a deteriorating situation.

Ms. Rice and her aides made it clear that her efforts had been complicated by the recent decision in principle of the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, to bring his Fatah faction into a unity government with Hamas, which Israel, the United States and the European Union consider a terrorist organization.

She suggested that if this meeting had not been scheduled beforehand, the Israeli prime minister, Ehud Olmert, might not have agreed to meet with Mr. Abbas, whom she praised nevertheless for supporting international and Israeli demands that the Palestinians recognize Israel's right to exist, forswear violence and accept previously negotiated agreements with the Israelis.

Although Hamas has not agreed to any of those requirements, a new unity government may come closer to meeting them than the Hamas movement itself. But Ms. Rice said she doubted that such a government would come close enough to satisfy the Americans and the Israelis.

The joint statement read by Ms. Rice after two hours of talks on Monday with Mr. Olmert and Mr. Abbas was vague. The two men "discussed their views of the diplomatic and political horizon," the statement said, and agreed to meet again "soon."

Neither Mr. Olmert nor Mr. Abbas appeared by Ms. Rice's side as she read the statement, reflecting the tenuous nature of the talks, which appear to be so fragile that no side has even been willing to label them negotiations. One American official called them "an informal dialogue," and the official statement referred to them simply as efforts.

The commitment from Mr. Olmert to meet again with Mr. Abbas is a minor victory for Mr. Abbas, known as Abu Mazen, because it signals that Israel will continue to deal with him despite his unity government plans.

Mr. Olmert said later: "There will be a dialogue, and we will continue the communication channel with Abu Mazen. We will not accept a situation in which we have no channels of communication with the Palestinian public, as I think this will be a dire mistake, all this without compromising over the principle we have established: not to conduct ties or acknowledge institutions that fail to endorse the basic principles which are the foundation to any future dealings."

A top Palestinian negotiator, Saeb Erekat, said Mr. Abbas had agreed to the unity government deal, signed in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, to end weeks of fighting between Hamas and Fatah. He added that Mr. Abbas, as the legal representative of the Palestinians as head of the Palestine Liberation Organization, "recognizes Israel, and that's what really matters."

Ms. Rice made it clear that she felt it wise to continue to talk to Palestinians like Mr. Abbas who accept Israel and nonviolence, which she said represented the views of a majority of Palestinians.

But a Palestinian unity government that does not recognize Israel or renounce violence — and thus far, the Abbas-Hamas agreement does not do so — will make any talks on what is being called a "political and diplomatic horizon" for a settlement even more complicated.

It is one thing for Israel to begin talks with Mr. Abbas while it is boycotting the unity government he helped to negotiate. But it is another for Israel to make meaningful progress toward concluding such negotiations and reaching a peace deal with a government that refuses to recognize it or renounce violence against it.

Ms. Rice defended the decision to hold the meeting. "Sure, we could have said we'll just wait until it all sorts out," she said. But she added that the Mecca agreement had strained relations between Mr. Abbas and Mr. Olmert to the point that the two needed to clear the air between them. "It's really valuable that they sat face to face," she said.

Some analysts who had been critical of the Bush administration's earlier stance on peace talks agreed. "In this environment, given the odds against even launching a process, what she's done is an achievement," said Aaron David Miller, a scholar at the Woodrow Wilson Center who was a senior adviser for Arab-Israeli relations at the State Department under the previous three presidents.

But the odds for success remain long, he cautioned, until the Palestinians acquire a government that is willing to recognize Israel. "Oddly enough, we're now dressed up for the party, but we've got nowhere to go," he said.

Beyond that, Israel's government is deeply skeptical of Mr. Abbas's ability to deliver calm, let alone a peace agreement. Mr. Olmert and his aides view Mr. Abbas as weakened by the Mecca agreement. A senior Israeli security official said the Saudis treated Mr. Abbas not so much as the Palestinian president, but as a leader of Fatah and an equal to the exiled Hamas political leader, Khaled Meshal.

The Israelis take the view that Mr. Abbas arrived at Mecca weakened by the recent fighting in the Gaza Strip, in which forces loyal to Hamas took over northern Gaza and large parts of Gaza City. Fatah forces did not collapse, but they did not defeat Hamas and were perceived as weaker.

In Gaza, a Hamas spokesman, Ismail Radwan, said Ms. Rice "did not succeed in pressuring President Abbas to withdraw from the unity government." He said Hamas "calls on the U.S. administration to respect the Palestinian people's will and recognize the government and open a dialogue with the government."

Rice's Mideast Talks Yield Little Except A Promise To Meet Again (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

JERUSALEM, Feb. 19 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Monday hosted talks between Israeli and Palestinian leaders on ways to build an independent Palestinian state, but the summit appeared to yield little but a pledge to meet again.

Rice's role was intended to signal her deepening commitment to helping resolve the conflict, but the talks demonstrated the difficulties ahead. Neither Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert nor Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas accompanied Rice when she met with reporters after more than two hours of talks.

The "useful and productive meeting" included discussion of the "diplomatic and political horizon" of creating a Palestinian state, Rice said, reading a statement issued in the name of the three officials. The two leaders requested "American participation and leadership in facilitating efforts to overcome obstacles, rally regional and international support and move forward toward peace," Rice said. "In that vein, I expect to return to the region soon."

Although Rice told reporters traveling with her that the two leaders spent "substantial time" discussing the contours of a Palestinian state, some Palestinian officials said Olmert had dismissed discussions about the future until immediate concerns were addressed, including the fate of an Israeli soldier who is being held prisoner in the Gaza Strip.

In any case, Rice acknowledged that a recent Palestinian unity deal, which will leave the militant Hamas group in power, had scaled back her ambitions.

"You could not have walked into that room and said, 'All right, let's talk about your views of the political and diplomatic horizon' " in the wake of the unity accord, which appears to fall short of international demands to recognize Israel, Rice told reporters. But she said there was "real value" in having the two leaders hash out their differences instead of communicating through the news media or surrogates.

In interviews, Palestinian officials were pessimistic about the prospects for talks. Israeli officials, meanwhile, appeared pleased that pressure that might have been exerted on them by the United States was deferred because of the uncertainty over the new Palestinian government.

A month ago, when the summit was announced, Rice hoped to demonstrate progress on moving toward a Palestinian state, but Abbas upended that ambition by unexpectedly agreeing to allow his moderate Fatah party to join a government led by Hamas, or the Islamic Resistance Movement. Abbas said he made the move to end the street battles between the two factions that had killed scores of Palestinians.

Rice had made several trips to Jerusalem in just over four months, in part to ensure a successful summit. She insisted on going ahead with the meeting despite Israeli misgivings, but the summit appears to have mostly devolved into a ground-level discussion on improving the lives of Palestinians. Senior U.S. officials, who confessed they had been surprised about Abbas's unity accord, generally were tight-lipped about the contents of the talks, except to say it was an opportunity to "clear the air."

In the end, Olmert and Abbas agreed only to hold another bilateral discussion on Palestinian movement and access -- but not on the creation of a separate negotiating track for a Palestinian state.

For the benefit of television cameras, Rice, Abbas and Olmert clasped hands and smiled politely as the meeting began. After about an hour of what Rice described as pro forma discussion of outstanding issues -- including the unity deal -- she moved the meeting up to her hotel suite, with its spectacular views of the Old City.

Palestinian officials said that given the tensions with Israel over the unity deal, the meeting would not have taken place if Rice had not insisted on . Israeli officials have said they would snub the new unity government, though after the meeting Olmert said he would continue to work with Abbas, who is an independently elected president.

The peace process has been nearly moribund for three years, as neither side has fulfilled initial steps outlined in a U.S.-backed peace plan. Rice hopes to jump-start peace talks by sketching what she calls a "political horizon" -- the outlines of a Palestinian state -- so that the Palestinian people will support Abbas in his effort to negotiate an agreement with the Israelis.

In theory, this marked the first time Israeli and Palestinian leaders have discussed the contours of a Palestinian state since the aborted peace talks brokered by President Bill Clinton in his waning days in office six years ago. Officials on all sides had striven to keep expectations low for the talks, saying this was only an informal meeting to help build momentum for a new peace process.

"We try to define it as confidence-building," said Olmert spokeswoman Miri Eisin. "You have to meet somebody and talk to him and see if you have confidence and trust each other and see if there is a sense that you can go forward."

Rice Calls Mideast Meeting 'Productive' (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

JERUSALEM — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice hosted an Israeli-Palestinian summit here Monday, but the session produced little beyond promises to uphold past agreements and meet again soon.

Rice characterized the three-way gathering with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas as "useful and productive," though her summary of the two-hour, 20-minute session was largely a checklist of commitments previously made by the two sides.

Rice billed the meeting as an opportunity for the two leaders to informally explore ways to restart peace talks after more than six years of conflict. She said they did some of that, but also discussed agreements that have not been fully met, such as the 2005 pact on borders aimed at further opening the Gaza Strip to the outside world.

Olmert and Abbas reaffirmed their support of the U.S.-backed diplomatic blueprint known as the "road map" and discussed how to begin reviving it, Rice said. The plan, which lays out a step-by-step path to an independent Palestinian state alongside Israel, has languished since it was unveiled in 2003 because neither side has fulfilled even initial commitments.

Rice said she planned to return to the region soon but did not say when. Olmert and Abbas plan to meet on their own before that.

"They reiterated their desire for American participation and leadership in facilitating efforts to overcome obstacles, rally regional and international support and move forward toward peace. In that vein, I expect to return to the region soon," Rice said in terse remarks after the session.

Olmert and Abbas did not accompany Rice in issuing the statement, and did not meet with the media separately.

No one on either side expected much from the summit, given the weakened political condition of both Olmert and Abbas. Hopes sank further in recent days because of confusion over plans for a Palestinian unity government in which Abbas' Fatah party is to join hands with the radical Hamas movement.

Abbas, a relative moderate, agreed to join a governing alliance with Hamas after months of factional violence that has left more than 100 Palestinians dead. Hamas, whose charter calls for Israel's destruction, has ruled alone since winning parliamentary elections early last year.

Abbas has justified the deal, reached two weeks ago in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, as a way to end the fighting between the rival Palestinian factions. He also hopes that creation of a unity government will end international limits on aid to the Palestinians imposed after Hamas came to power.

But Israel has threatened to snub the proposed government, as it has the Hamas administration, unless the government meets international demands to recognize the Jewish state, renounce violence and abide by past Israeli-Palestinian agreements. Israel also demands the release of a soldier captured last summer by Gaza-based militants.

Olmert said later Monday that Israel would work with Abbas, who was elected separately as Palestinian Authority president.

Rice has said the U.S. will not make a decision on whether to recognize the government until it is formed, but she indicated that it would have to meet the international conditions to gain U.S. acceptance.

The wording of the Mecca agreement appears to fall short of satisfying those demands, laid down last year by the so-called quartet of Middle East mediators: the U.S., European Union, Russia and United Nations. The Mecca pact promises only that the new government will "respect" international resolutions and past peace agreements; it does not clearly recognize Israel.

Rice did not provide details on the discussions. Olmert and Abbas also agreed to respect a cease-fire in place in the Gaza Strip since November, though it has been marred by occasional rocket attacks on Israel by Palestinian militants.

It was the second time Olmert and Abbas have met during the last two months. The prior summit, in December, produced only modest concessions by Israel.

Olmert promised to reduce the number of roadblocks in the West Bank and to transfer $100 million in taxes and customs revenues, part of the funds collected by Israel and withheld from the Palestinians since Hamas took power. The money was transferred last month, but Palestinians and Israeli rights groups say few roadblocks were cleared.

This time, Rice kept the agenda clear of those sorts of nuts-and-bolts issues. She said the purpose instead was to explore a "diplomatic and political horizon," meaning the possible outlines of a peace between the two sides and how to get there.

U.S. officials say that the prospects of a brighter future through peace talks could strengthen Palestinian moderates such as Abbas as a counterweight to Hamas. But in Monday's meeting, the leaders did not appear to have broached the issues likely to be the most difficult to resolve in reaching a final peace accord, such as borders, the status of Jerusalem and the fate of Palestinian refugees.

Monday's meeting took place in a luxury Israeli hotel overlooking Jerusalem's walled Old City. The three first met around a small table in a carpeted conference room, but after about an hour they relocated to Rice's suite to continue the discussions in a more relaxed setting.

Speaking with a group of reporters late Monday, Rice said the meeting was "enormously valuable" because it gave Olmert and Abbas a chance to talk during a delicate moment created by the formation of the Palestinian unity government.

"I frankly don't know how long it might have been before they would have talked with each other, were it not for the coincidence of this meeting having been scheduled," she said.

Olmert, Abbas Revive Peace Negotiations (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, February 20, 2007

JERUSALEM -- Israeli and Palestinian leaders sat down yesterday for the first comprehensive peace talks in six years and emerged with a promise to continue the negotiations in spite of daunting problems ahead.

The two-hour meeting, brokered by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, produced no immediate breakthroughs but will allow Washington to show its Arab allies it is working to resolve one of the region's toughest problems.

As expected, the summit was overshadowed by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' decision last week to form a coalition government with the militant group Hamas, which steadfastly refuses to renounce violence or recognize Israel.

"The real value here was that they sat down to talk with each other pretty early in this process," Miss Rice told reporters after the meeting at the luxurious David Citadel Hotel.

Given Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's reluctance to deal with any Palestinian government that includes Hamas, Miss Rice said, "I frankly don't know how long it might have been before they would have talked with each other were it not for the coincidence of this meeting having been scheduled."

A communique issued after the summit offered few details about the talks, which were described in diplomatic terms as "useful and productive." But Miss Rice said she would return to the region soon, and that the bilateral talks would continue in coming weeks.

Frustrated by years without progress on the U.S.-backed "road map" peace plan, Mr. Olmert and Mr. Abbas had agreed to begin discussing the political "horizon" -- an allusion to principles that would underpin any final peace deal.

But hopes for progress were dimmed by Mr. Abbas' Saudi-brokered unity government deal with Hamas, which failed even to acknowledge international demands that the Palestinian administration recognize Israel, renounce violence and honor past agreements.

The omission took the United States by surprise and led some Israelis to call for Mr. Olmert to boycott the meeting.

Nevertheless, Miss Rice said the two leaders had been able to air their concerns in a candid, respectful atmosphere. The three stepped onto a balcony at one point to view the Old City together and later shared lunch with aides and ministers.

Mr. Olmert reassured members of his Kadima party afterward that there would be no easing of the three international demands. "We would not recognize any government that won't meet these obligations, and we won't cooperate with such a government or its ministers," he said.

But he said Israel would continue to be in contact with the Palestinian Authority to ease humanitarian conditions and to coordinate the fight against terrorist groups. The Palestinian territories have been hard hit by a cutoff in international aid since Hamas formed a government last February.

Mr. Abbas reportedly appealed to the U.S. and Israel to withhold judgment on the new Palestinian government. The Palestinians have argued that Hamas' agreement to sit in a unity government while Mr. Abbas negotiates peace with Israel marks an important evolution among the Islamic militants.

Any progress on final status talks, which would boost Palestinian confidence in negotiations, is thought to strengthen Mr. Abbas in his power struggle with Hamas.

"We view this meeting as a beginning and not an end," said Palestinian spokesman Saeb Erekat. "The meeting was not supposed to wave a magic wand to solve all the problems."

The summit also helps the Bush administration to show its Arab allies that it is doing its best to bring the sides together. Miss Rice said last month she had gotten the message "loud and clear" that Washington had to do more to encourage talks between the Israelis and Palestinians.

The sides last talked about peace in 2001 during the final days of the Clinton administration and the beginning of the Palestinian uprising.

The U.S. introduced the road map near the peak of the violence in mid-2003, but the Israelis and Palestinians alike failed to follow through on the series of parallel confidence-building measures.

Some observers say that after six years without talks, a mere return to continuing negotiations would be a significant achievement.

"If there is good will and there is a confidence-building process, we might not reach a comprehensive peace, but we could get back on track," said Mohammed Dajani, a political science professor at Al Quds University.

"At least the present administration could take the credit for going from a state of confrontation and violence to dialogue."

Middle East Talks End Without Progress (FT)

By Harvey Morris

Financial Times, February 20, 2007

A meeting that Israeli and Palestinian leaders held on Monday with Condoleezza Rice, the US secretary of state, matched its low expectations when they agreed on little more substantial than a willingness to meet again.

After talks with Ehud Olmert, the Israeli prime minister, and Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority president, that lasted just over two hours, Ms Rice said the three affirmed their commitment to a two-state solution of the Middle East conflict.

Ms Rice read a prepared statement in which she said the meeting had been useful and productive, but neither she nor her interlocutors offered any further comment on what had originally been billed as the forum for a possible breakthrough.

Against the background of Mr Abbas's deal to create a national unity government with the ruling Hamas party – regarded by Washington as a terrorist organisation – earlier hopes that the meeting would dramatically jump-start the stalled peace process had already faded.

"You are seeing a lot of expectations managed by a lot of weak leaders," said a Palestinian official. "So, in that sense, everyone got what they wanted."

The primary purpose of the accord between Hamas and Mr Abbas's Fatah was to avert further conflict among their warring militias. Its second aim of persuading international donors to lift a ban on direct aid to the PA looks unlikely to be fulfilled in the short term.

Monday's statement noted that the Middle East Quartet – the US, European Union, United Nations and Russia – required any PA government to recognise Israel, commit itself to non-violence and accept previous agreements, including those relating to the Quartet's own "road map".

Neither the US nor Israel believes the Mecca accord, in which Hamas agreed to "respect" existing agreements with Israel, went far enough.

Ismail Haniyeh, the Hamas prime minister who resigned along with his cabinet last week, has up to five weeks to form a government in which Fatah and independents will share power.

Pointing to positive aspects of Monday's meeting, Palestinian officials noted that the Israeli government appeared ready to maintain its relations with Mr Abbas despite his embrace of Hamas. He and Mr Olmert are to meet again soon, the statement added.

Some suggested this might allow for the emergence of a less high-profile negotiating track, which Mr Abbas was known to prefer.

Ms Rice said she would return to the region soon but gave no date for a further tripartite meeting. "That's a tool that everybody can pick up and use when everybody thinks it's useful to do it," Sean McCormack, state department spokesman, said.

Slow Start To New US Bid For Israeli-Palestinian Peace (CSM)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Christian Science Monitor, February 20, 2007

JERUSALEM

DOJ_NMG_0133735

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice held a summit with Israeli and Palestinian leaders Monday in a bid to reenergize the stalled peace process.

The trilateral talks with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas fell short of any significant progress, but marked the first time in six years that the sides have discussed a two-state solution face to face.

The summit also devoted time to discussing Mr. Abbas's controversial "unity" government agreement with the Palestinian militant group Hamas.

The US wanted the sides to start hashing out a political "horizon," an allusion to the principles for a final peace deal. But Abbas's new partnership with Hamas in some ways brings the sides back to square one, forcing them to focus on the Islamic militants' refusal to recognize Israel, accept peace agreements, or renounce violence.

These talks, which are the most significant US push for peace since the introduction of the "road map" peace plan in 2003, came at a time of uncertainty regarding the character of a Hamas-Fatah unity government that was agreed to earlier this month in the Muslim holy city of Mecca, Saudi Arabia.

The Quartet – the US, United Nations, European Union, and Russia – has demanded that any Palestinian government recognize Israel, accept previous peace deals, and renounce violence, but the Hamas-Fatah unity government deal in Mecca only pledges to "respect" past peace agreements.

Inconclusive talks, vague language

The vague language of the summit communiqué reflected the awkward effort to restart negotiations for the first time since President Bush took office: "The President and the Prime Minister discussed their views of the diplomatic and political horizon and how it might unfold toward the two-state vision of President Bush."

Describing the two-hour meeting as "useful and productive," Ms. Rice said that she expects to return to the region soon, and that both she and Mr. Olmert had agreed to meet each other soon. A State Department official said there are no plans for another three-way meeting.

While Olmert and Rice are waiting for the formation of the new unity government before passing judgment, they have both said that Quartet demands must form the foundation of any peace process.

"It simply can't be the case that a political horizon can be built on a basis where one of the parties doesn't accept the right of the other to exist," she told reporters on Monday. "I haven't seen anything to date that suggests that this is a government that's going to meet the Quartet's principles."

Serious questions about the peace process

There are difficulties on the Israeli side as well.

With Olmert dogged by low public-approval ratings following Israel's stymied war effort in Lebanon over the summer, it is questionable whether Olmert himself would have the public backing to negotiate a final peace deal.

"[The talks] seemed to be pretty inconclusive, as expected. Judging by what we heard, they didn't seem to decide anything. A lot will depend on how [the new Palestinian 'unity' government] is formed," says Yossi Alpher, the co-editor of the Arab-Israeli opinion website www.bitterlemons.org.

"Given Abbas's weakness, and given Olmert's weakness, and given the low energy level of what the [Bush] administration is ready to invest, there's no peace process there," says Mr. Alpher.

Despite the inconclusive results of the meeting, the analyst says that the summit helps the US demonstrate to its Arab allies that it is doing its best to prod the sides back to the negotiating table. The Bush administration has been accused of not being proactive enough to encourage talks between Israelis and Palestinians.

Israelis and Palestinians last negotiated a peace treaty in 2001, in the waning days of the Clinton administration and the early days of the Palestinian uprising.

The US introduced the "road map" peace initiative near the peak of the violence in mid-2003, but it quickly lost steam as Israelis and Palestinians failed to follow through on parallel confidence-building measures that were conditions for restarting political negotiations.

With less than two years left in Bush's tenure, it is unclear whether there is enough time for his administration to see the peace process through to a final agreement.

But some observers say that after six years of no talks, a return to consistent negotiations would be a significant achievement.

"If there is good will and a confidence-building process, we might not reach a comprehensive peace, but we could get back on track," says Mohammed Dejani, a political science professor at Al Quds University in Jerusalem. "At least the present administration could take the credit for going from a state of confrontation and violence to dialogue."

Mideast Summit Ends With Little Progress (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, February 20, 2007

A Mideast peace summit designed to open a new chapter for Israelis and Palestinians fed up with violence concluded Monday with no new agreements and a pledge to keep talking.

The United States, which had pushed for the session, said it was an accomplishment merely to hold such a get together for the first time in six years. After two hours of talks with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice stood alone in a bare-bones hotel function room to call the session "useful and productive."

The prospect of any immediate success here essentially was hijacked by Abbas' surprise announcement last week that he will govern hand-in-hand with the militant group Hamas. The United States and Israel list Hamas as a terrorist group and refuse all dealings with the group.

Speaking to reporters, Rice said the meeting was particularly valuable, however, in light of the lingering uncertainties over Abbas' pact with Hamas.

"I think the real value here is that they sat down to talk with each other pretty early in this process," Rice said.

"I could have made the decision that, well, I'll just wait until this all sorts out," Rice said, but she said that could have created new obstacles. "We thought it would be best to go ahead," the secretary added.

Neither Rice nor other U.S. officials would describe the content of the session, although Israeli and Palestinian officials offered some details.

Olmert said he and Abbas agreed to maintain an open channel of communication, focused both on improving the lives of Palestinians and stopping terrorism.

"What we have heard today has nothing to do with a partnership," said Mohammed Dahlan, an Abbas confidant.

"Abu Mazen is determined to go ahead with this national unity government. There is no backing down," Dahlan said.

Abbas has said that the deal brokered by Saudi Arabia is the best one he could get from Hamas, and that he would move ahead with forming a coalition. The power-sharing deal is seen as crucial to halting internal Palestinian fighting that has killed more than 130 since May.

Abbas and Olmert also discussed possibly extending a 3-month-old cease-fire covering the Gaza Strip to include the West Bank, said Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat.

Hamas spokesman Ismail Radwan called Monday's summit a failure.

"Rice did not succeed in pressuring President Abbas to withdraw from the unity government. We call on the U.S. administration to respect the Palestinian people's will and recognize the government and open a dialogue with the government," he said.

A senior State Department official, speaking on condition of anonymity to describe the closed-door session, said it was an "an irreplaceable opportunity to clear the air."

Meanwhile, Israeli police arrested three protesters who managed to enter the floor of the Jerusalem hotel where Rice is staying, a spokesman said.

The three entered the hotel, climbed the stairs to the floor where Rice is staying and shouted before they were stopped by bodyguards, police spokesman Micky Rosenfeld said. They called on the United States to free Jonathan Pollard, an American who is serving a life term in the United States for spying for Israel.

Israeli police arrested the three before they got very close to Rice's room, Rosenfeld said. It was not clear if Rice was in the room at the time, he said.

The three-way meeting was planned before Abbas made his pact with Hamas. The gathering was meant to offer weary Palestinians a brighter vision for their future by opening a discussion of the contours of an eventual Palestinian state.

It also was a way to strengthen Abbas in his power struggle with Hamas, which surprised the Bush administration by defeating Abbas' secular Fatah Party in elections 13 months ago.

Although U.S. officials brush off any suggestion the pact has tainted Abbas, diplomats have not hidden their displeasure with both the content and timing of the deal he made.

Both the United States and Israel have said they will continue to deal with Abbas, although it is unclear how much authority he will command in the new government.

The Bush administration resisted the troubled Israeli-Palestinian negotiations during Bush's first term, but is displaying a new interest in the old problem. Rice said she understands that the United States plays a crucial role as host and prod, U.S. officials said.

The Hamas deal shifted the ground for talks, but Abbas and Olmert agreed to meet separately soon and Rice said she will return quickly.

There is no set date for another three-way meeting.

"That's a tool that everybody can pick up and use when everybody thinks its useful to do it," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said following the meeting.

All sides had low expectations for Monday's three-way session, even before last week's announcement. The session was billed as a baby step to build confidence between two sides estranged by historic grievances and years of low-level fighting.

The session got off to a lackluster start, with Rice, Abbas and Olmert clasping hands together and flashing polite smiles for the cameras in a spare hotel conference room.

The three met without any aides, except for Rice's Arabic interpreter, officials said.

After about an hour, they moved to Rice's suite overlooking Jerusalem's Old City, continuing talks for another hour in a more comfortable setting. At one point the group walked onto Rice's balcony, each with a view of some of the most revered and disputed real estate in the world.

Many of the core questions that frame the hoped-for destination — an independent Palestine alongside Israel — apparently would not be on the table Monday. Those include the borders and the fate of disputed areas of Jerusalem.

A third or more of the session was devoted to discussion of the planned coalition government.

Rice Meets Mideast Leaders But Little Progress (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, February 20, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice held a rare summit with Israeli and Palestinian leaders but achieved little concrete progress in reviving the peace process other than a pledge for further talks.

Rice said all sides had discussed a future Palestinian state at the first such meeting in nearly four years, but warned that peace would not come through terror, in a clear reference to the dominant Islamist movement Hamas.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas agreed to meet again "soon," Rice said, adding that she also planned to return to the region to pursue peace efforts.

Hopes of a breakthrough in Middle East peacemaking have been complicated by a deal between Abbas and Hamas -- blacklisted by the West as a terrorist group -- to form a unity government in a bid to end a crippling aid boycott.

After the talks, Olmert insisted Israel would not cooperate with any government that did not meet international demands for peace, while Hamas lashed out at what it labelled US isolationism and "blackmail".

Ismail Haniya, the head of the outgoing Hamas-dominated cabinet who will also lead the new unity administration, said he "regretted that the American administration always behaves according to the logic of isolation and boycott which has proved to be a failure".

Abbas's office announced that the president would head to Britain, Germany and France later in the week to press for a more welcoming approach to the new government from the European Union.

"All three of us affirmed our commitment to a two-state solution, agreed that a Palestinian state cannot be born of violence and terror, and reiterated our acceptance of previous agreements and obligations, including the roadmap," Rice said after more than two-and-a-half hours of talks in a Jerusalem hotel.

Monday's meeting was the first of its kind since 2003 when Rice's predecessor, Colin Powell, met Olmert's predecessor, Ariel Sharon and Abbas, then Palestinian prime minister.

Rice denied it had been thin on outcome.

"I certainly think that it had a confidence-building outcome because, again, this is a period of considerable uncertainty and I'm not sure when they would have sat down to try to come to terms with some of those uncertainties, to try to get answers to each others' questions," she said.

A senior US official said the Israeli and Palestinian leaders had agreed to meet again within weeks. But Rice's visit, her 10th to Jerusalem as secretary of state and her fourth in just five months, comes with both Olmert and Abbas weakened by political struggles at home.

Rice said they had discussed the long-standing international demands of the Palestinian government, as Fatah and Hamas work to form a unity cabinet they hope will lead to a resumption of desperately needed Western funding.

"The president and prime minister also discussed issues arising from the agreement for the formation of a Palestinian national unity government and the position of the Quartet that any Palestinian Authority government must be committed to non-violence, recognition of Israel and acceptance of previous agreements and obligations, including regarding the roadmap," she said.

The European Union, Israel and the United States have insisted the new government meet the three conditions in exchange for ending their boycott.

While Abbas says the new unity government will honour existing agreements with Israel, implicitly recognising the Jewish state, Washington has remained publicly non-committal and Israel has rejected the deal outright.

Olmert said Israel would not work with a Palestinian government that snubbed the conditions but that he would maintain contact with Abbas.

"We will not recognize any government that does not honour these commitments. Neither will we cooperate with it or its ministers," he told a meeting of his centrist Kadima party.

Abbas's spokesman Nabil Abu Rudeina said the Palestinian president would travel to London Wednesday, Berlin Thursday and Paris Friday "in a bid to end the siege imposed on the Palestinian people and explain the Mecca agreement" which set the framework for the new unity government.

Palestinian chief negotiator Saeb Erakat said Abbas insisted the new cabinet should be judged on having recognized his authority to negotiate with Israel.

Old Foes Join In Anger Over India Train Bombing (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

DIWANA, India, Feb. 19 — A day after two homemade bombs killed at least 66 people on a train traveling to Pakistan from India, the governments of both countries on Monday condemned the attack and pledged that it would not deter their aim of reducing longstanding hostilities on the subcontinent.

The office of Manmohan Singh, the Indian prime minister, on Monday morning called the bombing “an act of terror” and promised to apprehend those responsible. Pakistan also denounced the attack, which occurred on the eve of a visit by Khurshid Mehmood Kasuri, the Pakistani foreign minister, to the Indian capital, New Delhi, and two weeks before officials from both countries were to meet for the first time to share information on terrorism-related activities.

The train had ferried more than 600 passengers from Delhi to the India-Pakistan border. The bombs exploded just after midnight Sunday, trapping slumbering passengers aboard the Attari Express in flames. By early Monday, when the bodies were pulled from train, they were so severely burned it was difficult to tell who they were, let alone whether they were Indian or Pakistani.

All told, 66 bodies were taken out of two burned-out compartments; 13 survivors somehow escaped, including an infant and Kamruddin, 60, a small thin man from Multan, Pakistan, who thanked God as an ambulance carried him to an Indian government hospital in New Delhi on Monday. Kamruddin recalled making his way to the door of his coach and having someone pull him out.

Twelve hours later, the two coaches were still smoldering.

Peace talks between India and Pakistan have crawled along for three years, yielding little more than an accord on transportation links like the Attari Express. The two last stepped close to the brink of war in early 2002. They have fought each other in three wars since independence from British rule in 1947.

"This is an act of sabotage," Laloo Prasad Yadav, the Indian railroad minister, told reporters in the eastern city of Patna, according to wire service reports. "This is an attempt to derail the improving relationship between India and Pakistan."

In a statement reported by [a news agency], Gen. Pervez Musharraf, the Pakistani president, said, "We will not allow elements which want to sabotage the ongoing peace process to succeed in their nefarious designs."

The overnight train, en route from Delhi to the border post at Attari, began service 30 years ago, and after a two-year suspension at a time of acute enmity between India and Pakistan, resumed service in January 2004. From Attari, passengers board a second train, which takes them to Lahore, Pakistan.

The explosions occurred when the train had advanced about a mile from Diwana, a tiny station here surrounded by fields of wheat.

Three other bombs were found in the train's other coaches, according to police and railroad officials; a police officer at the scene said he saw a suitcase packed with eight to nine bottles filled with an unknown liquid, along with a plastic detonator.

V. K. Duggal, the home secretary, told reporters that sulfur and kerosene had probably been used.

Mr. Yadav, the railroad minister, said Monday evening that one person had been detained in connection with the blasts, according to [a news agency], but offered no further details.

Navtej Sarna, a spokesman for the Indian Ministry of External Affairs, told reporters that visas would be issued to Pakistani relatives of those who were feared dead. On Monday afternoon, police officers worked in the sun to identify victims at the main government hospital in Panipat, the nearest city to the site of the explosions, recording the remnants they had found: singed passports, a wallet, a key.

The attack occurred almost exactly five years after a fire on a train killed 59 Hindu pilgrims in Gujarat State, in western India, setting off some of the worst communal carnage in India's history, in which at least 1,100 people were killed, mostly Muslims. Last July, a series of synchronized bombs went off on commuter trains in Mumbai, India's largest city, killing about 180 people.

In the attack on Sunday, bombs went off inside two coaches, toward the back of the train, shortly after it left Diwana at 11:53 p.m., two officials at the station said. By the time the first fire trucks arrived, the two coaches were ablaze, and the air smelled of burning plastic and flesh, according to B. D. Ahuja, the fire station officer at Panipat.

Satya Narain Sharma, a firefighter who was among the first to reach the scene at 12:10 a.m. said that when fire crews tried to pry open the first door, it did not budge. Later, they found behind it a pile of bodies, all apparently passengers trying to escape. They found a second door open and began pulling out the dead. Muhammad Wasim Khan said his uncle, Shaffiq Ahmed Khan, from Karachi, was among the dead. Shaffiq Ahmed Khan and his sons, Aarish, 15, and Sammy, 9, had come to visit relatives in Delhi. They stayed for a month and began to make their way home on Sunday night, their bags stuffed with gifts: clothes, fancy soap and packets of Rajanigandha-brand paan masala, a North Indian mouth-freshener. They stuffed their money into their shoes, relatives said, so it would not be taken by the police along the way.

On Sunday night, Muhammad Wasim Khan settled them into the fourth coach from the back, and waved goodbye from the platform. The next afternoon, he found his uncle's body at the hospital in Panipat. He recognized him by the brown coat he wore, and the money stuffed inside his shoes. His face was burned beyond recognition. The two boys had been admitted to Safdarjung Hospital in New Delhi.

At the Old Delhi railroad station, distraught friends and relatives began gathering before dawn to learn who had been killed and who had escaped alive, but at the emergency assistance booth on Platform 15, officials had little information.

Mohammad Aslam, a bangle manufacturer, who accompanied five of his cousins to the train on Sunday night, said his repeated requests for information were brushed off by station staff members. "They keep saying 'How can we give you information when we know nothing ourselves?' " he said.

He said there had been no security searches before passengers boarded the train. Nodding toward the row of police officers searching people at the entrance to the station, opening suitcases and checking handbags, he said, "None of that was there yesterday."

Moscow Warns Neighbours Over US Shield (FT)

By Neil Buckley, Jan Cienski And Hugh Williamson

Financial Times, February 20, 2007

Poland and the Czech Republic could be targeted by Russian missiles if they host elements of the planned US missile defence system, the commander of Russia's strategic missile forces warned on Monday.

The warning came as both Warsaw and Prague signalled they were likely to respond positively to US requests for them to host anti-missile defence bases.

Germany also on Monday expressed concern about the stand-off over the missile defence project, with Frank-Walter Steinmeier, foreign minister, criticising the US and Nato for not addressing Russia's worries over the system earlier. Russia continued to make clear its deep opposition to the system as General Nikolai Solovtsov warned that basing parts of it in eastern Europe risked undermining strategic stability.

"If the governments of Poland, the Czech Republic and other countries make this decision . . . [Russia's] strategic missile troops will be able to target those facilities," he said.

His comments come after criticisms of the project by Vladimir Putin, Russian president. General Yuri Baluyevsky, chief of the Russian army, has warned that Moscow might withdraw from the 1987 Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces treaty unless the US dropped its plans. The strategic missile forces commander echoed that threat yesterday, saying Russia could resume production of medium-range missiles within five or six years.

"We have all the documents, we have the technology, especially as the missiles used to be produced by existing enterprises.

Therefore resuming production, provided there are relevant decisions, will be easy enough," Gen Solovtsov said.

During a visit to Warsaw on Monday, Mirek Topolanek, the Czech prime minister, said Poland and the Czech Republic would have to undertake a large communication effort to explain the programme to Russia as well as to Germany and France – and to their own populations.

But he said it was "naïve" to suppose that the US had not consulted Russia over the project. Jaroslaw Kaczynski, his Polish counterpart, said the shield was "not aimed at any normal country".

"We will attempt to persuade the Russians that which is obvious and which they of course realise, that this is in no way an installation directed at them," he said.

Mr Kaczynski said: "We are jointly deeply convinced that important decisions concerning the security and future of our countries and Europe have to be taken – I'm speaking here of the shield."

The US state department did not comment on the Russian threat but said the defensive system it was developing with the Czech and Polish governments was in no way targeted at Russia.

"We have offered to co-operate with Russia on missile defence. We think we face a common set of threats emanating from the Middle East as well as other areas," a spokesman said.

Russia has dismissed US arguments that the shield – with tracking radar in the Czech Republic and missiles in Poland – is designed to allow Europe and the eastern US to intercept missiles launched from rogue nations in the Middle East.

Mr Steinmeier said in a newspaper interview: "Because the sites for the stationing [of the missile defence system] are quite near Russia, one should have talked about it with Russia beforehand."

Henning Riecke, security expert at Berlin's DGAP foreign affairs institute, said it was clear to the German government that Russia was not threatened by the proposed defence system, but Berlin was keen to maintain stable relations with Moscow.

Ex-allies Warned On Anti-missile Defense Plan (WT/AP)

By Vladimir Isachenkov

The Washington Times, February 20, 2007

MOSCOW -- Poland and the Czech Republic risk being targeted by Russian missiles if they agree to host a proposed U.S. missile defense system, a top Russian general warned yesterday.

Russia has been increasingly bellicose in its response to the U.S. proposal to build the missile defense system in Eastern Europe. President Vladimir Putin has said he does not trust U.S. explanations that the system would protect the American East Coast and Europe from any missiles launched by "rogue nations" in the Middle East.

Gen. Nikolai Solovtsov, head of Russia's missile forces, said the system would upset strategic stability. It would be the first such site in Europe.

"If the governments of Poland and the Czech Republic take such a step ... the Strategic Missile Forces will be capable of targeting these facilities if a relevant decision is made," he said.

Also yesterday, Czech Prime Minister Mirek Topolanek said his country and Poland were in favor of the U.S. missile defense proposal.

"I think it is in our joint interest to negotiate this initiative and to build in our area the missile defense," Mr. Topolanek said after talks in Warsaw with Polish Prime Minister Jaroslaw Kaczynski.

The bases in Poland and the Czech Republic would be designed to intercept missiles being developed by Iran, U.S. Air Force Lt. Gen. Henry A. Obering, director of the Missile Defense Agency, said last month. Two other bases in Alaska and California would protect the United States from threats from North Korea, Gen. Obering said.

Mr. Kaczynski brushed aside Russia's fears, saying, "The missile defense is not directed against any normal state.

"Any statement suggesting that the missile defense would change the alignment of forces in Europe is a misunderstanding," he said. "This truth is being conveyed to our partners in the West and the East."

State Department spokesman Edgar Vasquez said the United States has worked closely with the Czech and Polish governments to develop the missile defense system and that it was in no way directed at Russia.

"We have offered to cooperate with Russia on missile defense because we believe we face a common threat emanating from the Middle East as well as other areas," Mr. Vasquez said.

Gen. Solovtsov said he was concerned that the United States, which plans to deploy 10 interceptors in Poland, could boost those numbers in the future.

The general also said it would take Russia less than six years to build upgraded medium-range missiles if Moscow decided to pull out of a 1987 agreement with the United States that bans their deployment.

"It is not difficult to restore their production," Gen. Solovtsov said at a press conference. "The missiles were dismantled, but the production technology has remained."

Russian military officials have said Moscow's decision to pull out of the Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces Treaty would depend on whether the United States goes ahead with the missile defense plan.

The agreement was negotiated by Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev and President Reagan.

Our Strange Devotion To The Kremlin (WP)

"I have a difficult time explaining that speech. It doesn't accord with either the world as we see it nor with the character of our interactions with the Russians."

-- Condoleezza Rice, Feb. 15

Ten days have passed since the Russian president, Vladimir Putin, made a speech in Munich accusing the United States of plunging the planet into "an abyss of permanent conflicts," of deliberately encouraging the spread of weapons of mass destruction, and (this from a country that regularly blackmails and manipulates its neighbors) of having "overstepped its national borders in every way." During that time, the American secretary of state -- quoted above -- has not been alone in expressing surprise. With varying degrees of shock, commentators and politicians have speculated about the significance of Putin's "new" language, wondering whether it means Russia's road to democracy has reached a fork, whether Putin was really speaking to his domestic audience or whether the speech heralded some kind of policy change.

In fact, the only thing continually surprising about President Putin is the surprise itself. For we have long known a great deal about Putin, about his biography -- his time as a KGB officer in East Germany, his years in the government of St. Petersburg -- and about his personal philosophy, too. We have long known, for example, that he is a great admirer of Yuri Andropov, the former Soviet leader best remembered for his belief that "order and discipline," as defined by the KGB, would revive the weakened Soviet Union of the 1980s. Way back in 1999, Putin went so far as to dedicate a plaque to Andropov in a corner of the Lubyanka, once the headquarters of the KGB as well as its most notorious political prison.

Since then, Putin has not ceased emulating many of the methods of the Andropov-era KGB, including its paranoid suspicion of America. He continues to treat all Western organizations in Russia, whatever their purpose, as "spies and diversionaries." He has used Russian television -- all state-owned or state-influenced -- to portray the recent mysterious deaths of his critics, including one by polonium poisoning, as part of a nefarious Western plot to discredit his government. In the wake of the 2004 Beslan school massacre, he hinted that American support for Chechen terrorists was to blame. I myself have heard that claim repeated in Moscow more than once.

Nevertheless, we were surprised, are surprised and apparently always will be surprised by Putin, just as we were surprised by Yeltsin before him and Gorbachev before that. Despite Putin's background and his well-known views, President Bush from the beginning of his term treated Putin the way all American presidents treat all Russian leaders: as America's new best friends. Bush, infamously, looked deep into Putin's eyes, found him to be " straightforward and trustworthy" and invited him to his ranch.

Not so many years earlier, when President Boris Yeltsin was up for reelection, President Bill Clinton told his main Soviet adviser, Strobe Talbott, that "I want this guy to win so bad it hurts." Never mind that inside Russia, Yeltsin was already associated with massive theft and economic chaos, or that his regime was perceived internally as corrupt and nepotistic: The American president went out of his way to visit Moscow during the campaign, just to make sure Yeltsin won.

It is, if you think about it, an odd phenomenon. After all, American presidents generally don't campaign on behalf of their French counterparts or look deep into the eyes of German chancellors in order to divine their true natures. While at times very friendly, neither Clinton nor Bush seems to have felt a mystical connection to British Prime Minister Tony Blair.

Yet Russian politicians still seem to make American politicians grow starry-eyed and lose their bearings. Perhaps it's a secret longing for the glamour of those Cold War summits, for the days when it seemed as if the personal relations between superpower statesmen could ward off the destruction of the entire planet. Or perhaps they put something in the vodka -- sorry, mineral water -- at those elegant Kremlin lunches.

Either way, it's time to kick the habit. True, it is perfectly possible that whoever leads Russia after Putin steps down (if Putin steps down) will be a nicer, friendlier person. It is perfectly possible that we will find areas of cooperation with him, just as we sometimes do with Putin. But however friendly and cooperative, however much a "democrat" he appears to be, I hope we'll avoid the instant professions of eternal friendship. At the very least, we'll avoid being unpleasantly surprised, yet again, if things turn out otherwise.

US And EU Trade Zone Gathers Pace (FT)

By Andrew Bounds In Brussels

Financial Times, February 20, 2007

The US and European Union could set a date for the creation of a transatlantic trading zone at a summit in April, diplomats say.

The idea of harmonising rules and regulations between the world's biggest economies to boost growth has gathered momentum since Angela Merkel, German chancellor, embraced it in January.

DOJ_NMG_0133743

Both sides have taken up the so-called Merkel initiative as a way of re-invigorating the partnership after tension over Iraq and the Doha trade round.

Boyden Gray, US ambassador to the EU, said: "The political commitment is there from the president and members of his cabinet. It is a great opportunity."

Mr Gray said it was likely the objective would be set at the summit but stressed that more work was needed on how it would be achieved.

"There are political and structural problems. You have to set up a mechanism involving members of Congress and the European parliament. It has to outlive individual presidents and committee chairmen. It will take a long time."

John Bruton, EU ambassador to the US, last week said involving the US Congress. which jealously guards its regulatory powers, would be key but the goal was vital. "New models of motor cars have to be crashed twice, once to comply with the EU standard and again to comply with the US standard.

"We simply cannot afford to load more costs on the shoulders of our customers, or place more restrictions in the way of our businesses, if we are to beat our global competitors."

There are panels of technocrats from both sides, but Mr Bruton said they would make swift progress only if politicians set targets. "All regulations ultimately have a political source," he said.

Some people compare the Merkel initiative with the creation of the EU single market, which existed on paper for decades before becoming a reality. It was only after EU leaders set a timetable for action that barriers began to fall.

Bob Bennett, a US Republican senator, will on Thursday meet José Manuel Barroso, Commission president, and hand over a timetable to conclude talks by 2015.

The report, prepared for legislators of the Transatlantic Policy Network by Bruce Stokes of the German Marshall Fund and seen by the Financial Times, calls for studies on how to tackle each sector and then a two-step process to implement the market.

From 2007-10 negotiators should aim to harmonise accounting standards, chemicals regulations, customs co-operation, healthcare records and sign an open skies air transport deal.

From 2011-15 they would tackle such sensitive areas as entry requirements, capital market regulation and cargo. Many of these have been complicated by US security concerns.

The trade departments of the EU and US remain sceptical of concluding a deal. Peter Mandelson, EU trade commissioner, while welcoming the initiative, said recently: "It is going to take a great deal of effort and may not be possible."

Rugs to riches

Afghanistan's ambassador is hoping that the ancient art of rug weaving will help spur development in his Central Asian nation, which is struggling with Taliban terrorism and donor fatigue from nations that have so far failed to put up the money to match their aid promises.

"Afghan rugs connect you to thousands of years of history, a group of talented artists halfway around the world, and a reconstruction process that is helping millions of people find security, prosperity, education and new hope," Ambassador Said T. Jawad said at a recent exhibit of Afghan rugs in Atlanta.

"Afghanistan's rug trade is at least 1,000 years old. The Silk Road and Afghanistan were the nexus of civilizations, knowledge and trade, stretching from Spain to China. Today, Afghan rugs are regaining their fame and recognition for excellent value, superb quality, rich colors and unique patterns."

The exhibit, attended by top U.S. officials, attracted wealthy investors who bought nearly all of the rugs on display.

David Sampson, U.S. deputy commerce secretary, noted that the exhibition was a "smart step" toward the goal of promoting Afghanistan's traditional rug industry, which generates $50 million in annual exports.

DOJ_NMG_0133744

Mr. Jawad urged buyers to help Afghanistan's economy by investing in its arts and crafts, which have tax-free access to the U.S. market. He noted that his country is trying to recover from 30 years of conflict -- from the Soviet invasion in 1979 to the resurgent threat from the extremist Taliban, trying to regain power after the United States overthrew them in 2001 for sheltering Osama bin Laden and his al Qaeda terrorist network.

"You are helping millions of women and families struggling to recover from three decades of war and despair," the ambassador said.

"Afghans are grateful for your support and assistance and the sacrifices of your soldiers fighting to defend freedom in Afghanistan, here in the U.S. and all over the world. They are all heroes."

Darfur dispute

Andrew Natsios, the special U.S. envoy to Sudan, angered the Africa Action network by dismissing the term "genocide" in connection with the humanitarian crisis in the Darfur region of the African nation.

Mr. Natsios earlier this month told an audience at Georgetown University, "The term 'genocide' is counter to the facts of what is really occurring in Darfur."

Nii Akuetteh, executive director the Washington-based advocacy group, said Sudan clearly intends to destroy communities of black African farmers through proxy Arab militias.

"Natsios' declaration that genocide is no longer occurring in Darfur denies the reality on the ground and conflicts with numerous statements from the White House and State Department over the past two years," Mr. Akuetteh said.

"This is more than a semantic change. Natsios' claim represents a calculated attempt to re-characterize the crisis, undermine its urgency and obviate the need for new U.S. action to address it."

In an interview last week, however, Mr. Natsios re-emphasized the threat posed by the militias to more than 2.5 million refugees displaced since 2003, when so-called Janjaweed militias began slaughtering civilians and burning villages in response to anti-government rebel attacks.

Mr. Natsios told the [a] news agency that the Sudanese government has "lost control" in Darfur.

"There is anarchy in Darfur. The risk is that if the [nongovernmental organizations] leave, the U.N. humanitarian agencies leave, there will be no one to care for these people in the camps who can be trusted," he said.

"There is a potential for an explosion if the agencies leave that would match the risk" to the local population that occurred in 2003 and 2004, Mr. Natsios said.

The result "would be a blood bath," he warned.

The conflict has claimed between 300,000 and 400,000 lives.

Let's Start A War, One We Can Win (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

AFETA, Ethiopia

They were two old men, one arriving by motorcade with bodyguards and the other groping blindly as he shuffled on a footpath with a stick, but for a moment the orbits of Jimmy Carter and Mekonnen Leka intersected on this remote battlefield in southern Ethiopia.

Mr. Mekonnen, who thinks he may be 78, is a patient in Mr. Carter's war on river blindness. He is so blind that he rarely leaves the house any more, but on this occasion he staggered to the village clinic to get a treatment for the worms inside him.

His skin is mottled because the worms cause ferocious itching, especially when they become more active at night. He and other victims scratch until they are bloodied and their skin is partly worn away. Ultimately the worms travel to the eye, where they often destroy the victim's sight.

Ethiopia has the largest proportion of blind people in the world, 1.2 percent, because of the combined effects of river blindness and trachoma. As in many African countries, the wrenching emblem of poverty is a tiny child leading a blind beggar by a stick.

As Mr. Mekonnen waited on a bench by the clinic, there was a flurry of activity, and an Ethiopian announced in the Amharic language that "a great elder" had arrived. Then Mr. Mekonnen heard voices speaking a foreign language and a clicking of cameras, and finally the whirlwind around Mr. Carter moved on.

"Do you know who that was?" I asked Mr. Mekonnen.

"I couldn't see," he replied.

"Have you ever heard of Jimmy Carter?"

"No."

Yet in remote places like this, former President Carter, at 82, is leading a private war on disease that should inspire and shame President Bush and other world leaders into joining. It's not just that Mr. Carter's wars have been more successful than Mr. Bush's; Mr. Carter is also rehabilitating the image of the U.S. abroad and transforming the lives of the world's most wretched peoples. (For a video of Mr. Carter's trip, please go to www.nytimes.com/ontheground.)

On the previous night, Mr. Mekonnen had slept under a mosquito net for the first time in his life, as part of a Carter initiative to wipe out malaria and elephantiasis in this region. And Mr. Mekonnen now uses an outhouse as a result of a Carter Center initiative to build 350,000 outhouses in rural Ethiopia to defeat blindness from trachoma.

Mr. Carter has almost managed to wipe out one horrific ailment — Guinea worm — and is making great strides against others, including river blindness and elephantiasis. In this area, people are taking an annual dose of a medicine called Mectizan — donated by Merck, which deserves huge credit — that prevents itching and blindness.

Mectizan also gets rid of intestinal worms, leaving Ethiopian villagers stronger and more able to work or attend school. Among adults, the deworming revives sex drive, so some people have named their children Mectizan.

Mr. Carter's private campaign against the diseases of poverty, put together with pennies and duct tape, is a model of what our government could do. Imagine if the U.S. resolved that it would wipe out malaria and elephantiasis (both are spread by mosquitoes, so a combined campaign makes sense). What if we celebrated science not by trying to go to Mars but by extinguishing malaria? What if we tried to burnish America's image abroad not only with press releases and propaganda broadcasts, but also with a bold campaign against disease?

So I wish that President Bush could visit villages like this and see what Mr. Carter has accomplished as a private individual. Mr. Bush, to his great credit, has financed a major campaign against AIDS that will save nine million lives, and he is also increasing spending against malaria — but not nearly as energetically as he is increasing the number of troops in Iraq. So I asked Mr. Carter whether President Bush should be pushing not for a possible war with Iran, but for a war on malaria.

"That would certainly be my preference," he said. "I thought the war in Iraq was one of the worst mistakes our country ever made, and we're possibly about to make an even worse mistake by precipitating a war with Iran. But I would like to see us shift away from war being a high priority, to diplomacy and benevolent causes."

So, President Bush, how about if we as a nation join Mr. Carter's war on diseases that afflict the world's poorest peoples — and are one reason they are so poor. That's a war that would unite Americans, not divide them. Come on, Mr. Bush, sound the trumpets!

Just when you think world economic policy might be moving in a more sensible direction, along comes Latin America. This month's lesson in how not to create prosperity comes from Argentina, which has decided that the way to whip inflation is to throw out inconvenient statistics.

Recently the Peronist government of President Nestór Kirchner sacked an official at its National Statistics and Census Institute for refusing to agree to alter the "methodology" used to calculate inflation in January. Armed guards then escorted a political appointee to replace her.

As his government heads into the season of negotiating labor contracts, Mr. Kirchner has an incentive to underestimate inflation. And sure enough, five days after this dismissal, the government released its January inflation number of 1.1%, well below the 1.5% to 2% expected by non-government economists. These private economists say that, to reach the lower number, the new director agreed to modify increases in the cost of fruits and vegetables and understate soaring health insurance premiums and higher prices in tourism.

Employees of the Statistics Institute protested outside their offices and issued a statement accusing the government of "tampering" with the inflation index. International markets did not react well either. Inflation-linked Argentine peso bonds sold off almost 4%. Mr. Kirchner has responded by referring to the protesters as "mafiosas." Mark it down as one more reason Argentina can't shake its reputation as an economic banana republic.

TERRORISM NEWS:

George W. Visits Home Of George W. (USAT)

USA Today, February 20, 2007

President Bush honored the 275th birthday of the nation's first president Monday, likening George Washington's long struggle that gave birth to a nation to the war on global terrorism.

"Today, we're fighting a new war to defend our liberty and our people and our way of life," Bush said in front of Washington's home along the banks of the Potomac River in Mount Vernon, Va.

Bush chose the Presidents Day holiday to make his first visit as president to Mount Vernon. He and first lady Laura Bush helped lay a wreath at Washington's tomb, then the president gave a speech on the lawn of the estate.

"I feel right at home here. After all, this is the home of the first George W.," the president quipped.

McCain says Rumsfeld wasone of worst Defense chiefs

Republican presidential candidate John McCain said the war in Iraq has been mismanaged and Donald Rumsfeld will be remembered as one of the worst Defense secretaries.

"We are paying a very heavy price for the mismanagement — that's the kindest word I can give you — of Donald Rumsfeld, of this war," the Arizona senator said. "The price is very, very heavy, and I regret it enormously."

McCain, the ranking Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee, said Rumsfeld never put enough troops on the ground to succeed in Iraq.

"I think that Donald Rumsfeld will go down in history as one of the worst secretaries of Defense," McCain said to applause from some in a crowd of 800 at a retirement community near Hilton Head Island, S.C.

Clinton says S.C. should remove Confederate flag

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton said South Carolina should remove the Confederate flag from its Statehouse grounds, in part because the nation should unite under one banner while at war. "I believe that we should have one flag that we all pay honor to," the New York senator said.

Other Democratic hopefuls, including Sens. Joseph Biden and Chris Dodd, have said the flag should come down. The banner, which once flew over the Statehouse dome and now flies nearby, is the subject of an NAACP boycott.

More than 3,000 people gathered Monday to see Clinton in her first presidential campaign stop in Columbia, S.C.

Report criticizes medicalresponse to hurricanes

The federal response to Hurricanes Katrina and Rita showed that medical personnel deployed to emergencies need more hands-on training, the inspector general for the Department of Health and Human Services said.

The report by Daniel Levinson said federal medical teams often lacked experience and effective training and the teams did not include enough nurses, dentists and mental health professionals.

John Agwunobi, assistant secretary for Health, said the inspector general's recommendations "mirror many of the preparedness and response areas we are addressing."

Bush Compares Revolutionary, Terror Wars (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, February 20, 2007

President Bush honored the 275th birthday of the nation's first president on Monday, likening George Washington's long struggle that gave birth to a nation to the war on global terrorism.

"Today, we're fighting a new war to defend our liberty and our people and our way of life," said Bush, standing in front of Washington's home and above a mostly frozen Potomac River.

"And as we work to advance the cause of freedom around the world, we remember that the father of our country believed that the freedoms we secured in our revolution were not meant for Americans alone."

Bush chose the national Presidents Day holiday to make his first visit as president to Mount Vernon. He and first lady Laura Bush helped lay a wreath at Washington's tomb, then the president gave a speech from a platform on the bowling green lawn of the estate.

"I feel right at home here. After all, this is the home of the first George W. I thank President Washington for welcoming us today. He doesn't look a day over 275 years old," Bush said to laughter.

Washington was born on Feb. 22, 1732.

DOJ_NMG_0133751

"On the field of battle, Washington's forces were facing a mighty empire, and the odds against them were overwhelming. The ragged Continental Army lost more battles than it won, suffered waves of desertions, and stood on the brink of disaster many times. Yet George Washington's calm hand and determination kept the cause of independence and the principles of our Declaration alive," Bush said on a clear but frigid day, speaking to several hundred people.

Mount Vernon is about 16 miles south of the White House. Bush traveled by helicopter.

"In the end, General Washington understood that the Revolutionary War was a test of wills, and his will was unbreakable," said Bush. "After winning the war, Washington did what victorious leaders rarely did at the time. He voluntarily gave up power.

Washington's retirement didn't last long, Bush noted.

"As president, George Washington understood that his decisions would shape the future of our young nation and set precedent. He formed the first Cabinet, appointed the first judges, and issued the first veto."

"Over the centuries, America has succeeded because we have always tried to maintain the decency and the honor of our first president," Bush said.

Before and after Bush's speech, recorded music by the 3rd U.S. Infantry Old Guard Fife and Drum Corps blared through loudspeakers. Organizers of the event said the fife and drum corps had planned to perform live, but decided against it Sunday night because of expected temperatures in the 20s that could have damaged their historic instruments.

Bush Invokes Washington On Iraq (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

MOUNT VERNON, VA. — Marking George Washington's 275th birthday, President Bush on Monday linked the ideals of the first president to the war being fought by the 43rd, saying Washington's goals guided the nation's quest to extend freedom beyond its borders.

"George Washington's long struggle for freedom has … inspired generations of Americans to stand for freedom in their own time," Bush said, using a morning visit to Mount Vernon to compare the dilemmas faced at the birth of the nation to the troubles he now confronts.

"Today, we're fighting a new war to defend our liberty and our people and our way of life," he said. "And as we work to advance the cause of freedom around the world, we remember that the father of our country believed that the freedoms we secured in our revolution were not meant for Americans alone."

Quoting the first president — and referring, by implication, to the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan — Bush said: "He once wrote, 'My best wishes are irresistibly excited whensoever in any country I see an oppressed nation unfurl the banners of freedom.' "

Bush spoke for nine minutes on a frigid morning in front of the first president's mansion overlooking the ice-crusted Potomac River.

"I feel right at home here," he told the audience of several hundred. "After all, this is the home of the first George W."

After being greeted by Dean Malissa, an actor and Washington interpreter dressed in the blue-coat uniform and tri-corner hat of the Continental Army, Bush observed: "I thank President Washington for welcoming us today. He doesn't look a day over 275 years old."

The president recalled visiting Mount Vernon as a child with his grandmother, and said he and his wife had brought their daughters to the first president's house. The visit of about 45 minutes Monday was his first as president.

The plantation, about 16 miles south of the capital, is in the heart of what are now Northern Virginia's suburbs, with mini-mansions rivaling it in size and grandeur cropping up nearby on both sides of the Potomac. Bush flew here by helicopter, making the trip from one president's mansion to another in just a few minutes.

Bush noted the trials that Washington faced during the Revolutionary War, at the helm of "the ragged Continental Army," facing desertions, disaster and "a mighty empire."

But, he said, "In the end, Gen. Washington understood that the Revolutionary War was a test of wills, and his will was unbreakable."

Earlier, Bush and his wife, Laura, presented a wreath of red, white and blue blossoms at Washington's tomb. Monday was a federal holiday celebrating Presidents Day; Washington's actual birthday is Feb. 22.

Tourists Hear From President At George Washington's Home (WP)

By Tom Jackman

DOJ_NMG_0133752

President Bush visited Mount Vernon yesterday to pay tribute to "the first George W." and compared the Revolutionary War to the Iraq war in their pursuit of freedom.

Bush made his first visit as president to George Washington's home on the holiday marking the first president's birthday. Bush said he had visited Mount Vernon with his grandmother as "a little fellow from Midland, Texas," drawing appreciative laughs from a chilly crowd of several hundred tourists, history buffs and schoolchildren who had the day off.

The president and first lady Laura Bush laid a red, white and blue wreath at Washington's tomb, commemorating the 275th anniversary of his birth on Feb. 22, 1732. The presidential party took a helicopter in and out of the Mount Vernon estate in southern Fairfax County, completing the visit in less than an hour.

Bush's remarks consisted mainly of a reflection on Washington's life and impact on the United States, with brief allusions to today's war.

"America's path to freedom was long, and it was hard," Bush said. "And the outcome was really never certain. . . . In the end, General Washington understood that the Revolutionary War was a test of wills, and his will was unbreakable."

In the only direct analogy to Iraq, the president said, "Today, we're fighting a new war to defend our liberty and our people and our way of life. And as we work to advance the cause of freedom around the world, we remember that the father of our country believed that the freedoms we secured in our revolution were not meant for Americans alone. He once wrote, 'My best wishes are irresistibly excited whensoever in any country I see an oppressed nation unfurl the banners of freedom.' "

Some of those who watched the speech under crystal skies just happened to visit Mount Vernon the day the president was there, and others had planned to attend the speech. Ellen Georgi, a history teacher from Frederick, was in the latter group. She brought her family to make them "suffer through my love of history." She said the president "gave a very good speech about George Washington and morality as the compass of our country."

About 250 high school students from Presidential Classroom, an education program for students across the country, were bused in from Georgetown thinking they were just sightseeing, part of an itinerary that also included the Jefferson Memorial and Union Station yesterday. Instead, they stood just a hundred feet from the current president.

"It was great," said Paula Jernigan, 18, from Suches, Ga. "It was moving how [Bush] talked about George Washington, how he was a great president. It reminds our country what it is that makes us great."

Defending Nation's Latest War, Bush Recalls Its First (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

MOUNT VERNON, Va., Feb. 19 — To those who criticize his handling of the war in Iraq, President Bush likes to say that history will be his judge. On Monday, Presidents' Day, Mr. Bush wrapped himself in history's embrace, invoking another war, the American Revolution, and another George W. — George Washington — as his guide.

Here at the first president's sprawling estate on the Potomac River, Mr. Bush bowed his head in placing a wreath at Washington's grave to commemorate the 275th anniversary of his birth, this Thursday. Then, after an actor portraying Washington welcomed him to the estate — "He doesn't look a day over 275 years old," the current president cracked — Mr. Bush implicitly compared himself to his predecessor.

"With the advantage of hindsight, it is easy to take George Washington's successes for granted," Mr. Bush said after enumerating Washington's achievements as commander of the Continental Army and later as president. But "America's path to freedom was long and it was hard," he continued, "and the outcome was never really certain."

Mr. Bush drew an analogy between the Revolution and what he called "a new war to defend our liberty and our people and our way of life," wording that left unclear whether he meant the combat in Iraq or the broader fight against terror.

Washington, he added, "believed that the freedoms we secured in our Revolution were not meant for Americans alone."

The president has often seemed to find solace in past occupants of the White House. He has invoked Lincoln's shepherding the nation through the Civil War. He has recalled Truman, who struggled to explain another unpopular war, in Korea, and whose dismal public approval ratings shot skyward long after he left office. And more recently, he has been making reference to Washington as well.

"I'm reading about George Washington still," the president told reporters at a December news conference where he defended his Iraq policy. "My attitude is, if they're still analyzing No. 1, 43 ought not to worry about it and just do what he thinks is right, and make the tough choices necessary."

His appearance Monday was Mr. Bush's first at Mount Vernon as president. (He is the 28th president to visit.) It was also a rare public appearance before a crowd that is not invitation-only. But the audience was friendly, made up mostly of families with children, outfitted in snow boots and bright-colored jackets and mittens to guard against the icy cold.

The president kept it short. He spoke for just nine minutes, including a personal reminiscence of his own first visit to Mount Vernon, “when I was a little fellow from Midland, Tex., and my grandmother brought me here.”

Those nine minutes were filled, however, with hints about the state of mind of a president who is doggedly prosecuting an unpopular war.

Mr. Bush spoke of General Washington’s “many challenges,” noting that the Continental Army “stood on the brink of disaster many times.” And he spoke of Washington’s resolute determination: “His will was unbreakable.”

The president spoke as well of a brief retirement at Mount Vernon between Washington’s return from the Revolutionary War and his presidency. Mr. Bush is already laying the groundwork for his own retirement with plans for a presidential library at Southern Methodist University, Laura Bush’s alma mater.

“All he wanted to do was return here to Mount Vernon and to be with his loving wife, Martha,” the 43rd president said of the first. “As he wrote with satisfaction to his friend Lafayette, ‘I am become a private citizen on the banks of the Potomac, and under the shadow of my own vine and my own fig tree.’ ”

Bush Pays Homage To Nation's 1st President (MCT)

By William Douglas

McClatchy Newspapers, February 20, 2007

MOUNT VERNON, Va. - Was it like this at Valley Forge?

People huddled together, marched in place and danced jigs for warmth on a frosty field outside George Washington's historic home Monday, as President Bush paid homage to the nation's first president, whose 275th birthday is Thursday.

"I feel right at home here," Bush told some 2,000 shivering people who braved morning temperatures in the low 20s to listen to the nation's 43rd president praise the first one. "After all, this is the home of the first George W."

Bush turned to a man who was portraying Washington at the festivities and thanked him for welcoming him to the late president's spacious estate on the banks of the Potomac River, about 16 miles south of the White House.

"He doesn't look a day over 275 years old," Bush quipped.

After laying a wreath at Washington's tomb, Bush drew comparisons between America's first wartime president and the current one. He likened Washington's struggles in fighting for and forging democracy to his global war on terrorism.

"Today, we're fighting a new war to defend our liberty and our people and our way of life," Bush said, without specifically mentioning Iraq. "And as we work to advance the cause of freedom around the world, we remember that the father of our country believed that the freedoms we secured in our revolution were not meant for Americans alone."

The president and first lady Laura Bush made a spectacular entrance to Washington's estate. Their green helicopter, Marine One, landed a few yards from Washington's house, spraying up a misty cloud of powdery snow. Onlookers - mostly students on class trips - rushed to get a closer view of the presidential helicopter.

Before Bush arrived, the crowd had spent most of its time trying to stay warm, just as Washington's Continental Army did at Valley Forge during the bitter winter of 1777. Folks moved to the beat of piped-in fife and drum music Monday to keep their toes from freezing. A fife and drum corps was to have performed live, but decided against it for fear the frigid temperatures might ruin the historic instruments.

The bracing weather didn't bother 36-year-old Danielle Frank, of Woodbine, Va. She bundled up her family and drove to Mount Vernon. Asked whose idea it was to get up at dawn on a school holiday to go stand in an icy field for a brief presidential speech, 6-year-old Adam Frank pointed at his mom.

"It's Presidents Day," Danielle Frank said. "We should be doing something presidential with the kids, and I'm not sure they're doing White House tours."

Sarah Woodin, 14, accompanied the Franks to Mount Vernon, a bold move for someone who'd recently arrived in the Washington area from Florida. For her, the visit to Washington's home was time well spent.

"I like learning everything about history," she said. "You need to know where you came from."

President Links Terror War, U.S. War For Independence (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 20, 2007

President Bush yesterday celebrated 275 years since George Washington's birthday by visiting Mount Vernon and linking today's war against terrorism to the United States' fight for independence.

"George Washington's long struggle for freedom has also inspired generations of Americans to stand for freedom in their own time. Today, we're fighting a new war to defend our liberty and our people and our way of life," Mr. Bush said as he stood on the lawn in front of Washington's estate in Fairfax County.

With a re-enactor dressed as Washington looking on, Mr. Bush said the victories the first president won "were not meant for the United States alone," but were to advance freedom worldwide.

As he nears the end of his own two terms as president and his Iraq policy faces heavy criticism, Mr. Bush, the 43rd president, seems to take solace in the fact that historians are still digesting the first president's legacy.

"My attitude is, if they're still analyzing No. 1, 43 ought not to worry about it and just do what he thinks is right, and make the tough choices necessary," he said at a press conference late last year.

Mr. Bush clearly has done some of his own analyzing about Washington, praising him several times for being steady as a wartime leader.

"In the end, General Washington understood that the Revolutionary War was a test of wills, and his will was unbreakable," he said.

Mr. Bush also praised Washington's decision to relinquish his commission at the end of the Revolutionary War -- a time when "many would have gladly made George Washington the king of America," he said -- and returned to Mount Vernon, only to be called to oversee the constitutional convention and, later, the presidency.

"George Washington accepted the presidency because the office needed him, not because he needed the office," Mr. Bush said.

While displaying his knowledge of the first president, Mr. Bush did run afoul of Washington fans who lament the decline of the first president's celebratory day.

"We're celebrating around the country Presidents Day, but the folks that work here call it Washington's birthday," Mr. Bush said.

In fact, as far as the federal government is concerned, the holiday, as designated by the Uniform Monday Holiday Act passed in 1968, is "Washington's Birthday." Some states celebrate "Presidents Day" as a combination of Washington's and Abraham Lincoln's birthdays, and the term gained prominence through the ubiquitous car- and furniture-sales campaigns that promulgated the moniker.

With the federal holiday pegged to the third Monday in February, it can never fall on Washington's actual birthday, Feb. 22.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, found another reason to recognize the day yesterday. It marked the 65th anniversary of President Roosevelt signing the executive order allowing internment of Japanese-American citizens and Japanese legal permanent residents during World War II.

"We must continue to remember this tragic time in our history to learn from our errors of the past, reaffirm our commitment to the protection of civil liberties and to ensure that we never walk the same path again," Mr. Reid said.

Australian Held At Guantánamo May Go Home (NYT)

By Tim Johnston

The New York Times, February 19, 2007

SYDNEY, Australia, Feb. 18 — The Australian foreign minister said Sunday that his government had reached a deal to allow David Hicks, who has been held at the American military base in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, for more than five years without trial, to return to Australia by the end of the year.

American military prosecutors have accused Mr. Hicks, 31, an Australian citizen, of attempted murder in violation of the laws of war and providing material support for terrorism. Mr. Hicks, who was captured in Afghanistan in late 2001, is expected to be formally charged soon.

Australia's foreign minister, Alexander Downer, said authorities in the United States had told him that if Mr. Hicks was found guilty by the military tribunal, he would be allowed to serve out his sentence in an Australian prison.

"If he's convicted, we've made an arrangement with the Americans, which was confirmed to me 10 days ago by the secretary of defense, Robert Gates, that David Hicks will be able to serve his sentence or the remainder of his sentence in Australia," Mr. Downer told Australia's Nine television network.

"If the trial proceeds and proceeds quickly," Mr. Downer added, "it'll be possible to get Mr. Hicks back to Australia by the end of the year, either to serve in a prison in Australia or, of course, just to be released, depending on the result of the trial."

The Australian government is facing an election later this year and has come under increasing pressure to persuade the American authorities to either charge Mr. Hicks or release him.

American officials said Mr. Hicks had admitted to attending a training camp run by Al Qaeda and to being assigned to guard a Taliban tank outside the Kandahar airport when allied forces were bombing the area. It is unclear if he ever engaged foreign forces in Afghanistan.

Mr. Hicks's lawyers said prolonged periods of solitary confinement had produced a marked deterioration in his mental health.

U.S. To Stage Biggest Anti-terrorism Exercise On Guam (WT)

The Washington Times, February 20, 2007

SAIPAN, Northern Mariana Islands (Agence France-Presse) -- The world's biggest anti-terrorism exercise will be held this year on Guam, underscoring the Pacific island's growing importance to Washington, officials said yesterday.

Exercise TopOff4 is part of a series of large-scale maneuvers established to strengthen the U.S. ability to respond to terrorist attacks involving weapons of mass destruction.

William Marhoffer, the U.S. Coast Guard commander in Guam, said the TopOff4 exercise would be bigger than last year's Valiant Shield war games, in which the United States mobilized 30 ships, 280 aircraft and 22,000 military personnel.

"It will be bigger in some ways. Valiant Shield was a military exercise. It was a show of force. It was the first time we had three carrier strike groups in combined operations in the Pacific since the Vietnam War," he said.

TopOff4 "is a domestic counterterrorism exercise. ... It involves the intelligence communities, the Department of Homeland Security, the FBI, the Department of Defense, the U.S. Coast Guard." The exercise is expected to simulate a maritime terrorist attack.

Vice President Dick Cheney is to visit Guam later this week.

"This exercise highlights Guam's strategic value and will show the world that we are prepared to defend our island and our nation from any threat of terrorism," Gov. Felix Camacho said in his State of the Island address.

Guam and neighboring U.S. territories, including the Northern Mariana Islands, are considered by the United States as strategic locations in the Asia-Pacific region.

Guam is home to one of the largest U.S. military naval bases in the region, and 8,000 Marines will soon be relocated there from Japan.

The island, with a population of 171,000, is banking on the U.S. military buildup to bail it out of its economic woes.

The United States and Japan are spending $15 billion on the relocation of the Marines from Japan, which is expected to further boost Washington's military strength in the Asia-Pacific.

Moroccan Suspect Says Police Implicated Him In Madrid Bombings Out Of Revenge (USAT/AP)

USA Today, February 20, 2007

MADRID (AP) — A Moroccan who ran the shop where most of the cellphone cards used to set off the bombs in the 2004 Madrid train attacks were sold said Monday he was implicated in the case as punishment for refusing to be a police informant.

Jamal Zougam, 33, is among 29 suspects charged in the March 11, 2004, attacks that killed 191 people and injured more than 1,800 in Spain's capital. The trial opened last Thursday and is to last several months.

Zougam said he was approached twice by Spanish police seeking help getting information about Islamic radicals, but he refused.

He told a three-judge panel that following his detention — two days after the bombings — a police officer visited him in his cell and told him that if he had cooperated with police, he would not have been implicated.

"He told me: 'If you had collaborated with us, this wouldn't have happened to you,'" said Zougam, who took the stand for a second day.

"I realized it was revenge," he said. "I had nothing to do with this attack and with no other attack. I don't know why I'm in this trial."

At least two suspects in the trial were police informants before the attacks, and their defense lawyers claim the arrests were made under pressure to find a culprit.

Zougam denied he was a member of al-Qaeda or other radical Islamic groups, or that he had ever trained in terrorist camps in Afghanistan. He also condemned the Madrid blasts, and said he had never thought of his host country as an enemy.

"I condemn this attack categorically; I don't agree with this attack that takes the lives of people for religious, political and other reasons," he said.

"I live in Spain: This is like my country. Here, I live, I work, I eat," he said.

Zougam, who witnesses say planted at least one of the bombs on the commuter trains, testified Friday that he was asleep at the time of the early morning blasts and that witnesses who identified him were confused because they had seen his face on television.

Another alleged bomber, Syrian Basel Ghalyoun, also took the stand Monday and dismissed witness accounts that he, too, had placed some of the bombs.

He acknowledged that he was a friend of Tunisian Serhan Ben Abdelmajid Fakhet and other ringleaders who blew themselves up as police moved to arrest them weeks after the attacks but denied having anything to do with the bombings.

Ghalyoun, who continuously checked handwritten notes during the session and challenged the prosecutor and lawyers over certain facts and names, said he knew Fakhet was a radical.

"Serhan considered the United States an enemy of the Muslim people," Ghalyoun said.

The 26-year-old said he had told police that the Tunisian wanted to stage attacks in Spain but said he was referring to attacks on banks and jewelry shops for money. He said police had urged him to used the generic word, attack.

Both Zougam and Ghalyoun face sentences of up to 38,656 years — 30 years for each of the 191 killings and 18 years apiece for 1,820 attempted murders — though under Spanish law, the maximum time anyone can spend behind bars is 40 years.

Who Needs Jacques Bauer? (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

Twenty-nine defendants went on trial last week in a Spanish courtroom for complicity in the March 11, 2004 Madrid train bombings that killed 191 commuters and injured another 1,800. Among the accused: Jamal Zougam, a 33-year-old Moroccan immigrant who once ran a cellphone business. In June 2001, Spanish police raided Mr. Zougam's apartment, where they found jihadist literature and the telephone numbers of suspected terrorists. But the Spaniards judged the evidence insufficient to arrest or even wiretap him. Today, the Moroccan is believed to have furnished the cellphones through which the trainbombs were detonated.

In raiding Mr. Zougam's apartment, the Spanish were acting on a request from French investigative magistrate and counterterrorism supremo Jean-Louis Bruguiere. Earlier, Mr. Bruguiere had also warned the Canadian government about a suspicious Algerian asylum-seeker named Ahmed Ressam, but the Canadians took no real action. On Dec. 14, 1999 Mr. Ressam -- a.k.a. the Millennium Bomber -- was arrested by U.S. customs agents as he attempted to cross the border at Port Angeles, Wash., with nitroglycerin and timing devices concealed in his spare tire.

It would be reassuring to believe that somewhere in the ranks of the FBI or CIA America has a Jean-Louis Bruguiere of its own. But we probably don't, and not because we lack for domestic talent, investigative prowess, foreign connections, the will to fight terrorism or the forensic genius of a Gallic nose. What we lack is a system of laws that allows a man like Mr. Bruguiere to operate the way he does. Unless we're willing to trade in the Constitution for the Code Napoleon, we are not likely to get it.

Consider the powers granted to Mr. Bruguiere and his colleagues. Warrantless wiretaps? Not a problem under French law, as long as the Interior Ministry approves. Court-issued search warrants based on probable cause? Not needed to conduct a search. Hearsay evidence? Admissible in court. Habeas corpus? Suspects can be held and questioned by authorities for up to 96 hours without judicial supervision or the notification of third parties. Profiling? French officials commonly boast of having a "spy in every mosque." A wall of separation between intelligence and law enforcement agencies? France's domestic and foreign intelligence bureaus work hand-in-glove. Bail? Authorities can detain suspects in "investigative" detentions for up to a year. Mr. Bruguiere once held 138 suspects on terrorism-related charges. The courts eventually cleared 51 of the suspects -- some of whom had spent four years in preventive detention -- at their 1998 trial.

In the U.S., Mr. Bruguiere's activities would amount to one long and tangled violation of the First, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth and Eighth Amendments to the Constitution. And that's not counting the immense legal superstructures that successive Supreme Courts have built over and around the Bill of Rights. In France, however, Mr. Bruguiere, though not without his critics, is a folk hero, equally at home with governments of the left and right. The main point in his favor is that whatever it is he's doing, it works.

"Every single attempt to bomb France since 1995 has been stopped before execution," notes a former Interior Ministry senior official. "The French policy has been [to] make sure no terrorist hits at home. We know perfectly well that foreign-policy triangulation is not sufficient for that, [even if] it helps us go down a notch or two in the order of priority [jihadist] targets. So we've complemented our anti-U.S. foreign policy with ruthless domestic measures."

That's something that U.S. civil libertarians, who frequently argue that the Bush administration should follow the "European model" of treating terrorism as a law-enforcement issue instead of a military one, might usefully keep in mind. As lawyers David Rivkin and Lee Casey argue in the forthcoming issue of the National Interest, "the [Napoleonic] Civil Law system offers considerable advantages to the state in combating terrorism -- especially in terms of investigative tools and a level of secrecy -- that are simply unavailable in the ordinary Common Law criminal prosecution and trial, at least as governed by the United States Constitution."

Again, review the contrasts between American and European practices. Except in limited circumstances, the U.S. does not allow pre-trial detentions. But according to figures compiled by the U.S. State Department, 38% of individuals held in Italian prisons in 2005 were awaiting trial or the outcome of an appeal, while Spanish law allows for pre-trial detentions that can last as long as four years for terrorism suspects. In the U.S., the Posse Comitatus Act forbids the use of the military in law-enforcement work, and paramilitary units are relatively rare. By contrast, most European countries deploy huge paramilitary forces: Italy's Carabinieri; France's Gendarmerie Nationale; Spain's Guardia Civil.

Even Britain, which shares America's common law traditions, has been forced by Irish and now Islamist terrorism to resort to administrative detentions, trials without jury (the famous Diplock courts) and ubiquitous public surveillance. Wiretapping is authorized by the Home Secretary -- that is, a member of the government -- rather than an independent judge. In the early days of the Northern Irish "troubles," the government of Edward Heath placed some 2,000 suspects, without charge, in internment camps. Ironically, it was the decision to treat terrorists as ordinary criminals that led to the famous hunger strikes of Bobby Sands and his IRA crew.

All this calls into question the seriousness, if not the sincerity, of European complaints that under the Bush administration the U.S. has become a serial human-rights violator. Europeans have every right to be proud of civil servants like Mr. Bruguiere and a legal tradition that in many ways has been remarkably successful against terrorism. But that is not the American way, nor can it be if we intend to be true to a constitutional order of checks and balances, judicial review and a high respect for the rights of the accused. When President Bush declared a war on terror after 9/11, it was because he had no other realistic legal alternative. And when the rest of us make invidious comparisons between Europe and America, we should keep our fundamental differences in mind. There is no European 82nd Airborne, and there is no American Jean-Louis Bruguiere.

Madrid Bombing Trial Opened To Streaming Video (NYT)

By Doreen Carvajal

MADRID, Feb. 18 — On the opening day of Spain's trial of 29 men accused in the deadly Madrid train bombings, police officers ringed the maximum-security brick courtroom while a helicopter whirled overhead.

But with the click of a computer mouse, anyone can peek inside the inner sanctum for a glimpse of Spanish judges in black robes with white lace cuffs facing suspects barricaded behind bulletproof glass.

That YouTube-style window has been opened by a high-tech legal services company, Datadiar, which is streaming live coverage of the trial on its Web site, datadiar.com, and posting archived video testimony that began with the appearance on Thursday of the first suspect, Rabei Osman Sayed Ahmed, known as Muhammad the Egyptian

Datadiar has struck an alliance with the tribunal, the Audiencia Nacional, which has opened the courtroom wide to cameras. Four are posted at various angles in the court, and a fifth shows documents presented as evidence.

Forty-three microphones are scattered among the tables of the lawyers, and recordings are stored on DVDs.

With that fly-on-the-wall technology, Datadiar, a 10-year-old company on the outskirts of Madrid, is offering a courtroom version of C-Span, the American cable channel that covers government proceedings without commentary. The rare running view of what stands to be a legal marathon is of keen interest to a nation still haunted by questions about who set off the bombs on March 11, 2004, killing 191 and wounding nearly 2,000 on four commuter trains.

Datadiar hopes to introduce similar models in other countries at a time when there is renewed interest in opening up the courts. In the United States, for example, a Senate bill was introduced last month by Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, and Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, to permit cameras at most federal court proceedings.

Canada has just started a pilot project to test cameras in the courtroom in a prominent murder case. And in California, a judge said on Friday that he would allow full television coverage of the rock producer Phil Spector's murder trial, declaring that it was time to discard "fear of cameras in the courtroom."

Cristina Cortijo, a Datadiar managers and the wife of its founder, José Manuel Díaz-Arias, said: "We believe this issue is a very important one in the world, and people are looking at us. It's critical that people know that our company is doing this objectively with real-time transmissions and no cuts. And it's for free."

Datadiar is not being paid by the government to stream the trial, according to Ms. Cortijo, who said permission was granted by the presiding judge in the case, Javier Gómez Bermúdez.

In court, the judge strikes a brisk, no-nonsense manner with the lawyers, suspects and Arabic translators, but he seems comfortable and conscious of the informal jury of the public. He is an author of a new manual for legal journalism, "Lifting the Veil," and he regularly strides into the press room to take brief questions from an overflow crowd of journalists who are covering the case in an adjoining area by watching giant plasma TV screens.

In a brief interview during a trial break, Judge Gómez Bermúdez said the national court chose to open the bombing trial to broad viewing because "there are so many victims, and they can't all fit in here."

Critics of live courtroom coverage often cite the O. J. Simpson murder trial in California as an example of how a constant camera presence can turn a legal proceeding into a media circus.

But Judge Gómez Bermudez scoffed at the idea that such coverage might influence the trial, and said that Spanish courts had been receptive to cameras for some time.

A verdict in the train-bombing case is not expected until October, after the testimony of more 100 experts and 600 witnesses. There are also nearly 90,000 pages of documents, some which will be instantly accessible to the public through Datadiar.

The company's usual audience consists of members of the Spanish professional class: judges, lawyers and accountants who pay more than $2,500 a year for a subscription to Globalius, a Datadiar database of legal information made available on a portable flash drive.

But with the start of the trial, Datadiar's commercial director, Rosa Martínez Casas, said the company was beginning to reach a global audience.

To maintain its neutrality, Datadiar has avoided creating chat forums in connection with the legal issues that it is raising. The site does offer a series of primers to explain elements of the legal process, like the concept of the presumption of innocence. It also has a seating diagram of the courtroom and the 46 defense lawyers, prosecutors and translators.

In the last 10 years, investors have plowed more than $65 million into the company, which did not break even until 2003. It is now turning a profit, Ms. Cortijo said.

So far, Datadiar has not sought advertising for the legal information it is offering on its portal, but that is an alternative under discussion, she said, in addition to the company's subscription model, for creating similar court coverage in other countries.

Ms. Cortijo said it was too early to calculate how much it would cost Datadiar to offer the free streaming video online, although she said that new technology had helped reduce costs.

"It may be difficult to understand why we do this for free," she said. "We are objective. We are in the middle. We are only lawyers and professionals, and offering information. It's not like television."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

A Nuclear Headache (USNEWS)

By Angie C. Marek

U.S. News and World Report, February 19, 2007

It was one of the first major scares after September 11. In October 2001, a CIA agent told the government al Qaeda had smuggled a nuclear bomb into New York City and intended to detonate it. A covert search team from the Department of Energy was dispatched to search for the weapon. It was never found, but the incident worried the administration so much that Vice President Dick Cheney and several hundred federal employees holed up in a bunker for weeks, just in case a twin attack leveled Washington.

Such fears still resonate. Department of Homeland Security Chief Michael Chertoff's virtual battle cry is that he wants to focus DHS's resources on preventing the most catastrophic attacks. Nuclear bombs are the rare weapon that can kill hundreds of thousands. And experts say the unleashing of a dirty bomb-a conventional explosive laced with radioactive material-could sicken thousands of people and cause unparalleled economic damage. So it's not surprising that DHS and New York-area authorities are planning an aggressive approach in coming months: They'll surround Manhattan with radiation detectors they hope can sniff out a weapon before it does harm. But it's an ambitious, expensive effort, and critics worry they're going too far, too fast.

Trying to protect against nuclear threats is hardly new. The Department of Energy created SWAT-like search teams in 1974 after, in what turned out to be an elaborate hoax, a man in Boston threatened to detonate a nuclear weapon unless the government gave him $200,000. After 9/11, detection moved to the open: U.S. Customs and Border Protection has installed 321 radiation detectors in U.S. seaports and has used smaller devices to help secure the last three Super Bowl games. Officials in New York City have at least 700 hand-held radiation detectors-with good reason. "Because dirty bombs can be made from readily available devices used in hospitals and construction sites," says Ivan Oelrich, a nuclear physicist with the Federation of American Scientists, "there's really no good explanation why this [sort of attack] hasn't happened yet."

Freeway. Today's detection efforts, however, are limited by technology. Many machines now in use must be driven through-at about 5 mph-to produce a reading. And the vast majority of machines can't distinguish between harmful and harmless, naturally occurring radiation. Still, DHS's current approach has been quietly gaining speed in the past year. Five months ago, the department's Domestic Nuclear Detection Office launched a pilot project to add nuclear detectors to 18-wheeler weigh stations in nine southeastern states. "Kentucky might not necessarily be the target," explains Mary Pedersen with the state's Office of Homeland Security, "but chances are it's on the way." Her state, which is crisscrossed by 70,000 semi-trucks each day, currently has detectors in weigh stations on two interstates. She estimates that within two years it will be hard for most trucks to drive very far into Kentucky on any freeway without a radiation scan.

The New York model builds on that effort, but it will touch everyone on the road. NYPD Commissioner Raymond Kelly says the plan is to create a "ring of radiation detectors" roughly 50 miles outside Manhattan's border. Vehicles that trigger alarms can be stopped and searched, before they reach the city. Among the ideas being weighed: using covert detectors hidden inside SUVs to take radiation readings of cars in nearby lanes.

History's Troubling Lessons (USNEWS)

By Alex Kingsbury

U.S. News and World Report, February 19, 2007

The alarm over nuclear terrorism isn't new. In December 1945, a scant four months after an atomic explosion leveled Hiroshima, the United States was already anticipating the end of its nuclear monopoly. It was only a matter of time, scientists and generals knew, before other nations, particularly the Soviet Union, mastered the atom bomb.

So with that eventuality in mind, a group of nervous congressmen sought counsel from the father of the atom bomb, Robert Oppenheimer, about the possibility of a surprise nuclear attack. Chief among their concerns was that a bomb could be smuggled into a major American city and detonated without warning.

Prescient. Transcripts of that hearing, obtained from the National Archives, reveal a startlingly prescient debate on the Sisyphean challenge of homeland security. In one exchange, Colorado Sen. Eugene Millikin presses Oppenheimer about how to find a bomb hidden in a city:

Sen. Millikin: We... have mine-detecting devices, which are rather effective... I was wondering if anything of that kind might be available to use as a defense against that particular type of use of atomic bombs.

Dr. Oppenheimer: If you hired me to walk through the cellars of Washington to see whether there were atomic bombs, I think my most important tool would be a screwdriver to open the crates and look. I think that just walking by, swinging a little gadget would not give me the information.

That candid assessment shocked the senators, who then asked the Atomic Energy Commission to examine the problem. In the early 1950s, two top physicists, Robert Hofstadter and Wolfgang Panofsky, a veteran of the Manhattan Project team that built the atomic bomb, produced a still-classified assessment, which came to be known as the Screwdriver Report.

Panofsky, now the director emeritus of the Stanford Linear Accelerator Center, says the assignment was to detect 1 cubic inch of highly enriched uranium or plutonium hidden inside a crate and smuggled across a land border. "The conclusions of that report are still valid because the laws of physics have not changed one bit," Panofsky tells U.S. News. "You still can't detect a nuclear device unless you are, say, 10 feet away from it-and even then it can be quite easily shielded."

Not everyone completely agrees; Department of Homeland Security officials say new state-of-the-art detectors can do a much better job than that. But the basic point is still valid-and alarming. Radioactive material emits less radiation with distance from its source. Despite the Screwdriver Report's conclusions, though, the government back then began a covert pilot program at selected airports and seaports to scan for radioactivity. The short-lived "Cyclops Project" had a poor record of success, according to Panofsky and historian Gregg Herken, author of Brotherhood of the Bomb. In fact, says Panofsky, the only thing that the Cyclops system discovered was a woman at a New York airport who tried to evade customs by taping 200 wristwatches with radioactively luminescent dials to the inside of her corset.

New Federal Rules For Chemical Plants Criticized (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

WASHINGTON — New government rules seeking to thwart terrorist attacks on chemical plants are facing stiff opposition from state leaders, environmentalists and others who say the regulations are flawed, vague and unlikely to protect the public.

The rules, which are scheduled to take effect in April, are the culmination of a five-year government debate about how to prevent a toxic attack at any of the nation's chemical facilities. Such an attack could release a cloud of poison over a densely populated area and kill thousands.

"The regulations are seriously flawed and could have a very harmful impact," Senate Homeland Security Committee Chairman Joe Lieberman, I-Conn., wrote to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff this month.

Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke says the department is reviewing the complaints and will work with plant managers, state officials and other groups to address their concerns.

Federal security requirements will be tailored for each plant and could range from more fences and lighting to improved storage facilities. Companies that don't meet the new requirements will face fines of up to $25,000 per day, Knocke says, "or even an order to cease operation."

Last year, Congress gave Chertoff authority over chemical plant security because of post-9/11 fears that terrorists could target a plant. The new rules would apply to any building or area where deadly chemicals are made, used or stored.

Lawmakers and various groups with an interest in chemical security complain that the new rules:

In New Jersey, state lawmakers in 2005 passed stricter chemical security rules than those set to take effect at the federal level.

The federal rules, however, would invalidate the New Jersey rules, in effect weakening chemical security in that state, New Jersey Gov. Jon Corzine says.

"Federal standards are necessary," says Corzine, a Democrat. But federal rules must not "limit states' abilities to take further action to protect our own citizens."

Knocke says the nation must have uniform security policies. "State laws cannot and should not conflict with federal authorities," he says.

The American Chemistry Council, which represents nearly 90% of the nation's chemical plants, complains that Homeland Security has not been clear enough about how it will determine which plants fall into the high-risk categories and will be required to put tighter — and potentially costly — security in place. "We need a clear understanding as to who this applies to," ACC President Jack Gerard says.

·Don't require chemical companies to look into using safer chemicals.

If companies were required to use less dangerous chemicals, says Greenpeace toxics director Rick Hind, they could "eliminate 9/11-magnitude risks that communities living within 14 miles of a chemical plant face each day."

Dems To Push Subway Safety (USAT)

By Mimi Hall, Usa Today

USA Today, February 19, 2007

Transit systems 'ripe, easy targets'

WASHINGTON — Congressional Democrats now in charge of homeland security are pushing ahead with legislation to tighten security in the nation's subways and other mass-transit systems.

"These are ripe, easy targets," says Senate banking and urban affairs committee Chairman Chris Dodd, D-Conn. "Commuters shouldn't have to play Russian roulette when they get on the train in the morning."

Dodd became chairman of the panel when Democrats took control of Congress on Jan. 4. His committee has approved legislation authorizing $3.5 billion over the next three years on transit security. The committee oversees mass transit.

The House Homeland Security Committee also is holding hearings. Chairman Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., says his panel's legislation will mandate more training for transit workers, whistle-blower protection for those who reveal security lapses, increased screening at stations and federal grants for mass-transit security.

Thompson says there's no way to screen everyone who uses the nation's transit systems. However, "given the number of people who travel every day on our rail system, we just can't ignore it any longer," he says.

Kip Hawley, head of the Department of Homeland Security's Transportation Security Administration (TSA), says the funding disparity is not what it seems because aviation security is funded entirely by the federal government and transit security is funded largely by industries and local governments.

The TSA is just "as concerned with stopping (a transit attack) as we are with an aviation threat," he says.

Subway operators, counterterrorism experts and mayors say it's about time Congress focused on transit security after five years of massive government spending on aviation security. "Transit has been drastically short-changed," says Elliot Sander, director of New York City's Metropolitan Transit Authority. "The absence of adequate federal funding for transit security is putting transit in a place where it has to make agonizing choices over ensuring passengers' safety."

Transit officials say the federal government needs to set standards for training and technology used to protect commuter rail and subway systems. They say they need more officers and bomb-sniffing dogs; more cameras and sensors; better evacuation plans and drills; and construction money to shore up tunnels, install lights and build barriers and fences for rail yards.

"No sector of our transportation network has been more neglected when it comes to security than transit," Warren George, president of the 180,000-member Amalgamated Transit Union, told the Senate this month. "The deficiency in security funding for this industry is staggering."

Sen. Richard Shelby, R-Ala., former chairman of the banking committee, calls Homeland Security's investment in transit security "woefully inadequate."

Despite plots against New York's subway and terrorist attacks on transit systems in Madrid, London and Mumbai, India, the government has sunk $24 billion into aviation security and less than $500 million into transit security since 9/11, according to the Senate banking committee.

"This is not an appropriate balance," Dodd says.

Making Martial Law Easier (NYT)

The New York Times, February 19, 2007

A disturbing recent phenomenon in Washington is that laws that strike to the heart of American democracy have been passed in the dead of night. So it was with a provision quietly tucked into the enormous defense budget bill at the Bush administration's behest that makes it easier for a president to override local control of law enforcement and declare martial law.

The provision, signed into law in October, weakens two obscure but important bulwarks of liberty. One is the doctrine that bars military forces, including a federalized National Guard, from engaging in law enforcement. Called posse comitatus, it was enshrined in law after the Civil War to preserve the line between civil government and the military. The other is the Insurrection Act of 1807, which provides the major exemptions to posse comitatus. It essentially limits a president's use of the military in law enforcement to putting down lawlessness, insurrection and rebellion, where a state is violating federal law or depriving people of constitutional rights.

The newly enacted provisions upset this careful balance. They shift the focus from making sure that federal laws are enforced to restoring public order. Beyond cases of actual insurrection, the president may now use military troops as a domestic police force in response to a natural disaster, a disease outbreak, terrorist attack or to any "other condition."

Changes of this magnitude should be made only after a thorough public airing. But these new presidential powers were slipped into the law without hearings or public debate. The president made no mention of the changes when he signed the measure, and neither the White House nor Congress consulted in advance with the nation's governors.

There is a bipartisan bill, introduced by Senators Patrick Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, and Christopher Bond, Republican of Missouri, and backed unanimously by the nation's governors, that would repeal the stealthy revisions. Congress should pass it. If changes of this kind are proposed in the future, they must get a full and open debate.

Justice For The Forgotten Internees (WP)

By Xavier Becerra And Dan Lungren

The Washington Post, February 19, 2007

Art Shibayama is an American who served in the Army during the Korean War. Like many veterans, Cpl. Shibayama was not born in the United States. He was born in Lima, Peru, to Japanese Peruvian parents. Until 1942, Shibayama, his two brothers and three sisters lived comfortably with their parents and grandparents, all of whom had thriving businesses. However, after America entered World War II, his family was forcibly removed from Peru, transported to the United States and held in a government-run internment camp in Crystal City, Tex.

Like many Japanese American families, Shibayama's family lost everything they owned. But the greater injustice occurred when his grandparents were sent to Japan in exchange for American prisoners of war. Their family never saw them again.

Shibayama and his family were among the estimated 2,300 people of Japanese descent from 13 Latin American countries who were taken from their homes and forcibly transported to the Crystal City camp during World War II. The U.S. government orchestrated and financed the deportation of Japanese Latin Americans for use in prisoner-of-war exchanges with Japan. Eight hundred people were sent across the Pacific, while the remaining Japanese Latin Americans were held in camps without due process until after the war ended.

Further study of the events surrounding the deportation and incarceration of Japanese Latin Americans is merited and necessary. While most Americans are aware of the internment of Japanese Americans, few know about U.S. government activities in other countries that were fueled by prejudice against people of Japanese ancestry.

That is why we have introduced H.R. 662, the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Latin Americans of Japanese Descent Act. We should review U.S. military and State Department directives requiring the relocation, detention and deportation of Japanese Latin Americans to Axis countries. Then we should recommend appropriate remedies. It is the right thing to do to affirm our commitment to democracy and the rule of law.

This year marks the 26th anniversary of the formation of the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians, whose findings led to the Civil Liberties Act of 1988. It provided an official apology and financial redress to most of the Japanese Americans who were subjected to wrongdoing and confined in camps during World War II. Those loyal Americans were vindicated by the fact that not a single documented case of sabotage or espionage was committed by a Japanese American during that time. This act was the culmination of a half-century of struggle to bring justice to those who were denied it. But work to rectify and close this regrettable chapter in our nation's history remains unfinished.

U.S. involvement in the expulsion and internment of people of Japanese descent who lived in various Latin American countries is thoroughly recorded in government files. These civilians were robbed of their freedom -- their civil and human rights thrown by the wayside -- as they were kidnapped from nations not directly involved in World War II. The Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians acknowledged these federal actions in detaining and interning civilians of enemy or foreign nationality, particularly those of Japanese ancestry, but the commission failed to fully examine and report on the historical documents that exist in distant archives.

Today, the Day of Remembrance, marks the anniversary of the 1942 signing of Executive Order 9066 -- the document that made it possible to intern thousands of Japanese Americans, German Americans, Italian Americans and Japanese Latin Americans during World War II. Though it is important that we remember what took place, it is more critical that we act, for justice delayed is justice denied. And for the dwindling number of surviving internees who became Americans, such as Cpl. Art Shibayama, justice has been delayed far too long. They deserve our attention, our respect and the official recognition of a country that is willing to heal and to make amends.

Hurricane Suits May Be Settled Soon (USAT)

By Kathy Chu, Usa Today

USA Today, February 19, 2007

165 Louisiana homeowners awaiting first payments

The first major insurance settlement involving a group of hurricane-damaged homes in Louisiana is in its final stages and could be announced as soon as in a week or two, according to the attorney for the homeowners who sued.

The likely multimillion-dollar deal would cover about 165 homeowners insured by Louisiana Citizens — the state-created insurer of last resort — in Cameron Parish, where the 2005 hurricanes reduced homes to slabs, says Jennifer Jones, the homeowners' lawyer.

Jones cautioned that the settlement could still be scuttled. But if it succeeds, it could provide a model for resolving hundreds other such cases in the state. The deal would not affect thousands of homes damaged by the New Orleans levee breach after Hurricane Katrina.

Separately, State Farm, the largest insurer in Louisiana, has made two offers to settle 135 Cameron Parish cases involving homes reduced to rubble, says Jones, the parish's assistant district attorney. Jones rejected both offers, she says, because they'd provide too little money for homeowners. The second one was modeled after a proposed class-action settlement offer made recently to Mississippi coastal homeowners. Jones expects to meet with State Farm again in early March.

State Farm confirms it's negotiating with Jones and says it's "optimistic" about a settlement. Terry Lisotta, CEO of Louisiana Citizens, declined to comment on any settlement talks, saying, "We don't discuss open litigation."

"Right now, (insurers are) concentrating on Cameron Parish because there are a manageable number of claims," Jones says. "If I get a settlement for my homeowners, insurers could settle on the same cases" in other hard-hit Louisiana parishes.

Jones says she's "satisfied" so far with preliminary terms offered by Louisiana Citizens to settle cases in Cameron Parish and expects the insurer — which has nearly 10% of the homeowners' market in the state — to finalize the offer as early as next week.

Jones says Louisiana Citizens asked her not to disclose financial details of the proposed settlement because of ongoing negotiations. But she believes that the settlement "is going to be more than" the last offer made by State Farm — which she estimates at $2 million to $3 million — for its own Cameron Parish policyholders.

Homeowners' attorneys, including Jones, say insurers seem more willing to settle slab cases since a January court ruling. In that case, a federal judge said State Farm couldn't deny a Mississippi couple's claim if it couldn't prove whether wind or water caused damage.

Homeowner policies cover wind; only federal policies cover flooding. State Farm and other insurers sometimes deny payout if both wind and water hit a home.

Some attorneys fear that even if insurers settle cases of wiped-out homes in one Louisiana parish, other homeowners won't necessarily get the same relief.

"The most remarkable thing about the insurance experience for homeowners is the inconsistency (by insurers) in deciding who to pay and how much," says Anthony Fernandez, a lawyer for Louisiana homeowners in coastal St. Bernard's Parish.

Katrina 'Voluntourists' Make Labor A Vacation (USAT)

By Larry Copeland, Usa Today

USA Today, February 19, 2007

Across the USA, people feel a pull to help Gulf Coast

BILOXI, Miss. — Scott Shattuck, a pharmacy manager from Vancouver, Wash., is in Mississippi on vacation. But by day, he's more likely to be found "mucking out" a house damaged by Hurricane Katrina or painting a children's clinic than hitting the casinos or walking the beach.

"This is not a vacation in the sense of doing all the touristy stuff," says Shattuck, 33, here with a group of 30 volunteers from Kaiser Permanente. "You're here to do work for the community, and when you're done, you can have your free time."

Shattuck and his group, who also helped out in the New Orleans area, are among the massive wave of volunteers — half a million, by one estimate — who have come here from across the nation in the nearly 18 months since Katrina struck.

In storm-ravaged Mississippi, their impact has been immeasurable. From Pascagoula in the east to Bay St. Louis in the west, these volunteers have been the one positive constant for residents who have battled through lengthy power outages, mosquito infestations, stuffy FEMA trailers, recalcitrant insurers and an often molasses-slow government bureaucracy.

"They built our community back," D'Iberville Mayor Rusty Quave says. "Without those volunteer groups, we would be just starting. Our houses would be like some of the parishes in Louisiana where there are 10,000 houses that have not been mucked out."

That might seem strong praise in a state where the Federal Emergency Management Agency had spent $857 million through Feb. 5 — just over $50.4 million a month since Katrina — and where the Small Business Administration had issued $2.06 billion in low-interest loans for people to rebuild their homes. But about 80,000 people still live in FEMA trailers.

Almost to a person, Mississippians agree that the volunteers, many of them from religious organizations, have been the spur for their recovery. "We wouldn't even have a coast if it wasn't for them," Pass Christian Mayor Chipper McDermott says.

With their purchases of food and T-shirts, sneakers and blue jeans at restaurants and stores throughout the Gulf Coast region, the volunteers helped keep the local economy afloat in the weeks and months after the storm. They helped revive the region's vital tourism industry by blowing off steam at night in the bars, casinos and restaurants.

Volunteers have been so critical to the Magnolia State's ongoing recovery that a term has been coined to capture their duality. "Voluntourists," they're calling them here.

"They've had a tremendous impact," says Stephen Richer, executive director of the Mississippi Gulf Coast Convention and Visitors Bureau, who estimates that 500,000 volunteers have come here since Katrina flattened the coast on Aug. 29, 2005. "When I look at the people all of us have been dealing with on a day-to-day basis, they are the one group that has brought nothing but hope."

Shattuck, who also manages a pediatric department in Vancouver, is clearly a newcomer to Mississippi: He rhymes the middle syllable of Biloxi with "box" instead of with "lux" as the locals do.

He was drawn to the Gulf Coast by the need he sensed here.

"It seemed like after the immediate coverage, it kind of faded away," he says. "Seeing Spike Lee's documentary (on New Orleans), When the Levees Broke, and media images here and there … made my heart hurt for the people here. There was a tremendous urgency to come down here to do a job for the people that need help."

Shattuck says his wife, Melissa, was fully supportive when he told her he was taking a week of vacation to come here. She would have come, too, but stayed behind to care for their 3-year-old son and 8-month-old daughter.

His vacation is far from posh. He lives with about 100 other volunteers in a big room at Beauvoir Methodist Church, Mississippi headquarters for Hands On Gulf Coast, an Atlanta-based volunteer organization that also has a New Orleans branch.

Short-term volunteers such as Shattuck sleep on cramped bunk beds in a barracks-like setting or in big Army tents out back. They shower outdoors. Hands On serves them breakfast, usually oatmeal, pancakes, eggs, fruit salad and cereal. Dinner might be jambalaya, fajitas or spaghetti: "Something with a lot of carbs, real easy to make and can feed a lot of people," says Chris deVeer, director of Hands On Gulf Coast.

He says it's not unusual "for people to come for a week or two and still be here three or four months later. It's a life-changing experience. We connect people with people who need help, but it changes both sets of lives."

Along with religious organizations, college students have been the backbone of the state's volunteer effort, and officials on the coast expect thousands of them during the upcoming spring break.

"We have a surge already booked up," says Betty Robinson, spokeswoman for the city of Waveland. "In March, April and the first of May, and again in the summer, we'll see a lot of college students."

The Beau Rivage Resort and Casino here, which recently completed a $550 million, post-Katrina renovation, is a world removed from the storm-blighted reality outside.

To anyone strolling among the resort's 11 restaurants, extensive shopping and bustling casino floor, the storm's devastation seems far away. It's easy to see why a volunteer might want to escape here for a few hours after a long day of cleaning muck out of a house.

"We absolutely have people staying with us that are here helping," says Mary Cracchiolo, a spokeswoman for the resort. "People are coming to help, and taking time to enjoy the area attractions."

It's probably impossible to measure the economic impact of "voluntourism" on Mississippi, says Richer, who tracks such things.

"What they spend is small," he says. "As to what they bring, what's the value of hope? What's the value of this house they left behind? The dollar value is probably a small part of what they brought. The overall impact is in the multiple millions. Say their labor is worth $10 an hour, and assuming they all work at least 40 hours a week, you're talking multiple millions of dollars."

Much of the evidence is anecdotal, says Beth Carriere, executive director of Mississippi's West Coast-Hancock County Tourism Development Bureau. "In the beginning, the volunteers were the only customers here for whatever business was open," she says. "Whatever was open, they utilized it. Lord, I don't know what we would have done without them. Now that the hotels are open, they're flying in, staying in hotels and doing volunteer work."

Bruce Frallic, executive director of Gulfport-Biloxi International Airport, says voluntourists make up 15%-20% of the airport's passenger traffic. "The voluntourism really took off sometime around November 2005 and was just intense for the following year," Frallic says. "They were probably 30% of our passenger traffic" then.

Pam Meinzinger, general manager of Prime Outlets at Gulfport, a 65-store mall, says the voluntourists helped the stores there remain open during the leanest period and are still important customers.

"They're just kind of becoming a part of the community," she says. "They're a big part of our customer base. The northern volunteers usually need some summer clothes. They really do shop us quite a bit, at night. … They buy a lot of blue jeans and tennis shoes."

Now Mississippi is saying thanks. In January, during a brief appearance on NBC's Today show, Richer expressed the state's appreciation to the volunteers — and urged them to keep coming.

The city of D'Iberville will build a 26-acre park, tentatively called Good Samaritan Park. It will feature the flags of all 50 states, the state highway patrol, the National Guard and others. "We're planning it right now," Mayor Quave says.

Bruce Beckham is executive director of Tourism Cares for America, a non-profit group that brought 330 tourism industry volunteers to Mississippi last year. He says that since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, many Americans have felt compelled to "go beyond their vacation" by volunteering.

"They're not doing it out of guilt," he says. "They feel that's what their responsibility as a human being is."

John Edmiston, Kaiser Permanente's national community relations manager, says the company had nearly 300 applicants for the 30 slots on the week-long Gulf Coast trip, all of them willing to give up a week's vacation.

Sometimes volunteers come for a week and find themselves pulled back. "They come here and build something," Frallic says. "They've contributed their blood, sweat and tears to this community, and as a result, they want to come back and see how things are going."

Maureen Gatto, 53, a lawyer from Bucks County, Pa., near Philadelphia, came to Hancock County for a week in April 2006 with about 25 other lawyers and friends.

"It was a typical group," she says. "We were gutting houses, helping out. When I got back home, I felt a very strong pull back to Mississippi, and I couldn't shake it. I gave it a month, thinking that do-gooder feeling would wash off. When it didn't, I said, 'Whatever it takes, I'm going to go down.' "

Gatto returned to Bay St. Louis last August for a two-year stay. She is now the Mississippi coordinator of the Bucks-Mont Katrina Project, which has built a day care center in Bay St. Louis and breaks ground next month on an animal shelter. "I don't think I'll be here permanently," she says. "My whole family is in the northeastern United States."

Sometimes, volunteers come back. Sometimes, they fall in love.

Randy May, 58, says he drove from Austin to Pass Christian within a few days of Katrina. He's been there ever since, working as a coordinator of volunteers for a Baptist group from Indiana and Kentucky.

"I had a good life in Texas," he says. "I'm a horse-shoer and golf instructor. But I had to come here."

Two weeks after he got to Mississippi, May met Deborah Yawn, 56, of Jackson. She had been volunteering in Long Beach.

"She came to the Pass looking for (volunteer) work," May says, "and two weeks later, I married her."

WAR NEWS:

Iraqi Militants Launch Attack On U.S. Outpost (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 19 — In a rare coordinated assault on an American combat outpost north of Baghdad, suicide bombers drove one or more cars laden with explosives into the compound on Monday, while other insurgents opened fire in the ensuing chaos, according to witnesses and the American military. Two American soldiers were killed and at least 17 were wounded.

The brazen attack, which was followed by gun battles and an evacuation of the wounded by American helicopters, was almost surely the work of Sunni militants, most likely Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, according to American and Iraqi officials.

It appeared to be part of a renewed drive by insurgents in recent weeks as more American and Iraqi troops flood the streets of Baghdad and thousands of marines head to western Anbar Province to try to stem the violence. Hundreds of Iraqis have died in a recent wave of car bombings in Baghdad and elsewhere.

Insurgents have been able to shoot down more helicopters through coordinated assaults, captured documents suggest, and American and Iraqi military officials say they are concerned that militants are moving to areas where the American troop presence remains thin.

As the Iraqi government and the American military struggled to build public trust in the security forces, a Sunni woman publicly charged that she had been raped by members of the largely Shiite National Police, causing a furor.

The assault on the American outpost, situated in the heart of a town called Tarmiya, was unusual because militants had largely avoided direct assaults on heavily fortified American positions. A similar attack occurred last summer, when a suicide driver plowed a truck full of explosives into a military outpost near the town of Baghdadi, in Anbar Province, but that did not seem as coordinated as Monday's assault.

Shortly before dawn, suicide bombers drove at least one and possibly as many as three cars laden with explosives into the outer perimeter of the outpost. Witnesses said there were two explosions then a brief pause before another bomber drove his vehicle into the building, a former police station.

Sometime during the assault a gas storage container exploded, sending black smoke billowing into the sky as militants laid siege to the outpost, firing on the Americans from multiple directions, according to an Iraqi official and local residents. As the gun battle raged, at least four American helicopters swept overhead to evacuate the wounded soldiers. There were no reports of how many militants were killed.

The witnesses were reached by telephone and related their accounts only on the condition of anonymity, saying they feared for their lives. The accounts of the witnesses, some of whom live next door to the outpost, could not be independently verified. In a statement, the American military confirmed only the casualty figures and said at least one car bomb was involved in the attack.

Militants usually attack American bases by firing mortars from a distance, using snipers to wait for targets of opportunity, or planting explosive devices on roads frequented by Americans. Iraqi police and army stations, on the other hand, have come under frequent assault by suicide bombers.

There is evidence that Shiite militia leaders are lying low and heading to strongholds in the south during the security crackdown, but attacks by Sunni militants seem to be intensifying. In addition to the assault in Tarmiya, militants on Monday struck at Iraqi security forces and government officials near Kirkuk, Ramadi and Tikrit, and attacked civilians near Falluja.

A family of 13 was killed on the road leading to Falluja, about 12 miles northwest of Baghdad, because its members were from a tribe known to oppose Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, witnesses said.

The family, including an elderly woman and two small boys, was dragged out of a minibus, lined up and shot. The bodies remained on the highway for hours because people were afraid they would be ambushed if they collected the dead, witnesses said.

The family was part of the Albu Farag tribe, which has made an alliance with the Anbar Salvation Council. The council has been trying to undermine the militants, and its leader, Abdul Satar Abu Risha, was himself the target of an assassination attempt on Monday when a suicide bomber drove into his home in Ramadi. He survived, but five of his guards were killed.

The attack on the Tarmiya outpost came as American troops moved into similar stations throughout Baghdad for the first time since the early months after the 2003 invasion. Monday's attack underscored the inherent risks in the new strategy.

The Americans entered Tarmiya after the local police force collapsed in December, following a campaign of intimidation by Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, according to the military and residents.

Until the police force collapsed, the Americans had been only an occasional presence in the town of 25,000, sending soldiers to conduct patrols with the Iraqis from a nearby base. Over the past two years, residents said, Sunni militants have been a constant presence. In addition to attacking the security forces, they have pushed nearly all the Shiites out of the once-mixed community.

The outpost, established in the abandoned police headquarters in the center of the town, was fortified by large blast walls. Americans typically keep one company of about 100 soldiers at such outposts.

By nightfall, American forces had sealed off all entrances to the town and imposed a curfew, leaving residents worried that they would be cut off from basic supplies.

In the west of the country, three marines and an Army soldier were killed over the weekend, the United States military said Monday.

Even as Iraqis and Americans stepped up security efforts in Baghdad on Monday, a day after bombs killed 61 people in a downtown market, there were at least three bombings and one mortar attack that killed 11 people, Iraqi officials said.

There was also an increase in the number of bodies found around the city after a brief lull, officials said. At least 20 bodies showing signs of torture were found on the streets of the capital on Monday.

The American military released statements asserting a number of successes in combating both Sunni militants and Shiite militia groups.

An Iraqi unit, aided by American advisers, caught militants in the act of constructing devices known as explosively formed projectiles in a house in Hilla, south of Baghdad, on Saturday, according to the American military. The explosive devices have proved especially lethal to American troops in recent months, and both military commanders and the White House have pointed to Iran as the source of a component essential in making the devices.

The renewed security campaign will rely on winning the trust of the population, and that effort may have been dealt a blow on Monday night, when a woman said on Al Jazeera, the Arabic-language satellite channel, that she had been kidnapped and raped by members of the Iraqi National Police.

The woman, a Sunni, said three members of the National Police stormed into her home in the Amil neighborhood of Baghdad on Sunday while her husband was away, accused her of cooking for militants and took her to a police garrison where the assault occurred.

Although the woman did not say her attackers were Shiites, the National Police is believed to be dominated by Shiites, including elements of the militias that have infiltrated its ranks.

Sunni politicians rushed to condemn the Shiite-led government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and the security crackdown, while some Shiite officials questioned the woman's account.

The woman said she was treated by Americans, but a spokesman for the American military said he had no knowledge of the case. An Iraqi nurse who said she had treated the woman supported her account.

Rape victims rarely come forward in Muslim countries, making the public airing of the account highly unusual.

Aware of the highly charged nature of the woman's claims, Mr. Maliki's office quickly released a statement last night calling for a full investigation and "the severest punishment" for anyone involved.

Brazen Pre-Dawn Attack On U.S. Outpost In Iraq Kills 3, Injures 17 (WP)

By Ernesto Londono And Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 19 -- A U.S. military facility north of Baghdad was targeted Monday by suicide bombers and other armed men who killed three American soldiers and wounded 17 in an unusually brazen attack.

The facility, a former Iraqi police station in the town of Tarmiyah, came under attack shortly before dawn, according to a witness and the spokesman for the local joint coordination center, Capt. Muhammad Awad.

Two suicide car bombers tore through the main gate and detonated their explosives, destroying part of the building, which the U.S. military took over after Iraqi policemen abandoned it last summer because they were threatened by Sunni extremists who control that area.

A gun battle between U.S. troops and armed men raged for about 20 minutes after the initial explosions, as helicopters from the large U.S. military base nearby in Taji rushed to the scene.

Minutes after wounded soldiers were airlifted from the facility, an improvised explosive device blew up about 500 yards away, apparently targeting a U.S. convoy that included a fuel tanker.

U.S. military facilities in Iraq are frequently targeted from a distance with rockets, mortar rounds and sniper fire. But the coordinated frontal attack -- which occurred as hundreds of American soldiers are being deployed to small, similarly vulnerable inner-city posts -- appeared to be a shift toward more aggressive tactics.

DOJ_NMG_0133767

The U.S. military released a brief statement, disclosing only the number of casualties. The statement noted one suicide car bombing. Three U.S. military spokesmen said Monday they had no additional information.

"This was not a spontaneous attack," said Maj. Steven Lamb, a military spokesman. "The matter is under investigation. It would be premature to release anything else."

He said he could not confirm the account provided by Iraqis.

Tarmiyah, with about 150,000 residents, lies on one of the crucial routes to Baghdad, and U.S. forces and Sunni insurgents affiliated with the group al-Qaeda in Iraq have fought vigorously for control of the area. Insurgents had strengthened their grip on the town in recent months after the U.S. military moved a significant number of troops from the area to Baghdad. An Iraqi police unit trained in Jordan deserted last year after being threatened by insurgents.

"This is what happens when you clear and begin to hold, but leave before you finish the hold-and-build process," a U.S. Army officer stationed nearby said Monday night, speaking on condition of anonymity. "We created a vacuum, and al-Qaeda filled it. We lost the people's trust."

The attack came less than a week after U.S. and Iraqi forces launched an ambitious security plan that has made the capital the war's focal point, raising the risk for troops stationed in outlying areas.

Sunni extremists have dramatically altered the fabric of the region in recent months, said a 35-year-old shop owner who lives across the street from the military outpost in Tarmiyah.

"You can no longer find someone selling cigarettes, and you won't find men selling women's underwear," he said, offering an example of strict Islamic codes enforced in the area. Women now cover everything but their eyes and "barbers can't offer modern haircuts," added the man, who confirmed the version of the attack provided by Iraqi officials.

Sunni insurgent attacks on U.S. forces have become increasingly sophisticated and effective in recent months.

"It is hard to judge what is happening in Tarmiyah," said retired Army Maj. Gen. John Batiste, who led a division north of the city in 2004 and 2005. "But for sure we should never underestimate our enemy."

The U.S. military on Monday reported the deaths of seven other service members killed in recent days, including three soldiers who died Monday when a roadside bomb exploded while they were on patrol southwest of Baghdad. Also, three Marines and a soldier were killed in the western province of Anbar in fighting since Saturday, the military said.

On Monday, a Baghdad woman said she was sexually assaulted by an Iraqi Interior Ministry official after she was detained over the weekend.

Iraqi officials initially condemned the reported rape and vowed to hold the perpetrator responsible. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's office, which issued a statement naming the woman, also promised to investigate. It is unclear why Maliki's office named her. The Washington Post does not identify reported victims of sexual crimes.

The woman is a Sunni, and the ministry is controlled by Shiites. Reports of rape are unusual in Iraq. The woman offered an emotional, detailed account in television interviews.

Hours after announcing the investigation, Maliki's office released another statement saying the woman's claims were determined to be unfounded. A spokesman said the report had been fabricated by Arab news stations to undermine the Baghdad security plan.

Insurgents Strike U.S. Outpost In Iraq (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, February 20, 2007

BAGHDAD — Insurgents launched a fiery raid on a U.S. military outpost north of the Iraqi capital Monday, killing two U.S. troops and injuring 17 in a possible foreshadowing of attacks to come as a neighborhood-based Baghdad security plan takes shape.

Police and witnesses said insurgents thought to be Sunni Arabs used at least one suicide car bomber, mortar shells, rockets and small-arms fire in the attack in the agricultural town of Tarmiya.

Fighting sparked by the rare assault on a U.S. base lasted for hours and ended after U.S. fighter jets and ground reinforcements arrived.

Other attacks around Baghdad and western Iraq killed dozens of Iraqis, most of them Shiite Muslims. The U.S. military also reported the deaths of four more troops since Saturday.

The latest violence coincided with the U.S.-Iraqi security crackdown to bring order to the Baghdad area, in part by establishing small neighborhood bases like the one struck Monday.

The raid, as well as continued assaults on Shiite Muslim civilians, suggests insurgents may be attempting to undermine the security plan by attacking far-flung and lightly fortified outposts.

Although the Tarmiya base is not part of the Baghdad security plan, relatively isolated outposts like it are an integral part of the strategy devised by Army Gen. David H. Petraeus, commander of U.S.-led forces in Iraq.

The plan calls for troops to move into community bases to connect with residents and keep an eye on members of the Iraqi security forces, many of whom are seen as instruments of the country's sectarian war.

Tarmiya, a small Sunni agricultural town of 40,000 people along the west bank of the Tigris River about 25 miles north of Baghdad, has long been an insurgent stronghold. The U.S. base is a former Iraqi police station in the center of town. Iraqi police officials said Tarmiya's police were threatened, kidnapped and killed about two months ago.

Authorities said at least one suicide car bomber either rammed into or drove up beside two trucks carrying fuel into the base about 7:30 a.m., igniting an explosion that sent flames dozens of feet into the air.

"Our windows and doors were broken by the blast," said Mohammed Hiali, 22, who lives near the base. "We went out and we saw fire and thick smoke…. There were repeated explosions."

Insurgents then opened fire with rockets mounted on a truck and from a nearby building, Iraqi police officials said. Mortar shells and small-arms fire added to the confusion as U.S. fighter jets, helicopters and ground forces responded in a battle that raged until noon, witnesses said.

U.S. helicopters landed at least five times to evacuate casualties, Iraqi police officials and witnesses said. At least five Iraqi civilians were injured in the crossfire, including a child who suffered a shrapnel wound to the stomach and was taken to a nearby clinic, said Saadi Mashadani, a grocery store owner in the area.

A group calling itself the Iraqi Islamic State, which has declared a Sunni government in several western and central provinces, claimed responsibility for the attack.

"A brave knight from the Martyrs Regiment and a member of the Iraqi Islamic State set off this morning to infiltrate his booby-trapped car inside Tarmiya police station, which was made into a military position by the crusaders," an Internet posting said.

The U.S. tactic of placing troops in small neighborhood bases in effect reverses the trend since 2004, when American forces redeployed into impenetrable bases on the outskirts of Iraqi cities, lowering their profile on Baghdad streets. The aim was to put Iraqi security forces in charge of the country.

Since that time, Sunni insurgents have become more effective. They are able to conduct sophisticated and well-armed attacks on high-profile targets.

The assault on the Tarmiya base comes at a time when Sunni insurgents have also stepped up their attacks on Shiites in marketplaces and in law enforcement. The tactics may be an attempt to goad Shiite militias back into the fight. At least for now, Shiite militias appear to have lowered their profile to avoid clashes with U.S. troops.

"We are giving orders to state soldiers in Baghdad state to confront the Safawid [Shiite] gangs and protect the Sunnis and their mosques," said a statement posted on the Internet on Feb. 15 that heralded the insurgents' campaign, which it dubbed Operation Dignity.

"We will escalate operations against the crusader occupation army and his tails in all states in order to deteriorate enemy morale," the statement said.

Insurgents launched attacks on Shiite civilians and Iraqi security forces throughout the day in Baghdad, with explosions occurring across the capital. U.S. fighter jets scoured the skies as ground forces continued aggressive raids and patrols that have tripped up Shiite militias and reduced the number of sectarian executions.

A bomb struck a crowded outdoor market in a poor, mostly Shiite district on the capital's southeast fringe, killing five people and injuring 28. A roadside bomb killed three police officers and injured two on patrol in the Zafaraniya neighborhood.

A suicide bomber wearing an explosives-packed belt killed five people and injured 11 on a packed minibus in the mostly Shiite Karada neighborhood in Baghdad. Two roadside bombs that exploded near a downtown marketplace killed two people and injured 40.

As twilight fell, mortar rounds struck an often-targeted Shiite neighborhood south of the capital, killing at least one person and injuring at least a dozen, including women and children.

Two car bombs in western Al Anbar province targeted a Sunni tribal leader, Sheik Abdul-Sattar abu Risha, who opposed Sunni insurgent groups linked to Al Qaeda. Abu Risha escaped unharmed, but 13 people were killed and seven were wounded.

A car bomb in Mahmoudiya, 30 miles south of Baghdad, killed one person and injured four. A car bomb parked near the home of an Iraqi army commander in mostly Sunni Duluiya, about 55 miles north of the capital, killed five people and injured five.

Gunmen in Hawija, a Sunni town near the northern city of Kirkuk, killed two Iraqi soldiers.

Shiite militias, despite their lower level of activity, were also apparent. At least 20 bodies of Iraqi men were found in west Baghdad, which contains a number of heavily Sunni neighborhoods, police said.

British forces in Basra said they killed a gunman who opened fire on troops at a checkpoint in a suspected stronghold of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr's Al Mahdi militia.

Iraqis were riveted Monday night by a televised interview with a young woman who said she was raped by Iraqi troops. The teary-eyed woman, a Sunni Arab whose face was mostly covered, said Iraqi security forces searching her west Baghdad neighborhood as part of the security crackdown raped her Monday.

Iraqi officials said they were investigating the woman's allegation.

U.S. officials reported four additional combat deaths Monday. A Marine was killed Saturday, a soldier and a Marine were slain Sunday, and a Marine was killed Monday. All of the deaths were in Al Anbar, a stronghold of the Sunni insurgency.

At least 3,144 U.S. troops have been killed in the Iraq theater, according to icasualties.org.

Iraq Insurgents Attack U.S. Base (CHIT)

By James Janega

Chicago Tribune, February 20, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Insurgents staged a brazen daylight attack Monday on a U.S. compound north of Baghdad as a wave of violence in the capital undermined the 6-day-old security campaign conducted by Iraqi and U.S. forces.

In a sign of the sectarian tensions threatening the country, a Sunni woman appeared on television to say she had been raped by Iraqi national police, most of whom are Shiite. The charge was rejected by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, who called it "made-up noise."

Two U.S. soldiers were killed in the raid on the compound in Tarmiyah, about 30 miles north of Baghdad. Three other soldiers died in an attack on their patrol southwest of Baghdad on Monday. The U.S. military also announced the deaths of three Marines and a soldier in combat over the past three days in Anbar province, bringing the U.S. death toll to nine since Saturday.

The assault in Tarmiyah began with a suicide car bomber who ignited a fuel tank inside the walls of the U.S. compound. Insurgent gunmen then fired into the chaos that ensued.

Helicopters were dispatched from the nearby U.S. base at Taji to evacuate the wounded. The fighting lasted for hours and ended only after U.S. jets and ground reinforcements arrived at the besieged compound.

Besides the two U.S. soldiers killed, 17 were wounded, the military said. A group aligned with Al Qaeda in Iraq claimed responsibility for the attack.

There was violence in Baghdad as well, despite the new security effort concentrated there.

At least 11 people were reported killed in a mortar attack on a Shiite enclave and five died when a suicide attacker with an explosive belt boarded a bus bound for the mostly Shiite district of Karradah in central Baghdad, The Associated Press reported. About 9 miles northwest of Baghdad, gunmen stopped a minivan and killed all 13 people aboard.

Nearly 100 people have died in attacks in the Baghdad area in the last two days, mostly in areas that are predominantly Shiite. The worst violence occurred Sunday when two car bombs exploded in the Shiite neighborhood of the Baghdad al-Jadid, killing 62 people and injuring more than 130. That attack followed a lull in violence in the first four days of the security crackdown, known officially as "Impose the Law."

Sunnis have criticized the new security plan, saying they are being unfairly targeted. The Sunni woman's allegation that she was assaulted by three members of the national police fed Sunni apprehensions about "Impose the Law."

"This is one of the signs that this plan will fail like others before," said Sunni parliament member Mohammed al-Dyni, a critic of al-Maliki.

The rape allegations first appeared Monday in the Baghdad newspaper Azzaman and were repeated later on Al-Jazeera television. The veiled woman, wearing what appeared to be a hospital bracelet, described the ordeal in detail as she wept on camera.

The report prompted a swift denial by Prime Minister al-Maliki, who said the woman in question had been sought for arrest by Iraqi security forces, and that medical tests showed she had not been assaulted.

In a statement early Tuesday, al-Maliki declared: "The aim of this made-up noise—which is done by known political partisans—is to distort the 'Impose the Law' security plan and to tarnish our armed forces that are hunting down the terrorist organizations."

He added that the accused officers will be rewarded for enduring false accusations.

But the allegation and other Sunni grievances may pose a significant challenge to the security push.

"We hope the security plan will target those who violate the law," said parliament member Omer al-Jebouri, of the Iraqi Front for National Dialogue. "The previous plans did not succeed, and this plan, I don't think it will make more progress than the others, unless we stop the sectarian talk."

"Otherwise," he warned, "there will be huge problems in the country."

DOJ_NMG_0133770

In other violence Monday:

A suicide car bomber attacked a police checkpoint in the Sunni city of Ramadi in Anbar province, killing two Iraqi police officers, the U.S. military said. Shortly after, a second suicide car bomber struck a house near the checkpoint, wounding eight women and five children.

Five people, including a 6-year-old boy, were killed by a roadside bomb in the northern city of Tal Afar, local official Najim Abdullah said.

Tribune foreign correspondent Liz Sly and Nadeem Majeed in Baghdad contributed to this report, along with Tribune news services.

Car Bombs Kill At Least 11 In Baghdad (AP)

AP, February 20, 2007

Car bombs killed at least 11 people in Baghdad on Tuesday as militants show increasing defiance to a major security operation in the capital.

A car rigged with explosives tore through a street in the Sadiyah district in southwestern Baghdad. At least six people were killed and 14 injured, police said.

The neighborhood is mixed between the majority Shiites and Sunnis, whose militant factions are blamed for many of the recent bombings and attacks.

Later, a suicide attacker drove a bomb-laden car into a vegetable market in the Shiite enclave of Dora in southern Baghdad. At least five people were killed and seven injured, police said.

The same market was targeted last month by three car bombs that killed 10 people.

More than 100 people have been killed in the Baghdad area since Sunday, when twin blasts in a market claimed 62 lives. U.S. and Iraqi forces last week launched a massive effort of house-to-house searches and checkpoints around Baghdad to try to cripple extremist factions.

Outside Baghdad, more than 100 people were hospitalized complaining of breathing problems after a truck carrying fuel tanks exploded north of Baghdad, police and medical officials said.

At least one person died in the blast near Taji, about 12 miles northwest of Baghdad, said Mohammad Abbas, an emergency room overseer at Kazmiyah Hospital.

People treated at Kazmiyah and other hospitals said they had trouble breathing and were vomiting, but the cause was not immediately known, he said. Among those hospitalized were dozens of children.

Chemical experts collected samples from the tanker and conducted air tests.

Military Says Attacks In Baghdad Have Dropped (USAT)

By Oren Dorell And Rick Jervis

USA Today, February 20, 2007

BAGHDAD — The number of extremist attacks in Baghdad has declined over the past two weeks since a new security plan took hold, although the relative lull may be short-lived, the U.S. military said Monday.

Bombings on Monday that killed more than 40 Iraqis demonstrated that extremists were still staging attacks aimed at grabbing headlines, but the overall number of attacks on U.S. and Iraqi troops has fallen, said Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a spokesman for the U.S. military.

Reinforcements began arriving last month as part of President Bush's plan to expand the U.S. force by 21,500. They have joined with Iraqi forces to provide a 24-hour presence in some violent neighborhoods where troops previously had patrolled only by daylight. New roadblocks and house-to-house sweeps have targeted sectarian militias.

Garver said there had been fewer attacks in the past few days. He declined to provide statistics.

"We also look for the enemy to look for opportunities to attack back," Garver said. "They still want to launch spectacular attacks to embarrass the government."

Gen. David Petraeus, the new commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, warned last month that it could be late summer before it becomes clear whether the new security plan is working.

Garver said there has been a decline in reported sectarian kidnappings and apparent murder victims in the Baghdad morgue. The average number of bodies brought to the morgue a day has dropped in the past week to 10 from 50 to 60 a month ago, the Associated Press reported.

Mohamed Al Daiyni, a member of Al Tawafek, the largest Sunni coalition in the parliament, said violence was down because "all the fighting groups are hiding."

"If there is any lull in violence, it will be temporary," Al Daiyni said. "I am not optimistic at all, and I know the chaos will be back."

Garver said the motives might prove irrelevant.

"Them putting off their attacks has the potential to work in our favor," Garver said. "The longer we have to get the police and army into the neighborhoods and accomplishing the mission, the better chance we have to get the security to take hold."

Hundreds of militia members and leaders have been detained in security operations over the past three weeks, said Maj. Steven Lamb, a military spokesman.

Lamb said the area around Haifa Street in central Baghdad, where U.S. forces engaged in violent street battles a month ago, is now mostly in the hands of Iraqi forces.

"It's taking small bites of the city," Lamb said.

The relative lull follows a violent 2006 in Iraq. The number of insurgent attacks increased by 20% last year to 40,801 attacks, according to U.S. military data obtained by USA TODAY.

Also Monday:

·Insurgents staged a daylight assault against a U.S. combat post north of the capital Monday — first striking with a suicide car bombing, then firing on soldiers pinned down in a former Iraqi police station. At least two U.S. soldiers were killed and 17 wounded, the military said.

·On a highway just northwest of Baghdad, gunmen stopped a minivan and killed all 13 occupants, accusing them of opposing al-Qaeda in Iraq, police and witnesses told the Associated Press.

Mixed Welcome For Baghdad Surge (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

BAGHDAD

Iraqi and American forces are meeting mixed results – that often vary street by street and day by day – as they struggle to regain control of Baghdad.

Two days of relative calm in the capital prompted Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to declare a "dazzling success" in the security clampdown, as officials reported an 80 percent drop in violence.

Some neighborhoods are seeing tentative early progress in this city of 6 million, where a surge of Iraqi and American forces started last week. The effort is meant to replace rampant violence with security, crush militants, and enable tens of thousands of people displaced by sectarian fighting to return to their homes.

But the relative calm has been followed by car and suicide bombs that killed 60 on Sunday and at least 10 more Monday.

Throughout Baghdad, the security plan is being viewed through a sectarian lens, despite Mr. Maliki's promise to pummel equally Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias.

For example, buoyed by hope that he could return home after being forced out by Sunni insurgents, Moayad entered his street Saturday behind Iraqi commandos backed by Americans.

The carpenter and 50 other Shiite residents were pleased to see a dozen insurgents arrested, cuffed, and blindfolded.

But as they picked through their trashed houses in the religiously mixed Al Amel neighborhood, their sense of safety was short-lived. "When [the Iraqi commandos] finished, an American officer came and said to release [the insurgents]," says Moayad and other witnesses. "Even the Iraqi officers were very angry, and went back to their base."

While inexplicable, that decision drew angry reactions from Shiites there that wanted to return home – and highlights the colliding sectarian interests at play as US and Iraqi forces seek to impose order.

When those Sunnis who had occupied their houses were released in Al Amel – two of whom had attempted to kill him one month ago, he says – Moayad and other Shiite returnees had no choice but to depart again.

"I think the Americans want the security plan to fail," he asserts. "I was very hopeful [when it was announced]. But today, after the Americans released these insurgents, I will never respect US troops again."

A US military spokesman said he could not yet comment upon the specific incident by press time, but said it would be pursued: "This is serious allegation, and we're definitely going to be looking into it," said US Army Sgt. Matthew Roe.

Monday in Al Amel district, where Moayad once lived, Iraqi commandos driving through came under fire from Sunni insurgents. One Iraqi soldier was killed and three wounded in an attack in which residents joined with their rifles – later the Iraqi commander thanked them, witnesses said – to quell the insurgent shooting.

Maliki said the bombs "confirm the defeat of these perpetrators and their failure in confronting our armed forces, which are determined to cleanse the dens of terrorism."

But the string of bombings show how difficult reining in Iraq's violence will be. One attack Monday left two US soldiers dead and at least 17 wounded when a bomb exploded in a sophisticated attack on an American-Iraqi base north of Baghdad.

Daily average of deaths drops

Still, many Iraqis say they have seen some positive steps in the days since the surge officially came into effect last Thursday. And not just because several hundred Iraqis are reported to have been able to return home, or that the daily average of 50 dead bodies on the streets has dropped to single digits in recent days.

"People are very, very happy," with the replacement of a commando unit that refused to go after Shiite militiamen by a regular Iraqi Army unit in the southeast district of Zafaraniyeh, says a resident who could not be named.

"When they came 10 days ago, there was chaos and killing. Since then, I have not heard of a single person being killed," says the resident. It is the new Iraqi commander who is making the difference.

"He came and took the Shiite and Sunni clerics to lunch and told them: 'I am not a sectarian man, and all should be under the law, Sunni and Shiite,' " says the resident, quoting the new commander. " 'If you help me, we will help you. If you don't cooperate with me, you will be breaking the law, and I will crush you.' "

That commander has "made many changes and tells people he will be responsible for supplying all families with cooking fuel," says the Zafaraniyeh resident. He has also marked each official checkpoint with a large number – so people can more easily spot fake checkpoints – and his Iraqi forces are searching every vehicle, including police convoys. On Friday, a joint US-Iraq checkpoint there snagged a "police" colonel who proved to be an imposter after calls were made to the Ministry of Interior to check his identity.

The insurgent stronghold of Dora, with its Sunni majority, has also been a key target of US and Iraqi efforts since the Baghdad security plan was first announced more than a month ago. In a 3:30 a.m. raid a month back, US troops arrived in two helicopters, surrounded a house, and took away two key insurgents.

"They had very sure information," says Dora resident who watched the raid take place. "When [the US] captured these guys, many people had a good feeling, because these two people caused big problems. They forced many [Shiite] families to leave. They were known insurgents."

In subsequent raids, US and Iraqi forces have tread carefully, looking for information about suspect trouble-makers as much as breaking in doors and searching suspicious cars for weaponry and bombs. This resident was handed a scrap of paper, printed in Arabic, which gives a mobile phone number and e-mail address to pass on tips to a US infantry unit, and reads: "Please call this number, to tell about any terrorist activities."

While carefully behaved US troops and their Iraqi translators may glean some information this way, other actions undermine their cause. In one case, the brother of this Dora resident was searched. The family was told to wait in the kitchen. US troops left, and then as the Iraqis were leaving, one asked the family to "check their money." Indeed, nearly $200 in Iraqi currency had disappeared. The Iraqi officer – in a line the family does not believe–blamed the Americans, and then left.

Sectarian view of the surge

So far the surge has yielded little head-to-head confrontation between US forces and Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias. US officers say they expect both sides to have hidden their weapons or drifted away for the time being, until the surge passes.

Shiite areas controlled by the Mahdi Army, loyal to anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, are meant to be a particular US target because of links with death squads that have been killing dozens of Sunnis a day. Maliki's government, which relies on Mr. Sadr's supporter to rule, is reported to have pushed for Sunni areas to be cleaned up first.

Sunni leaders have cried foul, with Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi telling Al Jazeera TV on Sunday that leaks of the plan to Shiite militia chiefs meant a "golden opportunity for Iraq has been squandered."

But the perspective from Shiite areas is exactly the opposite.

"[Shiites] believe that this security plan is against the Shiites of Iraq – it's an American plan, [President George] Bush's plan, to limit the Shiites of Iraq," says a resident of Sadr City, the sprawling Shiite slum and Mahdi Army stronghold of northeast Baghdad.

"The dirty Iraqi troops with the Americans, they detain many, many people," the resident says, referring to a special Iraqi unit based at the Baghdad Airport that works with US forces in some cases. "If they see a picture of Moqtada in your house, they will detain you."

The cleric himself, this resident says, has ordered his followers – who battled US forces twice in 2004 – not to take on the Americans. Mahdi Army fighters confirm those orders.

"We are following Moqtada's orders, and if he says don't fight [the Americans], we won't," says a Mahdi Army fighter who took part in those 2004 uprisings, and asked not to be named. "We know America wants to make a mass killing of Sadrists, so we should avoid this, by following Moqtada's orders."

And the growing US presence is not universally rejected in Sadr City. "Sometimes they stop the bad people – it's a good service for us, and we should stop them. I feel safer," adds the resident. "Some people are happy with the [Iraqi] troops, and cook dinner for them."

But it may be some time before the Shiite residents of Al Amel, in south Baghdad, make peace with the US troops who they say enabled the release of the arrested Sunni insurgents on Saturday.

Al Amel resident Sadiq, who would not give his last name, fled over the New Year, after a gang of Sunnis – including three (former) friends – shot up his house one night, sending a message to multiple Shiite households to leave.

"We surrendered to reality," says Sadiq, who once ran a computer gaming center on the main street. "We are not fighters or armed. We just took our ID cards, and left our money and gold. We expected to go back."

But now that money and gold is stolen. Along with six computers he was keeping at home, after his business was forced to close. "Today, the important thing is to return back to my home," he says. "I have an unknown future."

So does Moayad, who would also only give his first name, who was attacked by two gunmen early one morning a month ago, as he went to clean his car. A video on his mobile phone shows the vehicle peppered with 15 rounds.

"When they came to assassinate me, they came without any masks, because they were sure they would kill me," says Moayad, who himself wore a mask during the Saturday operation, so he would not be recognized by insurgents.

He has received many phone calls, crudely threatening him and his family. And the same day that gunmen attacked him, he had another close call. Saying goodbye to other neighbors who had congratulated him on his good luck at surviving, he was standing in the doorway with his arm raised when a sniper shot through the cloth of his shirt at the armpit.

Three days later, out of money and ammunition, Moayad gave up his home.

"We are disappointed by the government and US soldiers," says Moayad. "In the future, if they don't help us, we will have to call on the militias and join them, even though that will not solve the problems."

Marines In Iraq's Al Anbar Cope With Daily Grind (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, February 20, 2007

In farming communities along the Syrian border, U.S. Marines work with Iraqis to open health clinics and a job center and to improve trash collection and water delivery.

In Fallouja, Marines at a center for displaced people greet Sunni Muslims from Baghdad seeking sanctuary from Shiite Muslim death squads.

And along the sniper alley of a freeway that runs between Fallouja and Ramadi, Marines patrol less like warriors than traffic cops.

Rather than charge into battle, most Marines in Iraq's western desert are engaged in nation building on a piecemeal basis, the kind of venture President Bush once publicly disdained. Trained to win quick, decisive victories with firepower and bravery, Marines in Al Anbar province instead face a daily grind. Most never fire their weapons.

The Marine Corps has even changed the rules for its coveted Combat Action Ribbon, allowing troops to win the award even when no shots are fired.

A sign outside the chow hall at the base in this town near the Syrian border sums up the slow, incremental nature of the campaign: "Rebuilding Iraq one meal at a time."

Bush said during his State of the Union address that "this is not the fight we entered in Iraq, but it is the fight we are in." To the 20,000-plus troops in Al Anbar, soon to be reinforced under the administration's troop-increase plan, that wasn't news.

"I wasn't taught any of these things in infantry school," said Lt. Col. Scott Shuster, commander of the 3rd Battalion, 4th Regiment, with responsibility for Qaim.

Al Anbar, the vast province that sprawls from the Euphrates River valley west to the borders of Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia, remains deadly. About one-third of U.S. casualties since the invasion of Iraq in 2003 have occurred here, and the danger of roadside bombs in particular is ever present. At nearly every base, a list of Marines killed in action is posted on a wall.

"Inside the wire, [duty in Iraq] is better; outside the wire, it's not," said Lance Cpl. Stephen Herring, 20, of Pontiac, Mich., referring to the security of the base.

What has changed is not the violence, but the U.S. expectations. Just over two years ago, after the second battle of Fallouja, Lt. Gen. John F. Sattler, then commander of the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force, boasted that U.S. forces had "broken the back of the insurgency." Now the watchword is that all gains are small and that prevailing here could take years.

"I think we're making progress," said Capt. Glen Taylor, executive officer of Golf Company of the 2nd Battalion, 8th Regiment, with troops in a run-down hotel in the farm town of Saqlawiya. "I don't know it will ever be enough, but I think the progress is real."

Fighting an insurgency is frustrating. "You cut off the head and the body doesn't necessarily die," Taylor said.

For one group of Marines, Al Anbar is a target-rich environment: The civil affairs groups, often reservists, describe their mission with the military acronym SWEAT, which refers to rebuilding the sewage, water, electricity, academic and trash-removal infrastructure ravaged by decades of neglect and three years of insurgent attacks.

"The challenges are the same as back home, just 100 times more difficult," said Staff Sgt. Christopher Garcia, a city planner in San Antonio.

Elsewhere in the province, Americans find themselves taking on duties they had not expected. In Ramadi, an Army lieutenant colonel trained as an artillery officer spends his days trying to make sure Iraqi police get paid, lest they desert and join the insurgents. In Haditha, Marines patrol on foot, greeting Iraqis at a market, trying to win hearts and minds one at a time.

In numerous communities, including Saqlawiya, Marines listen to the complaints of Iraqis about war-damaged homes and businesses, making payments in cases where the damage was caused by Marines. Every payment comes with a gentle lecture: It's time you choose between the insurgents and us.

There is an ad hoc quality to much of the Marines' strategy. "We're just trying to explore all avenues," Lt. Col. Blair Estep said.

There have been setbacks almost everywhere, sometimes caused by trusting the wrong people: Iraqi contractors who turn out to be insurgents; sheiks pretending to have more authority than they do; scam artists trying to get payments, such as a woman in Ramadi who showed the Marines her husband's death certificate, which was dated the following day.

Marine leaders plead for patience among their troops and the American public. A counterinsurgency operation such as the one in Al Anbar is slow, and gauging its progress is like trying to measure a child's growth on a daily basis, Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer said.

Even when there are hopeful signs, they are contradicted by disappointing ones.

Lt. Col. James Donnellan, who commands a Marine battalion with responsibility for a triad of towns along the Euphrates, is buoyed by support from the local police chief and a friendly, if tentative, attitude from residents.

Still, the competency of the police is questionable. When a joint Marine-Iraqi convoy was attacked recently, police officers began firing in all directions. Donnellan said it was fortunate no civilians or friendly forces were hurt. "Luckily the police are no better shots than the terrorists," he said.

For the enlisted ranks, particularly those stationed in more austere settings, away from the comforts of mess halls and movie nights and Internet cafes, the "Groundhog Day" repetition of duty in Al Anbar can be wearing.

"Sometimes you get down, because it seems nothing is going right," said Lance Cpl. Korby Rhodes, 21, of Park City, Kan., stationed at the spartan Camp Gannon. "You just have to get over it. You can't linger, you just have to get over it."

Young men become Marines to fight, not to spend their days protecting convoys from roadside bombs or trying to mentor Iraqis on how to be police officers in their own country.

"I had more of an idea of OIF1 stuck in my head," said Lance Cpl. Robert Warren, 20, of Palmdale, using the military acronym for the 2003 U.S.-led assault on Baghdad.

Commanders watch for signs that Marines, out of frustration or exhaustion, are too rough with the civilians they encounter at checkpoints or on foot patrols.

"There is a tendency among the young Marines to think it's as kinetic [combative] as it was once," said Maj. John Polidoro, whose troops live in tents in the dusty Euphrates valley.

Troops who have seen buddies killed by roadside bombs or snipers have learned to mourn quickly and move on.

"It's not like it gets easier, it's like we're bottling it up, saving our grief," said Navy corpsman Adam O'Gara, 27, in his second deployment in Iraq.

Col. Sean MacFarland, commander of the 1st Brigade of the 1st Armored Division, an Army unit that controls Ramadi and answers to a Marine general, said the Al Anbar strategy could be summarized by a quotation from British philosopher Thomas Hobbes: "Be sociable with them that will be sociable, and be formidable with them that will not."

Reminded that Hobbes also said that life is "poor, nasty, brutish and short," MacFarland replied, "Yes, that sounds like Ramadi."

Conservatives Target GOP War Critics In Congress (POL)

By Patrick O'Connor And Josh Kraushaar

The Politico, February 20, 2007

House Republican leaders and conservative activists are targeting critics of President Bush's plan to send more combat forces into Iraq -- and some GOP lawmakers are on the hit list.

DOJ_NMG_0133775

Amid a mounting campaign in Congress to limit Bush's military options, conservatives led by talk show host Hugh Hewitt have created an advocacy group designed to counter the anti-war MoveOn.org. And its first round of targets will be the 17 GOP lawmakers who voted for last week's Democratic resolution in the House opposing the troop increases.

First in the sights of the new Victory Caucus is Rep. Ric Keller, R-Fla., whose district includes Orlando.

While Hewitt carries considerable sway among conservatives, the fledgling Victory Caucus starts out with little of the money and prominence of MoveOn.org, now nationally entrenched as a liberal interest group.

At the same time, House Republicans are hitting Democrats who represent districts Bush won in hopes of preventing a congressional majority that would restrict money for Afghanistan and Iraq. The GOP is flooding those districts with news releases and e-mails warning that Democrats are undermining U.S. troops.

Republicans claim the campaign already has paid off in South Dakota, where the Sioux Falls Argus Leader ran a column over the weekend highlighting how Democratic Rep. Stephanie Herseth is pinched between party leaders and conservative voters in the state.

"We will certainly expose any Democrat who promised to fund the troops in order to get elected who turns around and supports a slow-bleed strategy now that they're here and their leadership is calling the shots," said Jessica Boulanger, communications director for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

The GOP political strategy is to shift the focus away from an unpopular war and unpopular president to the Republican claim that Democrats would abandon the troops.

"They're trying to go on offense on their biggest liability, and it's not going to work because they're losing on the issue," said Jennifer Crider, communications director for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Republicans are trying to force a House vote on a binding measure to prevent cutting or restricting money for the war.

Rep. Sam Johnson of Texas, a prisoner of war in Vietnam, is leading the effort, with the backing of Minority Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri and his chief deputy, Rep. Eric Cantor of Virginia. They are gathering signatures for a discharge petition to force a vote on the issue, but the effort is almost certain to fail because it would need to attract some Democratic support.

In the meantime, the Victory Caucus hopes to shame Republicans into sticking with their leaders on upcoming votes on defense spending. "This is a means of getting out a message," said Dean Barnett, a member of the Victory Caucus Board of Governors. "We're letting the political class know there's a huge chunk of people out there that want victory."

Keller is a prime target, organizers say, because of his House speech last week comparing the Iraq war with a neighbor's unkempt lawn. "Imagine that you have a next-door neighbor who refuses to mow his lawn, and the weeds are up to his waist," Keller said. "You mow his lawn for him every single week. The neighbor never says thank you, he hates you and sometimes he takes out a gun and shoots at you. Under these circumstances, would you keep mowing his lawn forever?"

Barnett responded on his blog: "In the virtual special ed class that is our Congress, Keller sits in the virtual corner wearing the virtual dunce cap."

Keller is in many ways a surprising target for conservatives. He won a competitive primary in 2000 by running to the right of his opponent -- on an anti-abortion, anti-tax platform that won support from the conservative Club for Growth.

"The Iraq issue transcends partisan politics," Barnett said. "Keller may be a rock-ribbed conservative but on the biggest issue of our day, he's got it wrong."

Hewitt is asking his listeners to identify any potential primary challengers to Keller who are supportive of the Iraq war and to commit funding to such a campaign. He also announced he would not be donating to the National Republican Congressional Committee because of its support for "White Flag Republicans."

Weekly Standard editor Bill Kristol sounded a similar note on "Fox News Sunday."

"There's something called primaries we have in America, and there will be primary challenges in the Republican Party against some of those congressmen," Kristol said. "And they deserve to be primaried, because they are acting, I think, in a shameful way."

Unlike their Senate counterparts, most of the 17 dissenting House Republicans will not likely face tough re-election campaigns.

Only Rep. Jim Walsh, R-N.Y., had a difficult re-election in 2006. And based on the demographics of their districts, Republican Reps. Mike Castle of Delaware, Jim Ramstad of Minnesota, Mark Kirk of Illinois and Keller could face serious challenges next year.

None of the perennially targeted GOP incumbents, such as Reps. Christopher Shays of Connecticut, Heather Wilson of New Mexico or Jim Gerlach of Pennsylvania, voted with the Democrats.

Liberal bloggers have already been involved in several high-profile primary battles with limited success. They helped Ned Lamont topple Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman in the Democratic primary, but he lost in the general election and Lieberman was elected as an independent.

They also were unsuccessful when Democrat Ciro Rodriguez fell short in his primary challenge against Rep. Henry Cuellar, D-Texas. Later, Rodriguez came back to defeat Republican Rep. Henry Bonilla in a December special election.

On the budget side, Democrats and centrist Republicans should shift substantial funding for combat operations in Iraq over to the Veterans's Administration budget and the DOD budget for Walter Reed Army Medical Center. Long term care for Veterans is atrocious. The number of wounded veterans returning from Iraq is greater than expected, and they are not getting the care they need. See:

?Soldiers Face Neglect, Frustration at Army's Top Medical Facility? Sunday, February 18, 2007. Anne Hall & Dana Priest. Washington Post.

?The Hotel Aftermath? Monday, February 19, 2007, Anne Hall & Dana Priest. Washington Post.

Democrats and centrist Republicans should stand with the vets on this issue. Our veterans should be receiving the best care available, not mice-infested, run-down, isolated tenement dorms serving as an excuse for treatment. For more information, see www.votevets.org.

The war on Iraq was a collosal blunder from Day 1, in large part a product of the aggressive campaign by Israeli Lobby/neocons to get our country involved in wars with Israel's enemies (a campaign that continues still). Republicans were in power at the time; if the Democrats had been in power the same organizations would have waged the same campaign and the result might well have been the same. So honest Republicans should not be afraid to call the Iraq war what it is ... a collosal blunder and a national disgrace. But now, given the present situation, what is now best for America? That is a reasonable subject for discussion and no honest representative, Republican or Democrat, should duck the issue or cede his judgment to party leaders. This is a time for courage and leadership, a time to act in America's best interests. It is not a time for politics.

by Steve Slatten on 02.19.2007 at 11:47 PM

Yes, let the Republicans primary their only sensible members out of existence. Americans have HAD IT with this sham of a war. I think some GOP House members understand this and they're tired of being deck hands on Bush's Titanic. If the GOP didn't get the memo that voters sent them in '06, they'll just keep on losing. Sounds good to me!

IN 2002 in Georgia, the Republicans ran T V ads against Senator Max Clelland featuring Pictures of Clelland always followed by Osama Bin Laden ? Saxby Chambliss thought it was fair advertising ? Why does it not surprise me that they would turn on their own ? I can just imagine what the "turncoats" will see and hear? I am guessing terms like "un-american"--- "aide &comfort to the enemy"--- ? Can anyone think of other famous putdowns they use ?

by Hugh E. Scott on 02.19.2007 at 09:35 PM

So who is Hugh Hewitt? you might wonder.

Simple answer. An arch neocon who, like 99% of rightwing pundits, never wore the the uniform much less saw combat.

Hewitt shares air time at Townhall Talk Radio with four other neocons who never served: PNAC founder Bill Bennett, Mike Ghallager, Michael Medved and Dennis Praeger.

There is one more member of the goose-stepping Townhall group worth mentioning: John Newbury, whose talk show is called "National Defense."

He makes no bones about his rightwing Republican bent. On the Townhall website, Newbury sells self-described "conservative" T-shirts which he calls the "largest selection of liberal-baiting merchandise on the Net."

He also touts two favorable books about 2008 GOP presidential candidates John McCain and Mitt Romney. There are no pro-Democrat publications or other such products advertised on Newbury's home page.

And who helps pay John Newbury's salary?

The Veterans of Foreign Wars (VFW), which is supposed to be a NONpartisan association. By sponsoring John Newbury and no other voice on Townhall Talk Radio, the VFW shows itself at the national level to be a biased rightwing organization.

The political prejudice also proves how pervasive is the neconservative movement. For that reason, with much regret, I withdrew my VFW membership application in January 2007.

I can't believe this whole mess. It's the same old politics as usual. The dems are no better than the republicans. This country is in dire need of a third party that can reform the way congress and the senate operate. Until all the old fat cats are booted out and replaced with people that really reflect the national mood on Iraq, the economy, immigration , education, roe v. wade etc., we deserve these fat white dudes and their equally repugnant business as usual attitudes.

The Antiwar Rallying Point (WP)

By E. J. Dionne

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

Two things are now abundantly clear about the future of U.S. policy toward Iraq. First, majorities in both houses of Congress have lost faith in President Bush's approach to the war. Second, the president will do all he can to resist changing his strategy by trying to split his critics into ineffectual factions.

Bush's choice is certainly bad for opponents of the war, but it's also bad for American foreign policy.

The president is inviting a full-scale confrontation over his warmaking powers in the expectation that the Democrats' narrow majorities will deprive them of the votes they need to win such a fight. He is ready to split the country rather than give any ground to those who ask whether it's wise to risk ensnaring American troops in a Sunni-Shiite civil war.

The challenge to critics of the war is to make the debate about Bush, not about themselves, and to make clear that the president has rebuffed all efforts to pursue a bipartisan path out of Iraq, beginning with his rejection of the core recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, headed by James A. Baker III and Lee Hamilton.

Changing our policy will require a substantial Republican rebellion. The 17 House Republicans who voted for the resolution opposing the president's surge and the seven Senate Republicans who tried to get a vote for the House-passed measure are a start.

The next steps pursued by the war's critics must be premised on the goal of expanding this circle of Republican opposition, because, as Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.) put it on "Meet the Press" over the weekend, "Republican influence on the president might be more decisive than the Democratic voices."

For now, the war's opponents are focused on three strategies. One would be to cut off funds for the war, but there is currently no majority in either house for this. A second approach, expected to come from Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), would propose restrictions on troop deployments -- for example, forbidding the redeployment of units that have been home for less than a year and imposing substantial training requirements on the troops who are sent.

The Murtha measure would at least force a much-needed debate on the damage this war has done to our armed forces and the extraordinary burdens being borne by the brave minority of Americans who serve. It would also sidestep the political damage of doing anything that could be construed by Bush's supporters as "failing to support our troops."

But the sense that the proposal has been crafted in part for reasons of political convenience and the intricate restrictions it would place on the military are precisely what could doom it. The war's opponents need other options.

A third path, offered by Sens. Joseph Biden (D-Del.) and Carl Levin (D-Mich.), would have Congress revisit its original 2002 Iraq resolution to make clear that the war authorized then (against Saddam Hussein and what turned out to be nonexistent weapons of mass destruction) had nothing to do with putting American troops in the midst of a Muslim civil war now.

The Biden-Levin idea has the advantage of pushing Republicans who are quietly doubtful about Bush's path out into the open. In particular, Sen. Richard Lugar (R-Ind.), who rightly called this weekend for a more bipartisan approach to Iraq, nonetheless keeps voting his party's line. That, in turn, enables Bush to pursue the very sort of divisive partisanship on the war that Lugar says he's against.

Lugar and others in his party who harbor doubts about Bush's approach must be challenged again and again to justify actions that allow the president to bull ahead by dividing his opposition.

Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) has an additional idea: Opponents of the war need to force full consideration of the original Baker-Hamilton proposals that, he said, promised to put American policy "on a trajectory to have our combat troops out of Iraq this time next year" and reflected "the center of gravity in Congress." Whatever its flaws, the Iraq Study Group report could still serve as a focal point for sharply reducing America's military role in Iraq before the 2008 election.

"The refusal of the administration to try to work with others to resolve this in a responsible manner has created a very polarized atmosphere," Van Hollen said. "They've refused to listen to anyone else."

That should be the central theme of the president's critics because it's true -- and because it offers the best rallying cry for those seeking to change a disastrous policy.

A Big Fight On The Hill (USNEWS)

By Silla Brush

U.S. News and World Report, February 19, 2007

Congress has been talking about it for weeks, jousting, posturing, and trading partisan jabs. Last week, the Democrats who control the House of Representatives finally got around to actually voting on President Bush's new policy in Iraq. After four days of debate, the 246-to-182 ballot in favor of a brief, nonbinding resolution opposing the president's plan to add more than 20,000 troops seemed, well, anticlimactic.

Perhaps that's because it was. While it was a resounding vote of no confidence in the president's plan, it was also just the first of many legislative battles as Congress decides how strenuously to exert its constitutional powers to control funding for the war. That process is many months away from conclusion, but the political stakes are ratcheting up almost by the day.

Democrats voted nearly unanimously for the resolution last week, save for two members, and they were joined by a varied lot of 17 Republicans. Some, like Walter Jones of North Carolina, were early supporters of the Iraq war who eventually turned against the president. Others, like Michael Castle of Delaware, could face tough re-election campaigns in 2008.

Hanging tough. Despite the increasing pressure, the president shows no signs of backing away from his insistence on "victory." He hopes that the situation improves and that Iraqi forces can gradually take more responsibility. But he believes he can accomplish the planned troop surge and maintain whatever troop levels are necessary through the end of his presidency, in January 2009, White House advisers say. Those advisers are clinging to the hope that, in the end, most congressional Democrats won't vote to cut off funds for the troops.

Democrats are calling the House resolution "Step 1" in their approach toward shaping Iraq policy. Next up is the Senate, which so far has failed to even muster a vote on Iraq. At week's end, senators were poised to take up a measure that could lead to consideration of the same language passed by the House.

But the fight on Capitol Hill is already shifting to much tougher ground: the budget process. The president is requesting $93.4 billion in supplemental funding for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, and next month Congress will consider whether to make changes to that budget request or other alterations to Bush's plan. In mid-March, the House International Relations Committee will hold hearings to consider about a dozen bills on Iraq, including efforts to withdraw troops from Iraq and proposals to force the Defense Department to change how it reviews contracts in Iraq for fraud and abuse.

In interviews and announcements last week coordinated with antiwar interest groups, Rep. John Murtha, the Pennsylvania Democrat shepherding the Pentagon spending bill through Congress as chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, detailed a process that would set conditions on the bill, thereby tying the president's hands. Murtha's plan-Democratic activists dub it "the readiness strategy"-would, in part, require that soldiers have at least one year at home before they're redeployed for a second tour and would ensure that troops have appropriate training and equipment under military guidelines. It would also end "stop loss" procedures that extend soldiers' tours. The upshot? "This vote will limit the options of the president," Murtha says, "and should stop the surge."

The Elusive Quds Force (NSWK)

By Christopher Dickey And John Barry

Newsweek, February 19, 2007

The Iranian Special Operations unit called the Quds Force has for years been accused, with or without evidence, of assassinations and terrorist attacks as far away as Argentina. But its specialty is different: striking fear in the hearts of generals. Over the past 25 years, the Quds Force has proved ferociously effective at organizing, training and equipping guerrillas to confront the world's most vaunted armies. Quds played a vital role in creating Hizbullah to fight the Israelis in Lebanon. It supported the legendary Ahmed Shah Massoud against the Russians and his Taliban rivals in Afghanistan. Quds helped the Bosnians hold back the Serbian war machine. And now—it's in Iraq.

"What matters is that they're there," President George W. Bush said last week. Precisely why, at whose direction or invitation, and with what long-term goals: all that remains in doubt. Bush, even as he said the group had "harmed our troops," suggested how much remains unknown: "I do not know whether or not the Quds Force was ordered from the top echelons of [the Iranian] government. But my point is: what's worse—them ordering it and it happening, or them not ordering it and it happening?"

Actually, what's worse is that the unit appears to be as close to America's Shiite and Kurdish allies as to splinter groups accused of killing perhaps 170 of the more than 3,000 American soldiers who've died in Iraq. The relationship between the Quds Force and figures like Iraqi President Jalal Talabani or Abdul Aziz al-Hakim of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (both of whom have been received in the White House recently) goes back two decades to the days when only Tehran was aiding Saddam Hussein's enemies. "Do the Americans think they would stop working with us because Americans told them so?" says an Iranian intelligence official who is not authorized to speak on the record. Quds operatives captured recently were working directly under the protection, respectively, of Talabani and Hakim.

Because of the bad intelligence that the Bush administration used to pave the way to war with Iraq in 2003, skeptics worry it may be using similar tactics to provoke a fight with Iran. But when it comes to the Quds Force, the American military's concerns are much more down to earth. The weapons known as "explosively formed penetrators" or EFPs, which Quds allegedly helped design and supply to some Shiite factions in Iraq, send a molten slug at phenomenal speed through heavy armor. Each one costs perhaps $50, but is capable of crippling an Abrams tank that costs more than $4 million, and they are increasingly common.

Meanwhile, since the beginning of the year, U.S. helicopters have been shot out of the sky with unprecedented frequency. Although none of the five confirmed shootdowns have been linked to the Quds Force, or to Iran, U.S. commanders are worried about their troops' ability to move on the ground and in the air. So they're looking for any way to relieve the pressure—to stop the flow of Iranian arms—three Army sources told NEWSWEEK on condition of anonymity. Publicizing the threat and pushing back against Iran is one idea. But taking aim at this new enemy will be a challenge, given the risk of hitting a friend.

War Of Words (USNEWS)

By Anna Mulrine And Kevin Whitelaw

U.S. News and World Report, February 19, 2007

It should have been a pretty straightforward case: Shiite militias are using Iranian weapons to kill U.S. soldiers in Iraq. On that, the evidence is clear. But when unnamed officials at a hastily convened briefing in Baghdad went a step further, accusing Iranian officials "at the highest levels" of funneling a particularly deadly form of roadside bomb to the Shiite militias, it raised more questions than it answered. For one thing, while the analysts laid out detailed evidence that the armor-piercing "explosively formed penetrators," or EFPs, originated in Iran, they offered nothing to support the allegation of Iranian government involvement.

Confusing matters further, several senior U.S. officials-including the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Peter Pace, Gen. William Caldwell, the chief spokesman for U.S. forces in Iraq, and even President Bush-made a point of walking back from the accusation. "It is clear that Iranians are involved, and it's clear that materials from Iran are involved," Pace told the Voice of America, "but I would not say by what I know that the Iranian government clearly knows or is complicit."

In Washington and other capitals, many were left questioning the allegations and wondering aloud what, exactly, the Bush administration was hoping to achieve. Was this a prelude to stronger action against Iran or simply a clumsy warning to the regime to stop its support of Shiite militias? The Bush White House ran smack into a growing credibility gap of its own making-a hangover from its handling of intelligence regarding Iraq's alleged weapons of mass destruction before the invasion. It spent the rest of the week trying to explain its intentions.

The controversy's timing was, at best, inconvenient. Last week, the House of Representatives was engaged in a marathon debate over Bush's "surge strategy" (Page 25). Bush struggled to turn the nation's attention back to his long-awaited security crackdown in Baghdad, but at a rare press conference, the questions kept returning to Iran.

Back in Baghdad, military officials insisted the briefing was not a prelude to a new war but a simple matter of force protection. "We need these actions to stop," said Caldwell. But to explain the ill-fated decision to present the Iran intelligence anonymously in Baghdad, some Pentagon officials pointed to what they call the new Powell doctrine: Don't get stuck being the fall guy for the administration's intelligence claims. (This is a nod to the discredited case that former Secretary of State Colin Powell made to the United Nations about Iraq's alleged weapons of mass destruction.) "Nobody wants to be Powell. He could have been president, and there was no one more credible in 2002," says a senior Pentagon official, of the decision to withhold the identities of the briefers. "That sends a big signal. Powell is now essentially derided as a tool of the administration."

The briefing, originally planned about two weeks earlier, was delayed by an arduous review process. The intelligence on EFPs was widely vetted in Washington before it was delivered in Baghdad. Senior military and intelligence officials, along with National Security Council aides and the Director of National Intelligence's Iran mission manager, all reviewed the presentation. U.S. News has learned that additional allegations against Tehran were removed because the intelligence was not conclusive enough. Despite all these efforts, the final briefing (hurriedly scheduled after the talking points leaked to a New York Times reporter) left many confused.

Pentagon To Fill Iraq Reconstruction Jobs Temporarily (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 19 — The Pentagon and State Department have worked out a deal to send a small number of military personnel and Defense Department civilians to Iraq for several months until Foreign Service officers and State Department contract workers with specialized skills can fill those jobs, senior officials said Monday.

The internal administration discussions over filling the posts had exposed tensions between the military and civilian agencies over how to share responsibilities in carrying out President Bush's new strategy for stabilizing and rebuilding Iraq — in particular, how to fill hazardous positions in new provincial reconstruction teams.

The State Department had asked the Pentagon to come up with military personnel or civilians to fill about one-third of the 350 new State Department jobs in Iraq. While the numbers involved are relatively small, the debate raised larger issues of whether the government was properly organized to carry out a long-term occupation of a country like Iraq.

The State Department's written request for military personnel to fill some of the positions temporarily, received in late January, was met with frustration by a number of senior Pentagon officials and military officers.

But last week, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates agreed to the State Department request. About 120 military personnel or Pentagon civilians will fill the jobs for up to four months, according to three senior officials who were briefed on the discussions.

The officials said the stopgap measure would give the State Department time to identify Foreign Service officers to serve in political and economic development jobs in Iraq and to use new Congressional financing to hire people with technical skills that are not routinely part of diplomatic missions overseas.

The officials said the jobs included industrial development specialists, public health advisers, engineers, veterinarians, agricultural experts and lawyers who specialize in creating or enhancing judicial institutions.

While those skills are not a standard part of the diplomatic corps, they are found among active duty military and reserve personnel. It is those people who will be asked to step in temporarily.

"We are moving forward to try and fill many if not all of those positions, and can certainly manage it for 60, 90 or 120 days," a senior Defense Department official said.

Another senior Pentagon official said, "Rather than waiting for the funding and contracting process, we want to push the envelope to get the provincial reconstruction teams running as rapidly as we can."

Mr. Gates and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice have not publicly discussed the specifics of the agreement. But they met at the State Department last week, and Ms. Rice spoke in positive terms of cooperation between the departments.

"This is one of several meetings that the secretary and I have been holding and will continue to hold on major issues that Defense and State are confronting together in the global war on terror," Ms. Rice said at the time. "It gives us a chance to get the people who are really responsible for managing these issues on a day-to-day basis together with us to solve the problems that we face and to take advantage of the opportunity."

The president's new strategy calls for the State Department to step up its efforts in Iraq, by doubling to 20 the number of provincial reconstruction teams. That increase would be in tandem with the deployment of 21,500 more troops to Baghdad and Anbar Province to the west.

"We need to put more energy into government at lower levels, at the provincial level and, in some cases, at the municipal level," a senior Defense Department official said.

Another official said the additional provincial reconstruction teams, to be managed by State Department personnel, would not focus on "brick and mortar" construction, but on "trying to reconstruct governmental capacity — the ability for the Iraqi government at all levels to effectively deliver services."

The State Department-run reconstruction teams will rely on military personnel for security and to escort convoys, Pentagon and State Department officials said. Striking a balance between assigning troops to day-to-day combat missions versus providing security for nonmilitary efforts has caused some tensions in the past.

At the core of the debate is a clash of cultures, civilian and military, and assessments of the mission. Many in the military have said that while administration officials routinely speak of the United States as "a nation at war," by far the bulk of the mission is being carried by those in uniform, while the rest of the government is not on a similar war footing.

But across the civilian agencies, which have only a fraction of the Pentagon's personnel and budget, government workers say the question is whether a few hundred unarmed civilians spread across Iraq can make a significant difference in promoting democracy and reconstruction in the middle of a war zone, when more than 130,000 troops are not succeeding in that task.

Iraq-refugee Plan Facesbipartisan Opposition (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, February 20, 2007

A new program by the Bush administration to admit 7,000 Iraqi refugees into the United States this year is meeting with some resistance on both sides of the political aisle.

Rep. Tom Tancredo, Colorado Republican, says the policy flies in the face of U.S. law, and Ted Strickland, Ohio's Democratic governor, says refugees are not welcome in his state.

"I think Ohio and Ohioans have contributed a lot to Iraq in terms of blood, sweat and too many tears," Mr. Strickland said. "I am sympathetic to the plight of the innocent Iraqi people who have fled that country. However, I would not want to ask Ohioans to accept a greater burden than they already have borne for the Bush administration's failed policies."

In addition to opening U.S. borders to refugees, the United States will contribute $18 million for a worldwide resettlement and relief program for 20,000 Iraqi refugees this year.

Current law states that no Iraqi nationals should be permitted to enter the United States until the government of Iraq cooperates with U.S. efforts to repatriate Iraqi criminal aliens back to their home nation, Mr. Tancredo says.

Since 2003, the United States has allowed 463 Iraqi refugees to relocate, a number Mr. Tancredo calls "too many."

"I believe caving in to this pressure would be a colossal mistake and would very likely violate U.S. law," Mr. Tancredo said in a letter to Mr. Bush on Friday. "I hope you will resist pressure from international bureaucrats at the United Nations and order the Department of State to bring its policy in line with United States law."

Up to 2 million Iraqis have fled their country, primarily to Syria and Jordan, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice earlier this month formed a special task force to coordinate refugee assistance. The administration announced last week the United States will accept one-third of the 20,000 refugees who will be screened and approved this year by the office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR).

The United States cut back on the number of Iraqis seeking refuge after the September 11 terrorist attacks with tighter screening controls, said Ellen Sauerbrey, assistant secretary of state for population, refugees and migration.

"The numbers dropped off so dramatically that UNHCR found it not a very attractive destination and were making very few referrals to the U.S.," she said.

The program has the support of key Democrats in the Senate, including Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and Sen. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, who say the United States should contribute $30 million, half the cost of refugee-resettlement worldwide.

"While we can't solve this problem alone, we have a moral responsibility to do all that we can and provide the necessary leadership to prevent this crisis from getting worse," said Mr. Kennedy. "Our invasion of Iraq led to this crisis, and we have a clear responsibility to do more to ease it."

The process of seeking refuge in the United States is long and arduous, and Mrs. Sauerbrey concedes that only half, or about 3,500, will be ready to travel to the United States by September.

Only refugees who have been referred by UNHCR or by the U.S. Embassy in Iraq are eligible, and must first pass background checks, medical tests and other requirements.

Nongovernmental organizations determine where in the United States refugees are resettled based on the availability of housing, employment, needed services, readiness of host communities and a variety of other factors. If a refugee has a relative in the United States, every effort is made to resettle the refugee near that relative.

Iraqi Oil Wealth Stays Locked Up (WSJ)

By Chip Cummins And Hassan Hafidh

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

Foreign technology and capital are seen as vital to restoring Iraq's crumbling oil industry. But as a draft petroleum law inches its way toward the Iraqi parliament, fresh opposition to the legislation is emerging, underscoring the difficulty that may still lie ahead for any move to invite in international oil companies.

A petroleum law could provide a significant political boost for Iraq's shaky government, by setting down how money from newly developed fields would be shared among the country's three dominant ethnic regions -- the mostly Kurdish north, the Sunni center and the Shiite south. Reaching an agreement on sharing Iraq's energy resources, by far the nation's major source of wealth, will be critical to achieving long-term peace in the war-torn country.

U.S. officials and petroleum experts have been advising Iraqi politicians almost from the start of the American occupation nearly four years ago about how to build a legal framework that would enable foreign oil-field development. International majors have been reluctant to venture into the country until violence subsides and before politicians endorse a law spelling out legal rights and financial terms for foreign firms.

In recent months, Iraqi politicians have made some progress. In its current form, the legislation envisions the re-creation of an Iraqi state oil company, and it gives broad latitude to officials from the country's various regions to encourage foreign investment and development. Kurdish officials had balked at earlier provisions calling for specific federal approval of development deals between regional governments and foreign firms.

The Iraqi cabinet discussed a revised draft of the petroleum law late last week. The cabinet is expected to meet perhaps as early as this week to take up the issue again, according to Assem Jihad, a spokesman for the Ministry of Oil in Baghdad. If the cabinet agrees on a working draft, it would be forwarded to parliament for debate and ratification.

The legislation still faces significant political hurdles. Earlier this month, an influential union of oil workers in the country's south said it will oppose the legislation. In a speech to more than 200 delegates at a conference in Basra in early February, union leader Hassan Jumaa condemned the legislation as opening Iraq's oil wealth to foreign exploitation.

"History will not forgive those who play recklessly with our wealth," he said. "We consider the new law unbalanced and incoherent with the hopes of those who work in the oil industry. It has been drafted in a great rush in harsh circumstances."

The rhetoric echoes the sentiment of many everyday Iraqi citizens. The nationalization of the Iraqi oil industry in the 1970s under Saddam Hussein remains a point of pride for many Iraqis, and opposition still runs deep to any hint of foreign interference.

Also, opposition has emerged from prominent former Iraqi oil officials, who have recently fled the country's chaos but continue to hold some sway in Baghdad's oil bureaucracy. Because of the escalating sectarian violence and political polarization, these officials fear, rushing through a petroleum law could cause more harm than good to the industry.

North Africa Feared As Staging Ground For Terror (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

TUNIS — The plan, hatched for months in the arid mountains of North Africa, was to attack the American and British Embassies here. It ended in a series of gun battles in January that killed a dozen militants and left two Tunisian security officers dead.

But the most disturbing aspect of the violence in this normally placid, tourist-friendly nation is that it came from across the border in Algeria, where an Islamic terrorist organization has vowed to unite radical Islamic groups across North Africa.

Counterterrorism officials on three continents say the trouble in Tunisia is the latest evidence that a brutal Algerian group with a long history of violence is acting on its promise: to organize extremists across North Africa and join the remnants of Al Qaeda into a new international force for jihad.

[Last week, the group claimed responsibility for seven nearly simultaneous bombings that destroyed police stations in towns east of Algiers, the Algerian capital, killing six people.]

This article was prepared from interviews with American government and military officials, French counterterrorism officials, Italian counterterrorism prosecutors, Algerian terrorism experts, Tunisian government officials and a Tunisian attorney working with Islamists charged with terrorist activities.

They say North Africa, with its vast, thinly governed stretches of mountain and desert, could become an Afghanistan-like terrorist hinterland within easy striking distance of Europe. That is all the more alarming because of the deep roots that North African communities have in Europe and the ease of travel between the regions. For the United States, the threat is also real because of visa-free travel to American cities for most European passport holders.

The violent Algerian group the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, known by its French initials G.S.P.C., has for several years been under American watch.

"The G.S.P.C. has become a regional terrorist organization, recruiting and operating in all of your countries — and beyond," Henry A. Crumpton, then the United States ambassador at large for counterterrorism, said at a counterterrorism conference in Algiers last year. "It is forging links with terrorist groups in Morocco, Nigeria, Mauritania, Tunisia and elsewhere."

Officials say the group is funneling North African fighters to Iraq, but is also turning militants back toward their home countries.

The ambitions of the group are particularly troubling to counterterrorism officials on the watch for the re-emergence of networks that were largely interrupted in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. While most estimates put the current membership of the group in the hundreds, it has survived more than a decade of Algerian government attempts to eradicate it. It is now the best-organized and -financed terrorist group in the region.

Last year, on the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, Al Qaeda chose the G.S.P.C. as its representative in North Africa. In January, the group reciprocated by switching its name to Al Qaeda of the Islamic Maghreb, claiming that the Qaeda leader, Osama bin Laden, had ordered the change.

"Al Qaeda's aim is for the G.S.P.C. to become a regional force, not solely an Algerian one," said the French counterterrorism magistrate, Jean-Louis Bruguière, in Paris. He calls the Algerian group the biggest terrorist threat facing France today.

"We know from cases that we're working on that the G.S.P.C.'s mission is now to recruit people in Morocco and Tunisia, train them and send them back to their countries of origin or Europe to mount attacks," he said.

The G.S.P.C. was created in 1998 as an offshoot of the Armed Islamic Group, which along with other Islamist guerrilla forces fought a brutal decade-long civil war after the Algerian military canceled elections in early 1992 because an Islamist party was poised to win.

In 2003, a G.S.P.C. leader in southern Algeria kidnapped 32 European tourists, some of whom were released for a ransom of 5 million euros (about $6.5 million at current exchange rates), paid by Germany.

Officials say the leader, Amari Saifi, bought weapons and recruited fighters before the United States military helped corner and catch him in 2004. He is now serving a life sentence in Algeria.

Change of Leadership

Since then, an even more radical leader, Abdelmalek Droukdel, has taken over the group. The Algerian military says he cut his teeth in the 1990s as a member of the Armed Islamic Group's feared Ahoual or "horror" company, blamed for some of the most gruesome massacres of Algeria's civil war.

He announced his arrival with a truck bomb at the country's most important electrical production facility in June 2004, and focused on associating the group with Al Qaeda.

Links to the G.S.P.C. soon began appearing in terrorism cases elsewhere in North Africa and in Europe.

In 2005, Moroccan authorities arrested a man named Anour Majrar, and told Italy and France that he and two other militants had visited G.S.P.C. leaders in Algeria earlier that year.

His interrogation led to arrests in Algeria, Italy and France, where Mr. Majrar's associates were quickly linked to an attempted robbery of 5 million euros at an armored car depot in Beauvais, north of Paris. A hole had been blown in a wall at the depot with military-grade C4 plastic explosives, but it was not big enough for the men to get through.

A later investigation turned up Kalashnikov assault rifles, French Famas military assault rifles, rocket-propelled grenades, TNT and two more pounds of C4. French counterterrorism officials say the group was planning attacks on the Paris Metro, the city's Orly Airport, and the headquarters of the Direction de la Surveillance du Territoire, France's domestic intelligence agency.

Italian prosecutors say a related cell in Milan was planning attacks on the city's police headquarters and on the Basilica of San Petronio in Bologna, whose 15th-century fresco depicts the Prophet Muhammad in hell.

The G.S.P.C. or its members in Algeria appear to have become a touchstone for groups suspected of being terror cells across the region, in much the way that Qaeda representatives in London were a decade ago.

DOJ_NMG_0133784

Wiretaps, interrogation of terrorism suspects and recovered documents suggest that the network has associates in France, Italy, Turkey and even Greece, which is favored as an entry point to Europe because of its relatively lax immigration controls, counterterrorism officials say.

There had been hints that the North African groups were planning more formal cooperation as far back as 2005, when Moroccan intelligence authorities found messages sent by Islamic militants to Osama bin Laden, according to European counterintelligence officials.

Evidence of an Alliance

Indications that a cross-border alliance was under way came in June 2005, when the G.S.P.C. attacked a military outpost in Mauritania, killing 15 soldiers. The attackers fled into Mali, according to the United States military.

Moroccan police officers raiding suspected Islamic militant cells last summer also found documents discussing a union between the G.S.P.C. and the Islamic Combatant Group in Morocco, the Islamic Fighting Group in Libya and several smaller Tunisian groups, intelligence officials say.

In September, Al Qaeda's second in command, Ayman al-Zawahri, released a videotape in which he said that his global terrorist network had joined forces with the G.S.P.C.

The video was followed by an unsettling increase in terrorist attacks across the region, including one against Halliburton employees in Algeria in December that left one Algerian dead and nine people wounded.

But the strongest evidence yet of the G.S.P.C.'s North African cross-border cooperation came in January when Tunisia announced that it had killed 12 Islamic extremists and captured 15 of them. Officials said that six of the extremists had crossed into the country from Algeria.

Their 36-year-old leader, Lassad Sassi, was a former Tunisian policeman who ran a terrorist cell in Milan until May 2001 before fleeing to Algeria, according to an Italian prosecutor, Armando Spataro.

Mr. Sassi, now dead, is still listed as a defendant in a current terrorism trial in Milan, which began before he died. He was charged in absentia with providing military clothing and money to the G.S.P.C. while financing and planning suicide bomb attacks in Italy.

Tunisian officials say that Mr. Sassi and five other men — four Tunisians and one Mauritanian — crossed the rugged border from Algeria into Tunisia months ago.

They set up a base in the mountains of Djebel Terif, where Mr. Sassi trained 20 other Tunisian men in the use of automatic weapons and explosives.

A Trail of Violence

The decision to move against the group began when the police in the Tunis suburb of Hammam Lif detained a young woman in December who led them to a house where a gun battle left two suspected terrorists dead, two officers wounded and two other men in custody, a police officer involved said. His account of the events could not be independently verified.

Another arrest led the police into the hills toward the training camp.

Three of the militants and a Tunisian Army captain were killed during a chase through the mountains. Tunisian security forces mounted a search in which 13 more men were arrested and Mr. Sassi was killed.

The remnants of the group fled and members were later tracked down and killed in another gun battle.

Tunisian officials have sought to play down the G.S.P.C. link, and have said the recently dismantled group's target was the West.

In fact, according to Samir Ben Amor, a Tunisian attorney who defends many young Tunisian Islamists, more than 600 young Tunisian Islamists have been arrested in the past two years — more than 100 in the past two months — trying to make their way to Iraq to fight the United States.

"It's the same thing that we saw in Bosnia, Kosovo and above all Afghanistan," said Mr. Bruguière, the French magistrate. "Al Qaeda's objective is to create an operational link between the groups in Iraq and the G.S.P.C."

Tunisia is among the most vulnerable of the North African countries, because its rigid repression of Islam has created a well of resentment among religious youth, and its popularity as a tourist destination for Europeans makes it a target.

Tunisian security forces found Google Earth satellite images of the American and British Embassies as well as the names of diplomats who worked in both buildings. But according to the police officer involved in the case and journalists in Tunisia, the targets also included hotels and nightclubs.

An attack on those sites would have dealt a heavy blow to Tunisia's tourist industry, one of the country's most important sources of foreign exchange. An April 2002 bombing of a synagogue on the Tunisian tourist island of Djerba, for which the G.S.P.C. claimed responsibility, helped sink the country's economic growth that year to its slowest rate in a decade.

Terrorist Networks Lure Young Moroccans To War In Far-Off Iraq (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0133785

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

TETOUAN, Morocco -- In the Arab world, this hilly North African city is about as far as you can get from Iraq. But for many young men here, the call to join what they view as a holy war resonates loudly across the 3,000-mile divide.

About two dozen men from Tetouan and nearby towns in the Rif Mountains have traveled to Iraq in the past 18 months to volunteer as fighters or suicide bombers, according to local residents and officials. Moroccan authorities said the men were recruited by international terrorist networks affiliated with al-Qaeda that have deepened their roots in North Africa since the invasion of Iraq four years ago.

To stanch the flow, U.S. intelligence and military officials have tried to trace the fighters' steps. On the basis of DNA evidence recovered from the scenes of suicide attacks, as well as other clues, officials have confirmed that at least two bombers came from Tetouan, a city of more than 320,000 across the Strait of Gibraltar from southern Spain.

One of them, Abdelmonaim el-Amrani, a 22-year-old laborer, abandoned his wife and infant child in Tetouan to go to Iraq. On March 6, 2006, just before sunset, he drove a red Volkswagen Passat stuffed with explosives into a funeral tent in a village near Baqubah, Iraq, according to witnesses. Six people were reported killed and 27 injured. It was months before Amrani's family in Tetouan learned of his fate from Moroccan police.

Foreign fighters in Iraq account for only a small percentage of the combatants attacking U.S. troops and their Iraqi allies. U.S. military officials and independent analysts peg the number at no more than a few thousand. But as the war drags on, it continues to serve as a powerful rallying tool for radical Islamic networks around the world that have developed recruiting pipelines as far afield as Europe and Southeast Asia.

Moroccan authorities said they have identified more than 50 volunteers who have gone to Iraq since 2003, and many more are believed to have made the journey undetected. Security officials here said the problem is worse in other Arab countries.

Under U.S. pressure to act, Moroccan officials have tried to disrupt the recruiting networks in recent months, arresting more than 50 people since November.

"We have chosen to be extremely vigilant," Interior Minister Chakib Benmoussa said in an interview in Rabat, the capital. "These cells all have international connections. They can function because they certainly all have support, especially in regard to training and in regard to logistics."

But Morocco and its neighbors are finding it increasingly difficult to suppress the militants. Several networks that used to operate independently in North Africa have put aside their differences, united in part by the ongoing violence in Iraq.

Last month, for example, a group in Algeria that has waged a decade-long insurgency against the government there announced that it had changed its name to al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb -- a reference to African lands north of the Sahara -- and joined forces with affiliates in Tunisia, Morocco, Libya and Mauritania.

The organization asserted responsibility for a coordinated operation on Feb. 13 in which seven targets, mostly police stations, were bombed in a district east of Algiers. Six people were reported killed and 13 injured. In a telephone call to the Arab satellite television network al-Jazeera, an unidentified spokesman said the group was looking to expand its targets to focus on American interests. "Wherever we can find a U.S. presence, we will, God willing, pursue it and its agents," he said.

In December, the same group attacked a bus loaded with foreign contractors in a military-controlled zone of Algiers, killing the Algerian driver. Nine people were wounded, including four Britons and an American.

In Tunisia, a cell belonging to the same network engaged in a gun battle Jan. 3 with police outside Tunis, the capital, resulting in 12 deaths. According to European news media, the cell had drawn up plans to attack the U.S., Italian and British embassies.

Despite the surge in local strikes, North African intelligence officials and analysts said that al-Qaeda affiliates in the region remain focused on Iraq and rely on the faraway conflict as a recruiting tool.

"The big state for al-Qaeda is Iraq," said Mohamed Darif, a political science professor and terrorism expert at Hassan II-Mohammedia University in Morocco. "Al-Qaeda has the same strategy as the United States: It wants to win in Iraq so it can transform the whole region. They are fixated on Iraq."

In Tetouan, the local economy and culture lean more toward Europe than the Middle East. The narrow streets and whitewashed buildings appear to have changed little since the first half of the 20th century, when the city was the colonial capital of Spanish Morocco. Most storefronts feature signs in both Spanish and Arabic. Young men wear the jerseys of their favorite European soccer teams, particularly those from Barcelona and Madrid.

Although it is still not clear why so many men from Tetouan decided to abandon their lives and go to Iraq, there are some clues. Relatives and friends said several of the men were well-educated -- many took classes at local community colleges -- but struggled to make ends meet. They noted that the men's religious beliefs appeared to have deepened and that they had begun wearing long beards and loose-fitting Afghan-style clothes.

Moncef ben Masaoud, 21, died in a suicide attack in Baqubah last fall, according to neighbors and relatives. Skilled in computers and math, he had attended college classes in nearby Tangier. On July 27, 2006, he left home as usual for school, but never returned.

"He told me he'd be coming back the same day," his father, Haj Ahmed Masaoud, a tire dealer in a Tetouan market, told the Moroccan newsmagazine Le Journal Hebdomadaire. "In mid-August, he called me and told me he was doing fine. He said he was in Syria. That was the last contact we had with him."

Masaoud was a close friend of Amrani, the young father who also carried out a suicide bombing near Baqubah, as well as a third Tetouan man, Yones Achebbak, 23, who left for Iraq last fall. Achebbak's fate is unknown.

All three men attended the same mosque in Tetouan, a white-arched building perched on a slope in the slum district of Mezouak. The mosque's imam, Fatal Abdelillah, was arrested in November as part of the investigation into the Iraqi recruiting ring.

It was not the first time the mosque and the Mezouak slum had drawn the attention of counterterrorism investigators. Five men from the area are suspects in the March 11, 2004, train bombings in Madrid, which killed 191 people and injured more than 1,800.

Al-Qaeda recruiters have focused on Tetouan because it has several extremist mosques but also because of its proximity to Europe, Moroccan officials and analysts said. Spanish counterterrorism authorities have warned that recruiting networks are also active in the nearby Spanish territories of Ceuta and Melilla, enclaves on the northern Moroccan coast that are a holdover from the days when the region was a Spanish colony.

"Al-Qaeda was working very hard to create coordination cells in Tetouan, because it's a close point of contact to Europe," said Darif, the Moroccan terrorism analyst. He said the Moroccan cells smuggle recruits and other operatives across the Mediterranean Sea to Spain, where they pick up false passports and move on to Turkey or Syria before slipping into Iraq.

The recruiters screen rigorously, according to counterterrorism officials. Designated "watchers" hang around radical mosques and other places to look for young men angry about the conflicts in places such as Iraq and the Palestinian territories. For months, the watchers try to whip up the potential volunteers' emotions further and convince them that they have a religious duty to intervene.

"The recruitment does not exclusively take place in the poorest parts of society, nor in the category of illiterates," said Benmoussa, the interior minister. Instead, he said, recruiters "target a category of people that is extremely sensitive to what they consider international injustice."

Candidates are subjected to psychological assessments from a distance to determine if they are really willing to die for the cause. Background checks are run to ensure that they are not informers, officials said. Those who make the final cut are assigned to "handlers," who arrange the trip to Iraq.

The volunteers are sometimes trained to use explosives and weapons before they leave, but it is rare that they are taught more than the basics, said Nick Pratt, a retired Marine colonel and terrorism expert at the George C. Marshall European Center for Security Studies in Garmisch-Partenkirchen, Germany.

The recruits are valued more for their zeal than their skill because of their primary mission: suicide attacks against U.S. and Iraqi forces, as well as Shiite foes in the nation's sectarian conflict. Pratt said research has shown that suicide bombings are embraced by networks affiliated with al-Qaeda because they are more lethal and generate more publicity. He said a suicide attack, on average, causes six times as many deaths and 12 times as many injuries as a conventional attack, such as a roadside bomb explosion.

"The recruiters for al-Qaeda are some of the most important players right now in that organization," Pratt said. "They have a profile, and they know what they're looking for in terms of recruits." Counterterrorism officials, he added, are more concerned with stopping the recruiters than the volunteers. "They're not so much concerned with the guys who become cannon fodder," he said.

Moroccan authorities have made several rounds of arrests since November, many of them in Tetouan. Most recently, on Jan. 4, the government said it had arrested 26 people and "smashed a terrorist structure with international connections specializing in the recruitment and transport of volunteers to Iraq."

Some Moroccan lawmakers and relatives of those arrested said U.S. officials have pressured Morocco to act since they discovered the Tetouan connection to Iraq. The U.S. Embassy in Rabat declined to comment.

Mustapha Khalfi, a member of Parliament from the opposition Justice and Development Party, said the government was arresting suspects, based on little evidence, to please U.S. officials. "They are pushing us to do some bad things," he said. "This conflicts with U.S. policy to strengthen democracy and to strengthen human rights."

Khalfi said the number of Moroccans joining the fight in Iraq had been exaggerated. At the same time, he added, as long as the U.S. military remains in Iraq, many Moroccans will feel duty-bound to help the resistance.

Afghan Forces Retake Western Town (AP)

By Amir Shah,

AP, February 20, 2007

Afghan security forces supported by NATO troops on Tuesday retook a town in western Afghanistan that briefly had fallen to Taliban militants, an official said.

About 200 Afghan police and soldiers moved into the remote town of Bakwa in Farah province at 5 a.m. and faced no resistance, said Gov. Muhajuddin Baluch. He said some NATO troops joined the operation.

The Afghan forces were searching the vicinity for the militants, who moved into Bakwa on Monday and briefly held it and then left, taking three seized vehicles with them, he said.

It was the second time this month that the government has lost control of a district in the region.

Meanwhile, a U.S. soldier was killed during combat operations on Monday in the Naray area of eastern Kunar province, the U.S. military said in a brief statement.

At least 297 American soldiers have died in and around Afghanistan since U.S. forces invaded in late 2001 to topple the hard-line Taliban regime. The name of the latest fatality was being withheld pending notification of next of kin, the statement said.

U.S.-led coalition forces dropped a 2,000-pound bomb on a cave where insurgents retreated after a clash in southern Uruzgan province on Monday, U.S. military spokesman Lt. Col. David Accetta said. He had no details on insurgent casualties.

Afghan Forces Retake District Briefly Held By Taliban (AFP)

AFP, February 20, 2007

Afghan and international troops retook a district capital in southwestern Afghanistan early on Tuesday, easily pushing out Taliban rebels who held the town for around 24 hours, according to the government.

The town of Bakwa in the western province of Farah was under government control and security reinforcements were there, the interior ministry said.

"We occupied Bakwa this morning at 5:30 am (0100 GMT) and the Taliban were pushed back," spokesman Zemarai Bashary told AFP. The rebels had heard the security forces were arriving and had moved out, he said.

"Currently security has been brought back to the district. The district headquarters is okay, it is not destroyed," Bashary said.

About 300 Taliban stormed the town Monday, forcing out a weak police force that fled the area, provincial officials said.

Taliban insurgents last year captured a handful of districts in this manner but were pushed out by international forces backing the fragile Afghan government.

However, they have been holding the southern town of Musa Qala -- about 150 kilometres (93 miles) east of Bakwa -- for more than two weeks. The authorities say they are waiting for the right time to retake the area.

Citing security reasons, Bashary would not say how many security forces were involved in the early morning operation in Bakwa -- capital of a district of the same name -- or how many were in the town.

He said that the Taliban group that arrived Monday was around three times larger than the police force that had been there and numbered around 40.

Afghanistan's government is unable to establish a presence and maintain authority in vast swathes of the volatile country.

The police force is particularly stretched at 60,000 policemen for roughly 29 million people.

A priority for Afghanistan's internationally-backed efforts to find stability after three decades of fighting is to train up and boost the police.

The country is also putting in place a 11,200-strong "auxiliary police force" of men who are given guns and badges after 80 hours' training.

Asked about the weak resistance Taliban encountered in remote towns, Bashary said: "We are trying to reinforce these districts, especially the southern districts. We are trying to send auxiliary police as soon as possible."

"We have the power to reoccupy every place of country that is attacked by the enemy. But we are waiting in Musa Qala. As soon as we find a proper and good time, we will occupy the district."

The NATO-led International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) has killed two of the commanders of the Musa Qala takeover in precision strikes but this has failed to dislodge the rebels.

The capture of the town, in the province of Helmand, is significant because the government asked British ISAF there to keep out of the area on the request of tribal elders who believed they could also keep the Taliban out.

The extremist religious Taliban movement is trying to claw its way back into power with an insurgency launched months after it was removed from government in 2001 in a US-led invasion.

The insurgency was at its deadliest last year with more than 4,000 people killed, most of them rebels, and 2007 is expected to be just as intense.

Taliban Seize Rural District In Southwest As Police Flee (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, Feb. 19 — Taliban insurgents seized control of a district in southwestern Afghanistan on Monday as the Afghan police abandoned their post and fled, officials said.

The district is the second to fall into Taliban hands this month, and its capture underlines the precarious hold of the government and NATO troops in the remote districts of southern Afghanistan.

The midmorning attack occurred in the Baqwa district of Farah Province, where few NATO or Afghan troops are deployed. A small number of American soldiers run a reconstruction team in the provincial capital, but the districts are left to the local police, who lack staff and weapons.

The police in Baqwa town warned their provincial headquarters that the Taliban were advancing in such large numbers they could not hold the district office, according to Baryalai Khan, the secretary to the provincial police chief.

"At 11:30, we lost telephone and radio contact with our police in Baqwa district, and it seems the district is in the hands of the Taliban," he said. "According to the people of the town, our policemen escaped in different directions, and the Taliban are in the district, although not in the center for fear of bombardment."

"We don't know if there are any casualties among our police," he said. "We have no contact with them." Four policemen were killed and three wounded by a remote-controlled mine in the same district on Sunday, he added.

Taliban forces have often overrun district offices in the past, sacking them and then usually leaving after a few hours. But this year they have seized and held entire regions.

British NATO forces and Afghan troops, however, claimed success in an attack over the weekend on a Taliban stronghold in Helmand Province, just east of Farah.

The operation unfolded south of Gamsir and concentrated on three major compounds, destroying a tunnel complex linking them.

"We were able to hit them hard in the largest deliberate operation there has been down there, and disrupt their command and control," Lt. Col. Rory Bruce told [a news agency] on Monday from the British task force headquarters.

He said that a "significant number" of enemy fighters had been killed, but did not give a precise figure. There were no British casualties.

On Sunday, insurgents fired twice on a Canadian military convoy moving at night through the southern city of Kandahar, a NATO statement said. Two Afghans — a homeless man and a police officer — were killed by the Canadians in the ensuing firefight, the statement said. NATO said both shootings were under investigation.

British Troops Attack Taliban Stronghold (USAT)

USA Today, February 20, 2007

British NATO forces destroyed a "major Taliban headquarters and stronghold" in Garmsir, in Afghanistan's Helmand province, Lt. Col. Rory Bruce said Monday at the British task force headquarters in London. He said the troops killed a "significant number" of Taliban fighters and disrupted their command system. The forces destroyed a network of trenches and tunnels and pushed the Taliban guerrillas from where they were massing for a spring offensive, Bruce said.

Corogeanu said he was trying to take evil spirits out of her and that she was restrained because she was violent. Four nuns were sentenced to prison terms ranging from five to eight years.

Mexico's anti-drug troops get big pay raise

Mexican soldiers fighting drug traffickers will get a nearly 50% pay increase to insulate them from corruption. President Felipe Calderón said the raise, retroactive to Jan. 1, will increase monthly take-home pay for troops to $474 from $319. Corruption is widespread in law enforcement, and drug traffickers routinely buy off low-paid officers. Calderón has spearheaded anti-drug efforts since taking office.

Czech Prime Minister Mirek Topolanek said his country and Poland favor the U.S. plan to put 10 interceptor missiles in Poland and a radar site in the Czech Republic. Russian President Vladimir Putin has said he does not trust U.S. claims that the missile-defense system is meant to counter threats from Iran.

The militias are behind some of the worst massacres in Colombia's civil conflict. President Alvaro Uribe appointed Fernando Araujo, who escaped from six-year rebel captivity six weeks ago, to the Cabinet post. He is not related to the other Araujos.

Opium Wars (WSJ)

By Vanda Felbab-brown

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

As NATO braces for a spring Taliban offensive in Afghanistan, many in the Bush administration, the Congress and the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime are calling for it to take on a prominent role in combating the narcotics trade. Although this task is meant to help Afghanistan repress the worrisome, if predictable, expansion of its opium economy, it will greatly hamper NATO's effectiveness. NATO's crucial role is to establish security throughout the country -- and not to dilute its focus in eradication and interdiction missions that are presently bound to fail.

It is not that NATO should simply turn a blind eye to the opium trade. But it should focus on where it can make a difference. Success in counterinsurgency requires the ability to establish a permanent presence in ever-larger sectors and to consistently protect the population from insurgent reprisals, thus winning the minds part of the hearts-and-minds struggle. NATO's troop density in Afghanistan is still far too low to provide such security, despite the extension of duty tours for several thousand U.S. soldiers. Expanding their mission to include drug eradication will only further thin NATO's presence, while jeopardizing its ability to control areas and persuade the population that it can protect them from the Taliban. Without this assurance, the population will at best sit on the fence, and at worse succumb to Taliban pressure.

Even more important, it will cost NATO the loss of the population's hearts. The rural population is critically dependent on the opium economy for a basic livelihood. Without any viable alternatives, destroying the crop greatly antagonizes the population against those who carry it out -- local tribal elites, state officials and Kabul.

Drug eradication efforts so far have allowed the Taliban to reintegrate itself into the opium economy and rebuild some of its political capital with the population, by offering itself as a protector of the population and its poppy fields. Meanwhile, the damage to the crops has generated a new wave of economic refugees to Pakistan, many of whom have been replenishing the ranks of the Taliban. There's another critical problem. Reliable, accurate and actionable human intelligence is the key to winning a counterinsurgency campaign. The willingness of the population to provide such intelligence on the Taliban is already minimal, and NATO's direct participation in eradication will halt it altogether.

Yes, the Taliban is profiting financially from the Afghan drug trade (in addition to profiting politically from eradication), but eradication will not cut off financial resources to the Taliban, rendering it physically weak and easy to defeat. The Taliban was able to regroup and rebuild its organization in Pakistan and Afghanistan between 2002 and 2004 without access to large profits from the opium economy, which was at that time dominated by various warlords, many of whom are now government officials at all levels of the Afghan government. It was able to replenish its physical resources by donations from the Middle East and collections in Pakistan, as well as by participating in other smuggling activities. In fact, no belligerent group has been bankrupted by the effort to eradicate drugs. For example, even after years of fumigation and under pressure from the Colombian military, the FARC guerilla group is showing no signs of hurting financially. Eradication will also fail to weaken the Taliban physically; indeed it will only strengthen them politically, while undermining NATO's intelligence acquisition.

Participating in interdiction which focuses on apprehending traffickers and destroying labs is somewhat less problematic for NATO, but even such a mission is not without crucial problems. Steadily expanding in Afghanistan since the 1980s (with the 2000 eradication campaign by the Taliban being temporary and unsustainable), the opium economy deeply underlines much of Afghanistan's political, economic and social life. The traders and traffickers are not alien criminals. Many are members of tribal elites with crucial sway over the population.

Drug interdiction will at the least induce these traders and traffickers to pressure the population to stop cooperating with NATO, if not more directly support the Taliban. This could easily jeopardize as well the reconstruction and economic functions of the provincial reconstruction teams, thus further weakening the minimal efforts at long-term alternative development. Interdiction should be carried out -- by special national interdiction units -- to eliminate at least some corruption and impunity of the key traffickers, but NATO should stay out of it.

NATO does have an important role to play in counternarcotics -- namely, to defeat the insurgency. Without stability throughout the country and security on the ground, counternarcotics measures will not succeed. Alternative livelihood programs will not have a chance to take off. Without stability, even repressive measures, such as eradication, will only lead to cycles of replanting, social strife, and a strengthened insurgency.

Remember Al Qaeda? They're Baaack (LAT)

By Bruce Hoffman,

The Los Angeles Times, February 20, 2007

Defeating Osama bin Laden's resurgent terrorist network requires far more than military might.

'AL QAEDA," President Bush declared confidently in October, "is on the run." The extremists, he said, had "played their hand." The masterminds of the organization had been "brought to justice."

But just as we underestimated Al Qaeda before 9/11, we risk making the same mistake now. Although Al Qaeda is often spoken of as if it is in retreat — a broken and beaten organization incapable of mounting attacks, its leadership cut off, living in caves somewhere in remotest Waziristan — the truth is that the organization is not on the run but on the march. It has regrouped and reorganized from the setbacks it suffered during the initial phases of the global war on terrorism and is marshaling its forces to continue the epic struggle begun more than 10 years ago.

Rather than being degraded to the point that it can threaten only softer, more accessible targets like hotels and mass transit, Al Qaeda is very much sticking with its classic playbook of simultaneous, spectacular strikes against even hardened objectives. In other words, we have more to fear from this resilient organization, not less.

Ongoing investigations increasingly suggest that recent terrorist threats and attacks — the foiled 2004 plan to stage simultaneous suicide attacks in the United States, the 2005 suicide bus and subway bombings in London and the August 2006 plot to blow up 10 planes over the Atlantic — were all coordinated in some way by Al Qaeda and not by homegrown terror groups.

Consider what we have learned since the London bombings. Initially, British authorities concluded that the attacks were the work of disaffected British Muslims, self-radicalized and self-selected and operating purely within the country. We have subsequently learned, however, that the cell's ringleader, Mohamed Sidique Khan, and a fellow bomber visited Pakistani terrorist camps between late 2004 and early 2005 and met there with Al Qaeda operatives.

In addition, following the London attacks, a reliable source working for Britain's security service recognized Khan from news reports and claimed to have seen him at an Al Qaeda camp in Afghanistan in 1999 or 2000.

The London bombings' pedigree is familiar. Exactly a year earlier, British and American authorities had disrupted a plot by a London-based Al Qaeda cell to carry out simultaneous suicide attacks on the New York Stock Exchange, the Prudential Center in Newark, N.J., and the headquarters of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank in Washington. The trail again led to Pakistan.

And this summer's plot to simultaneously bomb U.S. airliners was foiled after arrests in Pakistan again led British and U.S. officials to another British terrorist cell planning to attack American targets.

Rather than "Al Qaeda R.I.P.," we face an Al Qaeda that has risen from the grave. It has been able to adapt and adjust to the changes imposed on its operations by the U.S.-led war on terrorism and reestablish its command and control over international terrorism from the sanctuary it has established in Pakistan's North Waziristan.

Just last month, this alarming development produced a dramatic reversal in the Bush administration's public assessment of the Al Qaeda threat. In contrast to long-standing White House claims, the annual threat assessment presented by outgoing National Intelligence Director John D. Negroponte to the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence painted a disquieting picture of a highly resilient terrorist movement that, he said, is cultivating stronger operational connections to affiliates throughout the Middle East, North Africa and Europe.

Al Qaeda's stunning resurrection, before the very eyes of American military forces stationed across the border in southern Afghanistan, begs the question of how the most powerful country in the world can launch a six-year, no-holds-barred, global war on terrorism — at great cost to its pocketbook and international standing — only to find the main target of these Herculean efforts still alive and kicking.

In retrospect, it appears that Iraq blinded us to the possibility of an Al Qaeda renaissance. The United States' entanglement there has consumed the attention and resources of our country's military and intelligence communities — at precisely the time that Osama bin Laden and other senior Al Qaeda commanders were in their most desperate straits and stood to benefit most from this distraction. What's more, even as we took solace in the president's argument that we were "fighting terrorists over there, so that we don't have to fight them here," Al Qaeda was regrouping.

Pakistan is both the problem and the solution to the most salient terrorist threat still directed against us. Al Qaeda and its Taliban allies could not function without the passive connivance of Pakistani authorities. Moreover, agreements concluded over the past two years between President Pervez Musharraf and the restive tribes along the Afghan border have assured Al Qaeda the noninterference with its activities that enables it to thrive. At the same time, the pivotal role played by Pakistan in the disruption of major attacks and the arrests of low-level plotters shows how dependent the U.S. remains on even this partial cooperation.

Defeating Al Qaeda requires, foremost, that our assessments and analyses be anchored firmly to sound, empirical judgment and not blinded by conjecture and wishful thinking. Second, we need to refocus our attention and efforts on Pakistan and Afghanistan, where, in the months after 9/11, Al Qaeda was indeed on the run. Third, Al Qaeda cannot be defeated by military means alone because it relies on propaganda and radicalization.

Accordingly, the U.S. needs a strategy that better combines the tactical elements of systematically destroying and weakening Al Qaeda's capabilities alongside the equally critical imperatives of countering the resonance of that movement's message and breaking the cycle of terrorist recruitment and replenishment that has both sustained and replenished Al Qaeda.

Syria's Terror Networks (WT)

By Farid N. Ghadry

The Washington Times, February 20, 2007

The Syrian regime is just as complicit as Iran in moving forward hostile activities specifically designed to kill Americans. The evidence is there and widely acknowledged by those in the know, but U.S. political and military leadership have proved hesitant to publicly pursue a tandem case against both Iran and Syria, despite the very prominent linkages that exist between the two in fermenting a wide spectrum of terror operations targeting U.S. forces.

The recent implication of Iran's elite Revolutionary Guard Qods Force in facilitating the movement of deadly weapons and "super" IEDs specially designed to inflict maximum casualties and penetrate armor speaks to only one half of the real story.

Regional intelligence services and inside sources from within Sunni officer corps opposed to the Assad regime have identified major foreign-fighter training camps in northern Syria and just outside Damascus overseen by Syrian Military Intelligence and run by former Iraqi Ba'athi Generals and senior Saddam Fedayeen commanders.

One major foreign fighter camp exists in the Latakia province in northern Syria, a mountainous area replete with Syrian Military Intelligence facilities and wide swaths of ostensibly government property closed to the public. The Iraqi officer in charge there is one Maj. Gen. Majid Sulayman. Yet another such camp exists 40 kilometers to the west of the border town of Qamishli, which lies in the Kurdish area in the northeastern tip of Syria bordering Iraq and Turkey; it is run by Maj. Gen. Qays al-Adhami. The al-Shaybani camp lies 30 kilometers south of Damascus and also trains foreign fighters. The al-Ikhals camp lies in the heart of the Qaysun mountain range near Damascus.

The al Qaeda connection is not that far removed. Arab papers report that the recent movement of large numbers of al Qaeda in Iraq fighters from Syria into Palestinian refugee camps in northern Lebanon and Beirut are sounding alarm bells that the Syrian security services are preparing to use these heavily armed and visibly well-funded cells to launch attacks against the anti-Syrian democratic government of Lebanon.

These cells are directed by Syrian extremists such as Shakir Absi, Abu Qa Qa, Sheikh Hashem Minqara and Abu-Khalid Imlah, who have historical ties with Syrian intelligence; all were formerly imprisoned in special detention centers run by the Political Security Directorate and then suddenly released by the good graces of Syrian security around the same time in 2005. Absi and Imlah maintain the strongest ties to Syrian intelligence. Absi -- a former officer in the Syrian air force -- and Imlah -- the former head of SMI -- supported Fatah al-Intifadah -- who later created his own Fatah al-Islam offshoot.

What's more, European security services are warning that senior al Qaeda leadership figures Abdul Hadi al-Iraqi and Atiyah Abdul-Rahman have tasked al Qaeda assets in the Levant to prepare for major international operations targeting Western Europe and even the U.S homeland. Operational planning is said to be progressing with potential targets already cased out. And these are just the Sunni extremists that the Syrians support.

Mr. Chizari, one of the major IRGC commanders netted by Coalition Forces in December, was present in Damascus a month prior to his capture where he was meeting with senior Syrian leadership and the Lebanese Hezbollah officials in charge of a specially designated "Force 2800" which focuses on supporting fellow radical Shi'ite groups like the ones responsible for the recent kidnapping and execution of four U.S. soldiers in Karbala.

Mr. Chizari is the deputy for Iraq operations to Brig. Gen. Qasim Soleimani, who in turn heads Qods Force external operations and is strategic guide to IRGC activities in the Palestinian territories, Lebanon, Iraq and Afghanistan. The super IEDs, also known as explosive formed penetrators, would never have proliferated so widely in Iraq had it not been for the work of IRGC officials like Gen. Soleimani and Mr. Chizari. Gen. Soleimani's other right-hand man, Ja'afar al-Ibrahimi, aka Abu Mahdi al Muhandis, also attended these meetings. Muhandis is a senior Badr Brigade operator with close ties to Hezbollah and a central node to the IRGC supply network to anti-U.S. Shi'ite militias in Iraq. Mr. Muhandis was also recently identified by the United States as being behind the bombing of the U.S. embassy in Kuwait in the early 1980s as well.

The Syrian-Iranian regime terror connection is further underscored by Gen. Soleimani's participation in high-level discussions on a monthly basis with Syrian leadership, including Assad's brother and brother-in law.

Imad Mugniyeh, the infamous Hezbollah special operations super-terrorist who still retains a $5 million bounty on his head -- placed by the FBI due to his role in planning the Marine barrack and embassy bombings in Beirut in 1982 -- is also said to attend these meetings. Sources say that Mugniyeh was designated by Hezbollah Secretary-General Hassan Nasrallah as the head of Force 2800.

The case is apparent and it goes beyond the circumstantial. The Syrian regime is not merely dabbling in terror sponsorship in an ad hoc manner. This is a concerted and strategic effort designed to inflict the maximum punishment upon the United States and its allies, not just in the region but across the globe.

The full scope and depth of regime involvement in enabling acts of self-sustaining terror might never be known. But enough indicators have subsequently arisen within the shadow of Iran's own pernicious designs against the United States and struggling democratic allies in the Arab world, to realize that, left unchecked, we might find ourselves suddenly overwhelmed and outflanked by an enemy that, for the sake of expediency, was ignored.

Moral Waivers And The Military (NYT)

The Iraq war has plunged the Army into a vicious cycle of declining standards. Multiple, extended tours of duty have sapped morale and blighted recruiting. New plans for a larger overall force could reduce pressures but would also mean that recruiters would have to meet higher quotas.

To keep filling the ranks, the Army has had to keep lowering its expectations. Diluting educational, aptitude and medical standards has not been enough. Nor have larger enlistment bonuses plugged the gap. So the Army has found itself recklessly expanding the granting of “moral waivers,” which let people convicted of serious misdemeanors and even some felonies enlist in its ranks.

Last year, such waivers were granted to 8,129 men and women — or more than one out of every 10 new Army recruits. That number is up 65 percent since 2003, the year President Bush ordered the invasion of Iraq. In the last three years, more than 125,000 moral waivers have been granted by America’s four military services.

Most of last year’s Army waivers were for serious misdemeanors, like aggravated assault, robbery, burglary and vehicular homicide. But around 900 — double the number in 2003 — were for felonies. Worse, the Army does no systematic tracking of recruits with waivers once it signs them up, and it does not always pay enough attention to any adjustment problems. Without adequate monitoring and counseling, handing out guns to people who have already committed crimes poses a danger to the other soldiers they serve with and to the innocent civilians they are supposed to protect.

There is a long and honorable history of young people who have had minor scrapes with the law joining the military and successfully turning their lives around. But those who have committed more serious crimes, especially those involving weapons, vehicular homicide or sexual abuse, should generally be denied moral waivers. And those who do qualify for waivers should be monitored, counseled and carefully supervised.

The fastest way to drop the rate of moral waivers would be for the Army to rebuild its recently tarnished reputation among less problematic young Americans. That will require an end to involuntarily extended tours of duty and accelerated, multiple redeployments into combat. The military is America’s face to much of the world. It ought to present the best face of American youth.

The Firing Of Carol C. Lam (HARTC)

The Hartford Courant, February 19, 2007

A decision by Justice Department officials to fire federal prosecutor Carol C. Lam in San Diego for unspecified performance-related reasons is getting curiouser and curiouser.

Ms. Lam is among a dozen U.S. attorneys around the country who have been told to resign. Justice Department officials say the firings are for just cause; in Ms. Lam's case at least, the decision appears to be just political.

Ms. Lam headed the investigation into former U.S. Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a prominent San Diego Republican who pleaded guilty last year to tax evasion, conspiring to commit bribery, wire fraud and mail fraud. Prosecutors say Mr. Cunningham accepted at least $2.5 million in bribes from defense contractors.

On Tuesday, a San Diego grand jury returned an 11-count indictment against Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, the CIA's executive director from November 2004 to May of last year. Mr. Foggo is accused of steering business to his friend, Brent R. Wilkes, a California businessman and top Republican fundraiser. Mr. Foggo gave Mr. Wilkes classified information pertaining to the CIA, competing contractors and "other matters," according to the indictment.

The Cunningham and Foggo probes are pieces of a larger, ongoing investigation into the way lawmakers directed federal contracts toward friends and campaign supporters.

Both inquiries were overseen by Ms. Lam.

Her firing appears to have less to do with performance-related deficiency than it does political retaliation by high-level Justice Department officials who may also be attempting to derail an investigation that's potentially embarrassing to other members of Congress and the White House.

John McKay's Mysterious Exit (SEAPI)

By Carl Tobias, GUEST COLUMNIST

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, February 20, 2007

The controversy involving December's forced resignation of U.S. Attorneys, who are the chief prosecutors for six federal districts in the West, has heated up and focused on John McKay, who recently stepped down as the U.S. Attorney for the Western District of Washington.

On Feb. 6, the Senate Judiciary Committee held a hearing to analyze whether the Department of Justice was sacrificing prosecutorial independence by politicizing U.S. Attorney firing and hiring. Because it is unclear why McKay was forced out, Congress must continue evaluating his departure, and, if he resigned for questionable reasons, it should address them.

The hearing produced certain information, yet it provoked new questions. Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty testified that the resignations were for non-specific "performance-related" reasons. This prompted an immediate, sharp response from Western District of Washington Chief Judge Robert Lasnik and his colleagues: "We unanimously agreed that (John McKay) was an absolutely superb U.S. Attorney (and for DOJ) to suggest otherwise is unfair." He elaborated that local prosecutors and sheriffs and the FBI "never had the kind of service" in terms of "cooperation and aggressive handling of cases that they had under McKay's leadership."

The expeditious, thorough, informed response by the Western District judges is extraordinary. Federal judges rarely and with extreme caution publicly address Department of Justice interaction with U.S. Attorneys' offices because of separation of powers concerns and mutual respect. However, this response's unusual nature and its thorough, expert character suggest how deeply the judges feel about McKay's abilities. Moreover, district judges know much about U.S. attorneys' competence, because that office appears daily in the judges' courtrooms.

Many others admire McKay's professionalism. Seven months before McKay was asked to resign, he earned a stellar DOJ performance review, which found him "an effective, well-regarded and capable leader of the (office) and the District's law enforcement community." King County Prosecutor Norm Maleng also lauded McKay: "He did an outstanding job and took the office to a new level." In short, McKay was the U.S. Attorney's U. S. Attorney.

Like a true professional, McKay quietly tendered his resignation when asked, understanding that U.S. Attorneys serve at DOJ's pleasure. However, the suggestion that McKay's resignation was performance-related apparently proved too much and he challenged it, stating "that is unfair." The suggestion "reflects on my former colleagues in the office and the good work that we did, and I know that's not true." McKay said DOJ ordered him to resign on Dec. 7, but he "was given no explanation (and) certainly was told of no performance issues."

One concern lawmakers voiced is that U.S. Attorney resignation and appointment have become too politicized and are based on political factors, not merit, which can erode U.S. Attorneys' independence. Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., contended that even the departure and appointment of leading "federal prosecutors has become infused and corrupted with political" considerations. Top DOJ officials strongly deny that politics prompted the resignations. In January, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales stated he would not force a U.S. Attorney to leave for political reasons or stop an ongoing investigation and, at the recent hearing, McNulty agreed.

Some lawmakers have taken action. Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash., said "McKay has worked diligently for our region, and it is deeply disconcerting that he could have been let go for political reasons," while Congress and the public "have no tolerance for the politicization" of his office.

Murray asked DOJ to inform her "exactly what it means by 'performance-related' reasons and reassure (her) that McKay was not dismissed solely on the basis of partisan politics."

Lawmakers should continue investigating why John McKay resigned and, if he departed for inappropriate, politically animated reasons, initiate action.

Legislators who agree with those notions must cooperate with others to ascertain why McKay left and adopt any correctives that are required.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Emails Reveal Backdating Scheme (WSJ)

By Mark Boslet And Mark Maremont

The Wall Street Journal, February 19, 2007

Mercury Complaint Claims Wide Efforts Among Executives

As part of a years-long scheme to backdate stock options at Mercury Interactive Corp., former executives allegedly altered documents, repeatedly changed the dates of some option grants, and sent each other emails discussing the improper practice, according to a court document that has been at the center of a battle over confidentiality in the case.

In one 2000 email quoted in the court document, filed in state court in California by shareholders suing the former executives, a Mercury finance executive wrote to another official about using "magic backdating ink" to manipulate the date of an options grant. Another employee whose grant allegedly was backdated was told in an email that "the stock price drop made us change the grant date" and "you will be happier with the new price."

In another incident described in the filing, insiders allegedly covered up fax headers on documents to disguise the fact that an options grant was approved by directors long after its purported date.

The court document appears to provide some of the most vivid evidence yet of how options backdating took root and flourished inside a company, depicting a culture of lax controls in which top executives openly discussed how to manipulate the dates of options to make them more favorable to themselves and other insiders.

Mercury was one of the first companies ensnared in the options-backdating scandal, and it previously has admitted that its top executives improperly altered the dates of more than 50 option grants between 1996 and 2002. The Mountain View, Calif., software company, which was acquired by Hewlett-Packard Co. late last year for $4.5 billion, previously restated years of financial results, reducing its pretax income by $566.7 million from 1992 to 2004 -- nearly all because of options-related problems. Most of its top executives from the period in question have left the firm.

Mercury is one of about 140 companies being investigated in a broad federal probe of options backdating. Last week, a former chief executive of Take-Two Interactive Software Inc. and a former general counsel of Monster Worldwide Inc. separately pleaded guilty to options-related criminal charges in New York.

Stock options, a popular compensation tool, give employees the right to buy a company's stock at a preset "strike price," typically the market price on the date of grant. In theory, recipients can't profit unless the share price rises. At some companies, executives improperly backdated grants by pretending options were issued at an earlier time when the market price was lower, thus increasing the potential profit.

The new information about the Mercury case is contained in a 35-page shareholder-derivative complaint, originally filed in September under seal in Superior Court in Santa Clara, Calif., against four former top executives of the company. On Feb. 5, the judge overseeing the case, James P. Kleinberg, ordered it dismissed on a matter of standing, ruling that the plaintiffs no longer have a stake in the company after H-P's purchase. It is unclear if the plaintiffs will appeal that order, which didn't address the complaint's merits.

Several news organizations have been waging a legal battle to have some documents in the case unsealed. The former Mercury executives have opposed unsealing the documents. Judge Kleinberg has ordered the documents opened to public view, but they remain sealed pending appeal.

A copy of the complaint was appended to another filing in the case, and a Dow Jones News Service reporter obtained the document from the court's files late Friday. Neither Dow Jones & Co. nor The Wall Street Journal is a party to the legal attempt to unseal the documents.

Although filed on behalf of two shareholders, the complaint says it was prosecuted "at the request of" a special committee of Mercury's board, which last year decided to support the shareholder suit against the four former executives. The complaint appears to lean heavily on documents and other information from an internal probe overseen by Mercury's board.

The defendants in the case are: Sharlene Abrams and Douglas P. Smith, both former chief financial officers; Susan Skaer, a former general counsel; and Kenneth Klein, a former chief operating officer. The complaint alleges the four granted themselves more than three million backdated options, locking in a total of $54.3 million in immediate paper gains. In total, the four made "millions in illicit profit" by selling Mercury shares valued at about $88 million, the complaint alleges.

Jared Kopel, an attorney for Mr. Klein, said only "we can't comment on a document that the courts ordered to remain under seal." Brandon Wisoff, an attorney for Ms. Abrams, also cited the confidentiality order in refraining from commenting.

Patrick Robbins, who represents Mr. Smith, said: "This complaint contained irresponsibly inaccurate and incomplete recitations of events involving Mr. Smith, who did nothing wrong. We are gratified that the court has dismissed these claims."

An attorney for Ms. Skaer couldn't be immediately reached to comment. In past news reports, an attorney for Ms. Skaer has denied she did anything wrong.

Email messages discussing backdating were frequent among Mercury executives, the court complaint says. In one exchange from May 1999, officials debated how to set the date of an April 1999 grant, even though the purported date had passed weeks before. "[W]hat is the date for the April grant going to be?" Susie Fregoso, a payroll manager, asked Ms. Abrams on May 5. "Right now I have it as April 7 with a price of $27.125. You had mentioned that this might change, any news?"

In another email exchange from Aug. 3, 2000, discussing whether an employee could be retroactively included in an already-issued option grant -- which would have been improper unless the company took a special earnings charge -- Assistant Controller Kathy Hawkes tells Ms. Fregoso: "I betcha that Sharlene [Abrams] will overrule these types of things...and we will use her magic backdating ink," according to the court records.

Another April 2000 email appears to describe how former Chief Executive Amnon Landan and Ms. Abrams supposedly backdated a grant to a new employee, who was promised stock options in her job-offer letter. The trouble was, Mercury's stock price was falling, and the officials wanted to wait to lock in a lower price. "The reason the paperwork was not sent out is because the stock price drop made us change the grant date so that you could get the lower price," says the April 28, 2000 message to the new hire from Ms. Fregoso, the payroll manager, as quoted in the filing. "The 'New' grant is being approved next week by Sharlene [Abrams]/Amnon [Landan]. I know it has been a while, but believe me, you will be happier with the new price." It ended with a smiley-face emoticon.

In a mid-March 2002 email, general counsel Ms. Skaer wrote to Mr. Smith, the finance chief, suggesting they use a date two weeks earlier for a grant to 30 new employees, "unless we think the price will be better than that later this month" according to the complaint. "Let me know what you'd like to do," she added.

In addition, Mercury officials falsified records, including hiring agreements, to cover their tracks, the court document asserts. Mr. Smith was hired as an executive vice president in mid-2000. According to the complaint, the board approved a grant of 450,000 options to Mr. Smith on July 25, 2000, when Mercury's stock price was $94.69.

It claims Ms. Abrams and Ms. Skaer falsified Mr. Smith's employment letter to make it appear he was hired on May 23, 2000, and then priced his options on that date, when the share price was $65.20. The backdating added $13.3 million in potential profit to the grant, according to the complaint.

A May 22 employment letter was drawn up for Mr. Smith, which he signed and dated May 23, the complaint says. Bogus compensation committee minutes dated May 23 also were drawn up, claiming the board approved Mr. Smith's grant on that date, the complaint says. But electronic "metadata," or electronic tagging information, shows that the minutes weren't created until July 26, it adds.

Other documents were falsified in early 2002, according to the records. At the time, Mercury's share price was rising, and the defendants allegedly decided to backdate an option grant to Mr. Smith and Ms. Skaer to early November 2001, when the stock was significantly lower. In January, Mr. Landan, the former CEO, sent an email to outside directors seeking their consent for the earlier date, the complaint claims. When the directors faxed back the consent forms bearing the November grant date, the complaint says, "Skaer, or someone at her direction, intentionally falsified and altered [the documents] by whiting out the January 20, 2002 fax dates at the top of the return faxes."

The supposed alteration failed because one of the faxes was sent upside down, and the original date was left on one of the documents, the complaint alleges. Final approval for the grant wasn't obtained until a Feb. 12, 2002, board meeting, when the defendants allegedly changed the date yet again, to one several days earlier in November that was even more favorable to them, the complaint says.

CRIMINAL LAW:

The Defendant Isn't The Only Player With A Personal Stake In The Libby Verdict (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

WASHINGTON, Feb. 18 — As lawyers for I. Lewis Libby Jr. make their final argument to the jury on Tuesday, they face the daunting task of raising sufficient doubts about the government's assertion that Mr. Libby lied to a grand jury and federal investigators.

Prosecutors have built a detailed case to support their charges, presenting several plausible witnesses whose testimony conflicts with Mr. Libby's sworn statements. Still, the prosecution has the burden of convincing the jurors of Mr. Libby's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, an imprecise concept that makes the outcome of most complicated criminal trials unpredictable.

Peter Zeidenberg, a Justice Department prosecutor, is to begin the summation case for the government. He will be followed by Theodore V. Wells Jr., Mr. Libby's chief defense lawyer. As is customary in federal criminal trials, the prosecutors will have the last word, and it will be by Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the chief prosecutor. Each side will have a total of three hours.

While there are numerous lawyers on both sides, it is Mr. Wells and Mr. Fitzgerald who have emerged as the leading adversaries. They have argued dozens of legal issues before Judge Reggie B. Walton, politely jostled each other at the lectern and less politely complained about each other's tactics.

The stakes are obvious for Mr. Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, who faces five felony charges for allegedly lying during an investigation of who leaked to reporters the name of a C.I.A. operative, Valerie Wilson. But there are significant stakes as well for Mr. Wells and Mr. Fitzgerald.

At the end of 2003, Mr. Fitzgerald, the chief federal prosecutor in Chicago, was chosen as special counsel to investigate the leak of Ms. Wilson's identity. Her name was first disclosed in a July 14, 2003, column by Robert D. Novak only days after The New York Times published an Op-Ed article by her husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV. Mr. Wilson, a former ambassador, had accused the Bush White House of knowingly distorting intelligence about Iraq's efforts to obtain material for its nuclear program in order to bolster the case for going to war.

Mr. Fitzgerald successfully pressed reporters to give evidence about their confidential interviews, even sending one, Judith Miller of The New York Times, to jail for 85 days before she agreed to testify to the grand jury.

Mr. Fitzgerald discovered who leaked Ms. Wilson's name to Mr. Novak — Richard L. Armitage, a deputy secretary of state and Karl Rove, President Bush's top political adviser — but did not bring criminal charges against them. He did, however, charge Mr. Libby, who he said had obstructed justice and committed perjury by giving untruthful answers to the grand jury and the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

It was a serious crime, he told reporters, because it was like "throwing sand in the umpire's face," impeding the prosecutor's mission. For Mr. Fitzgerald, the outcome of the trial will in part be a verdict on his decision to seek Mr. Libby's indictment.

Mr. Wells, a renowned defense lawyer, has characteristically thrown himself into his work. He has bested prosecutors in the past in defending public officials, and in this case he has battled over every sliver of an issue. Mr. Wells, along with William H. Jeffress Jr., put on a short defense last week; much of their strategy was based on discrediting Mr. Fitzgerald's witnesses during cross-examination.

Lawrence Barcella, a former federal prosecutor and experienced white-collar defense lawyer in Washington, said that closing statements were important but often not as crucial as nonlawyers might think.

"Actually, opening statements are more important," Mr. Barcella said, saying that studies and conventional wisdom among trial lawyers showed that jurors typically made up their minds early in the trial.

Dan K. Webb, also a prominent defense lawyer who was the chief federal prosecutor in Chicago, disagreed. Mr. Webb said in an interview that he thought closing statements were often "the most important part of a trial" because a lawyer could weave a persuasive closing argument as well as a favorable factual summary of the case.

"It's a combination of skilled closing argument and effective cross-examinations that win most cases," he said.

In their closing arguments, both sides will strive to project believability, but with markedly different styles. Mr. Wells's closing speeches are filled with emotion and motion, as his arms wave and he strides about in front of the jury, expressing indignation at the government's case.

Mr. Fitzgerald, along with Mr. Zeidenberg, is expected to offer straightforward and unemotional presentations.

The prosecution wants to offer a streamlined and simplified argument that Mr. Libby lied in two grand jury appearances and two F.B.I. interviews when he said he had not discussed Ms. Wilson with two reporters. To believe that, the jurors will be told by prosecutors, they will have to disbelieve several witnesses, including the two reporters.

In addition, they will have to discount the testimony of several officials who said Mr. Libby knew of Ms. Wilson's identity before he said he learned it from Tim Russert of NBC News.

Mr. Wells will probably focus on inconsistencies he and Mr. Jeffress exposed in cross-examination, demonstrating that nobody's memory is perfect.

In two days of cross-examination of Mr. Russert, for instance, Mr. Wells nicked and slashed at his credibility and character. But it was unclear if he had cast doubt on Mr. Russert's essential testimony, that Mr. Libby was lying when he swore that he had learned about Ms. Wilson from Mr. Russert.

In his opening statement, Mr. Wells said that Mr. Libby had been made a scapegoat by unnamed White House officials who wanted to protect Mr. Rove because of his political importance to Mr. Bush.

But Mr. Wells did not present any testimony to support that thesis, and will probably be barred from repeating it in his closing statement.

Trial Spotlights Cheney's Power As An Infighter (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

WASHINGTON, Feb. 19 — A picture taking shape from hours of testimony and reams of documents in the trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. shatters any notion that the White House was operating as a model of cohesion throughout President Bush's first term.

The trial against Mr. Libby has centered on a narrow case of perjury, with days of sparring between the defense and prosecution lawyers over the numbing details of three-year-old conversations between White House officials and journalists. But a close reading of the testimony and evidence in the case is more revelatory, bringing into bolder relief a portrait of a vice president with free rein to operate inside the White House as he saw fit in order to debunk the charges of a critic of the war in Iraq.

The evidence in the trial shows Vice President Dick Cheney and Mr. Libby, his former chief of staff, countermanding and even occasionally misleading colleagues at the highest levels of Mr. Bush's inner circle as the two pursued their own goal of clearing the vice president's name in connection with flawed intelligence used in the case for war.

The testimony in the trial, which is heading for final arguments as early as Tuesday, calls into question whether Mr. Cheney, known as a consummate inside player, operated as effectively as his reputation would hold. For all of his machinations, Mr. Cheney's efforts sometimes faltered as he tried, with the help of Mr. Libby, to push back against critics during a crucial period in the early summer of 2003, when Mr. Bush's initial case for war was beginning to fall apart. In some of their efforts, Mr. Cheney and his agent, Mr. Libby, appeared even maladroit in the art of news management.

While others on the White House team were primarily concerned about Mr. Bush, the evidence has shown that Mr. Libby had a more acute concern about his own boss. Unbeknownst to their colleagues, according to testimony, the two carried out a covert public relations campaign to defend not only the case for war but also Mr. Cheney's connection to the flawed intelligence.

In doing so, they used some of the most sensitive and classified intelligence data available, information others on Mr. Bush's team was not yet prepared to put to use in a public fight against a war critic.

A Quiet Scramble

At one point in the trial an adviser to Mr. Cheney recounted leaving a room in discomfort when she heard Mr. Libby sharing information from one of the government's most highly classified documents, not knowing Mr. Libby had secret presidential approval in hand. In his own testimony, Mr. Libby told of a failed effort to stanch negative coverage from Chris Matthews of MSNBC by trying to exploit a rivalry between him and Tim Russert, the Washington bureau chief at NBC News.

Mr. Cheney and Mr. Libby were trying in particular to distance the vice president from an assertion that Saddam Hussein had sought large quantities of nuclear material in Africa that was ultimately deemed questionable.

Mr. Cheney was given ownership of the claim by a former ambassador, Joseph C. Wilson IV, who wrote in an Op-Ed article in The New York Times on July 6, 2003, that he had been dispatched to Africa because of questions by Mr. Cheney's office. Mr. Wilson wrote that he returned from Africa highly doubtful about the claim and reported that to the Central Intelligence Agency and the State Department.

When Mr. Bush repeated the claim months later — in a 16-word sentence of his 2003 State of the Union address weeks before the Iraq invasion — Mr. Wilson wrote that he was compelled to question publicly whether Mr. Cheney had ignored his findings because they were inconvenient to the case against Iraq.

Even prosecution witnesses have testified that while Mr. Cheney had asked for more information about the accusation that Mr. Hussein sought uranium in Africa more than a year before the invasion, he did not know that Mr. Wilson was sent to investigate. And, witnesses said at trial, he did not learn about the trip until Mr. Wilson began to make his case publicly. This might explain why Mr. Cheney was so intent on debunking Mr. Wilson.

News of Mr. Wilson's mission, its findings and Mr. Cheney's supposed role in his assignment first surfaced two months before he stepped forward with his article, in reports that described him only as an anonymous former ambassador. Mr. Wilson decided to reveal himself after concluding that his anonymous account was not being taken seriously enough, according to testimony.

But those earlier reports prompted a quiet scramble by Mr. Libby to figure out who this anonymous ambassador was, who had sent him on his mission and what had happened with his findings. By the time Mr. Wilson came forward, Mr. Libby and Mr. Cheney knew that Mr. Wilson had been dispatched to Africa by the C.I.A. unit where his wife, Valerie, worked. The eventual exposure of her identity as a covert operative set forth the investigation that led to Mr. Libby's trial this year.

Mr. Libby faces charges that he lied to authorities who were looking into whether, in defending against Mr. Wilson's accusations, the administration intentionally exposed the identity of Mrs. Wilson to undercut her husband and clear Mr. Cheney. A jury will decide if Mr. Libby misled investigators or, as his defense asserts, lost track of what he said or learned amid a hectic schedule.

White House officials denied several requests for comment about the testimony and the story it generally tells, citing a reluctance to comment on anything involving the trial.

Declassifying and Leaking

Mr. Wilson's July 6 article was, in Mr. Libby's view, "a very serious attack." In his grand jury testimony, which was shared in the current trial, he said the charges amounted to a potentially severe blow to the administration credibility.

And the day after the Op-Ed article ran, the president's press secretary, Ari Fleischer, said the White House had lost confidence in the uranium assertion.

Mr. Libby's notes from a White House meeting of senior presidential advisers on the morning of July 8 — the sort of meeting that staff members rarely discuss publicly — read, "Uranium story is becoming a question of the president's trustworthiness." The notes quote Karl Rove, the presidential adviser tasked with Mr. Bush's re-election, as lamenting, "Now they have accepted Joe Wilson as credible expert." The notes reflected a general concern that the White House was not moving swiftly enough to contain the damage.

What others present at that White House meeting did not know was that Mr. Libby and Mr. Cheney were already conducting their own quiet campaign. Its purpose was to show not only that the White House had ample reason to believe the flawed intelligence even after Mr. Wilson's mission but also to defend against Mr. Cheney's alleged connection to the uranium claim.

Mr. Libby testified to the grand jury that an angry Mr. Cheney had by then already directed him to approach a reporter he regarded as suitable, Judith Miller of The New York Times, to make his case. Mr. Libby was under instruction to describe the vice president's ignorance of Mr. Wilson's mission and to discuss parts of the National Intelligence Estimate from October 2002 as well as another intelligence document showing the C.I.A. continued promoting the theory about Iraq's efforts to acquire uranium months after Mr. Wilson's trip.

The release of the intelligence estimate was a sensitive issue. Others in the administration had considered doing so that spring when Mr. Wilson's claim first surfaced, but faced resistance from the C.I.A. One investigator questioned in the trial testified that Mr. Libby's notes indicated that George J. Tenet, then director of central intelligence, was personally opposed to doing so.

Mr. Libby said he found a way around that resistance by getting backdoor approval from the president. In a hush-hush meeting described in testimony, Mr. Libby asked the vice president's chief counsel, David S. Addington, whether the president could declassify intelligence personally, effectively without C.I.A. knowledge or approval.

Mr. Addington testified that as he explained to Mr. Libby that indeed the president could do so, Mr. Libby shushed him. "He extended his hands out and pushed down a little like that, that would indicate, 'Hold your voice down,' " Mr. Addington said at the trial. Mr. Libby testified that Mr. Cheney then went to Mr. Bush and got a presidential declassification.

White House officials have said Mr. Bush did not know how Mr. Cheney and Mr. Libby intended to use the intelligence.

Mr. Libby's attempt to use the newly declassified data with Ms. Miller failed. He met with her for two hours at the St. Regis Hotel on July 8.

But, as Mr. Libby told the grand jury, going to Ms. Miller was "a poor choice" because she never used the information.

Cathie Martin, Mr. Cheney's former communications director, recalled her discomfort at seeing Mr. Libby reading from the estimate later in the day while he called back reporters covering the story, at Mr. Cheney's direction, among them Andrea Mitchell of NBC News.

Other senior officials were perplexed when they apparently saw some of Mr. Libby's handiwork from those phone calls in action. After Ms. Mitchell reported that night on NBC News that "The White House blamed an October C.I.A. report for ignoring Wilson's information," the president's deputy national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, indicated that he had got an earful from Mr. Tenet, according to Ms. Martin's testimony.

Ms. Martin testified that at a senior staff meeting the following morning Mr. Hadley strongly hinted he thought she was responsible and told her the finger-pointing had been a disservice to the president. According to Ms. Martin's testimony, Mr. Libby let her take the blame and "looked down" as Mr. Hadley shared his chagrin. Mr. Cheney, she said, later told her not to worry about it.

Spinning Wheels

It was one of several times when Mr. Libby and Mr. Cheney were portrayed as disregarding Mr. Hadley, who now holds Condoleezza Rice's former title of national security adviser but was then her second in command.

At a meeting on July 10, Mr. Hadley had suggested to Mr. Libby and Mr. Cheney that the intelligence estimate could be leaked to a friendly reporter, Mr. Libby testified that his notes said. But neither he nor Mr. Cheney told Mr. Hadley that they had started trying to do so days earlier.

But all the same, their effort was by no means a smashing success.

Mr. Libby was frustrated that Mr. Matthews of MSNBC, for instance, was continuing to assert that Mr. Cheney had ignored Mr. Wilson's findings.

His notes indicate that Mary Matalin, the longtime Cheney political adviser, suggested that he call Mr. Russert to complain. NBC is a co-owner of MSNBC. "Call Tim. He hates Chris," Mr. Libby's notes read, according to testimony. His later call to Mr. Russert, he lamented to the grand jury, did not bear fruit.

The notes also indicated that Ms. Matalin said the White House needed a "Tenet-like" statement to clear the president. In fact, Mr. Tenet released a statement the following day — after tense negotiations with Mr. Libby and Mr. Hadley — taking responsibility for the bad intelligence.

Mr. Fleischer testified that he was pleased with the statement as the president's spokesman; Ms. Martin testified that it did not go far enough from the perspective of her office. And under the direction of the vice president, Mr. Libby continued his public relations push.

With the West Wing and the C.I.A. seemingly in open feud, it ultimately fell to Mr. Hadley to step forward and say on July 22 that it was his fault that the questionable claim wound up in the president's speech.

The Mystery Man In Scooter Libby Trial (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff

Newsweek, February 19, 2007

Richard Hohlt is the heavy hitter you've never heard of.

Robert Novak, as usual, had a scoop to unload—only this time, it was from the witness stand. Testifying last week in the trial of Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis (Scooter) Libby, the conservative columnist gruffly described how he first learned from two top Bush administration officials that Valerie Plame, wife of Iraq war critic Joseph Wilson, was a CIA officer. But then Novak injected a new name into the drama—one that virtually nobody in the courtroom knew.

Asked by one of Libby's lawyers if he had talked about Plame with anybody else before outing her in his column, Novak said he'd discussed her with a lobbyist named Richard Hohlt. Who, the lawyer pressed, is Hohlt? "He's a very good source of mine" whom I talk to "every day," Novak replied. Indeed, Hohlt is such a good source that after Novak finished his column naming Plame, he testified, he did something most journalists rarely do: he gave the lobbyist an advance copy of his column. What Novak didn't tell the jury is what the lobbyist then did with it: Hohlt confirmed to NEWSWEEK that he faxed the forthcoming column to their mutual friend Karl Rove (one of Novak's sources for the Plame leak), thereby giving the White House a heads up on the bombshell to come.

The trial of Libby—who is charged with lying about his own alleged role in the disclosure of Plame's identity—has revealed much about how government officials and journalists swap secrets. But Hohlt's outing was especially revealing. Unlike many of the high-profile Washington players who have populated the Plame affair, Hohlt is a Beltway power broker of a different sort. He works quietly, rarely makes the papers and likes it that way. Hohlt, 58, came to Washington more than 30 years ago as an aide to Sen. Richard Lugar. He now represents A-list clients like Bristol Myers, Chevron, JPMorgan Chase and the Nuclear Energy

Association. At the same time, he raises buckets of cash for the Republican Party: he was designated a "Super Ranger," a fund-raiser who raked in more than $500,000 for President Bush's re-election.

But Hohlt's more significant role may be his leadership of a secretive social group of GOP heavy hitters and, occasionally, White House officials, who convene to smoke cigars and mull over politics. The group's name: the Off The Record Club. Hohlt is the club's "keeper of the flame," says one participant who, like others contacted for this story, didn't want to be named because it violates the group's rules. Each month or so for more than 15 years, Hohlt has booked a room at a posh Washington hotel or restaurant and invited the guests for dinner. Among the regulars, according to three participants: fellow lobbyists Ken Duberstein, Charlie Black and Vin Weber. Rove and White House chief of staff Josh Bolten "have both attended these meetings on occasion," says a White House spokesperson. (Duberstein and Weber did not respond to requests for comment. Black wouldn't talk about the club because "one of the purposes of it is to be off the record," he says.) "It's really just a bunch of old-timers who like to shoot the breeze," Hohlt tells NEWSWEEK. "We can complain about our clients, complain about what's going on on the Hill." (Hohlt's most recent gripe: a new D.C. smoking ban that has snuffed out the after-dinner stogies.) The club, participants say, helps the White House with damage control—they prodded GOP pols to back the president's post-Katrina cleanup—and thinks up ways to get the party's message across to the press.

That's where Hohlt has proved most valuable. An accomplished information trader, Hohlt serves as a background source for a select group of Washington journalists—Novak above all. "He's known as the person you go to to try to get stuff in Novak's column," says one semiregular OTR participant. (Novak says it is "ridiculous" to suggest he writes what Hohlt wants.)

After Novak first told Hohlt that he was working on a hot story about ex-ambassador Joe Wilson, Hohlt says he e-mailed Rove to expect a phone call from Novak. Then Hohlt began pressing Novak to learn the juicy details. On July 11, 2003, three days before the column was published, Novak gave him a preview copy. (Unknown to Hohlt, Rove had already confirmed to Novak that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA.) That same day, Hohlt e-mailed details about the column to Rove, and later faxed him the entire unpublished article. (Rove's lawyer confirms this account.) "I was just trying to be helpful," Hohlt says. His role as a go-between later earned him a visit from the FBI, but it stayed secret until now. And that was just fine with Hohlt, who says that his greatest accomplishment as a lobbyist has been "staying out of the press." Thanks to last week's testimony, his cover—like Valerie Plame's—is now blown.

WHAT VINCE CAN DO (PHDN)

By Michael Hinkelman

Philadelphia Daily News, February 19, 2007

WHEN THE FEDS delivered a hefty 267-page, 139-count indictment against state Sen. Vince Fumo on Feb. 6, they were trying to show they've got the goods on him, a former federal prosecutor said.

But is it really a "slam dunk" case against the Prince of Philadelphia, who has pleaded not guilty to the charges?

Or are there strategies that Fumo can use to beat the case?

Yes, say defense lawyers and legal experts. This case is winnable for Fumo.

Fumo is charged with defrauding the state Senate and a South Philly charity of more than $2 million by using Senate staffers and charity workers for his personal and political benefit.

His lawyer, Richard A. Sprague, calls the indictment malicious and politically motivated, and says the feds didn't appreciate or understand how Fumo's office operates.

Sprague said he didn't want to tip his hand about how he'll defend Fumo, so the Daily News contacted some prominent defense attorneys to see how they might defend the embattled pol.

Here are some strategies they suggested.

Delay, delay, delay

A prominent criminal defense attorney and former federal prosecutor said he would do everything he could to keep the case from going to trial.

"I'd use every legal maneuver I could," said Carmen C. Nasuti. "I'd try to get the indictment dismissed, I'd try to get evidence excluded and I'd file as many pretrial motions as I could."

Nasuti said once the trial starts and evidence is admitted, there are "little things" that can't be readily explained or easily defended.

In this case, he said, one of those little things is the allegation that Fumo hired a private eye with state money to snoop on his political rivals and his ex-wife and ex-girlfriends.

The O.J. Simpson defense

The feds investigated Fumo for four years, and Sprague has said prosecutors want to "destroy" Fumo.

Some lawyers said this could be the linchpin of a strategy where the defense tries to paint prosecutors as overzealous or having misplaced enforcement priorities.

Who else gets investigated for four years? And what else could the feds have been investigating if they didn't divert so many resources to "destroy" Fumo?

"This could be just like the O. J. Simpson case where the jury was more interested in sending a message about misconduct in the L.A. Police Department than convicting Simpson of murder," even though the evidence pointed to Simpson's guilt, said attorney Charles A. Peruto Jr.

Even if jurors have evidence of Fumo's guilt, they might "hand it back to him," Peruto said, if they think prosecutors unfairly targeted Fumo.

"Jurors would focus more on the good things Fumo has done, and the people he's helped," Peruto said.

Fumo as his own best defense

Many white-collar defense lawyers don't want their high-profile clients to testify because it's high-risk and could undermine previous gains they've made with jurors.

But Fumo's situation is different, some say.

"My own experience is, if you have an engaging client and you know he has a plausible explanation for conduct the government claims is illegal, then put him on the stand," said Jack Meyerson, a former federal prosecutor who prosecuted Fumo in 1980 on fraud charges.

Fumo, who is smart and charming, testified in his own defense in his 1980 trial.

A jury convicted him and two others in that case, but the convictions were tossed out by a federal judge and his decision was upheld on appeal.

The senator will almost certainly see the jury this time as a small group of voters he can - and must - win over. As he told his fellow senators on Feb. 5, he wasn't just in a fight to save his political career but a fight for "everything that I hold dear."

If that's the case, how can he not tell his story to the jury?

"This case is going to hinge on Fumo's testimony," predicted attorney William Spade, a former city prosecutor who defended ex-city treasurer Corey Kemp in 2005.

"It's his to win or lose because it's all about his character, and jurors are going to want to hear from him. It's not even debatable," Spade said.

Make it about Pat, not Vince

Sprague has said the indictment was "born of political ambition," referring to U.S. Attorney Pat Meehan.

Pundits have speculated that if Meehan bags Fumo, his political upside is sky-high. He would be seen as taking down one of the state's most powerful Democratic pols and cleaning up the city's political cesspool.

"Find an explanation for [the prosecution] which is different from the government's case and try to build on that," said NiaLena Caravasos, a partner in the firm of former Philadelphia District Attorney F. Emmett Fitzpatrick.

Winning high-profile cases can launch political careers, she said.

Caravasos noted that Rudolph Giuliani first made a name for himself when, as Manhattan's U.S. attorney in 1989, he got a 98-count racketeering and securities fraud indictment of then-Wall Street junk bond king Michael Milken.

Milken copped a plea to six lesser charges and served almost two years in prison. And Giuliani? He became a two-term mayor of New York and is now a leading candidate for the GOP presidential nomination in 2008.

Play the politics card

A study by two retired communications professors of federal investigations of more than 300 local officeholders and candidates from 2001 to 2006 by the Bush Justice Department found that 85 percent of the targets were Democrats.

The Justice Department has declined to comment on the study and Meehan has said that politics plays no role in his office's investigations.

More recently, the Bush Justice Department has come under fire for removing the sitting U.S. attorney for Arkansas and replacing him with a former political operative for Karl Rove, Bush's chief political adviser.

A defense based on the Bush Justice Department's bias would almost certainly hinge on jury selection, several defense lawyers said.

"If there are an equal number of Democrats on the jury panel as Republicans, the defense might be able to take advantage of the anti-Bush administration sentiment out there," said Meyerson.

Fumo is a 24/7 guy

Fumo said during a speech on the Senate floor on Feb. 5 that his staffers "routinely" work at all hours of the day and no public business is ever slighted.

"I have a 24/7 operation," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0133802

Defense attorneys said it wouldn't be difficult to find Fumo staffers to testify to this.

"I could see myself putting on a 24/7 defense," said Spade.

It's "not disingenuous" to think that Fumo staffers allegedly doing personal favors for Fumo during regular working hours made up for it by working on their own time.

"People who work hard or who love their boss or job know that you take your work home with you and you work on weekends. Jurors can understand that," Spade said.

Whichever strategy is employed, the case is fraught with potential peril for both the feds and Fumo, Caravasos said.

"This is a case that has the potential to explode for either side," she said. "The prosecution could be seen as pushing an agenda. The defense could be viewed as being disingenuous with the jury. For both sides, humility will go a long way, if they can dial it back and recognize that."

Justices To Revisit Thorny Issue Of Sentencing Guidelines In First Cases After Recess (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

WASHINGTON, Feb. 19 — The Supreme Court returns on Tuesday from a monthlong recess to face a daunting and urgent task: explaining what it meant two years ago when it ruled that the federal sentencing guidelines were to be treated as "advisory," no longer binding on federal judges.

The decision that dropped that bombshell on the criminal justice system, United States v. Booker, has not penetrated public consciousness in the way that, say, the Miranda decision on the right against self-incrimination did a generation ago. But in its own way, it has been no less revolutionary, creating turmoil in criminal sentencing.

The justices will hear arguments on Tuesday morning in two cases that will provide the latest chapter, although almost certainly not the final one, in the court's continuing and, to many, profoundly unsettling reappraisal of the roles of juries and judges in criminal sentencing.

The Booker decision came in two parts, each decided by a different 5-to-4 majority, with only Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg joining the majority in both halves. The court ruled on the one hand that the sentencing guidelines violated defendants' Sixth Amendment right to trial by jury by giving judges, rather than juries, the power to make the factual findings that determined where to set the actual sentence within the range provided by the guidelines.

It then ruled that the guidelines system could nonetheless be saved as long as the guidelines were considered advisory rather than mandatory, to be consulted by judges in the course of imposing sentences that would be upheld on appeal as long as they were not "unreasonable." A debate over the meaning of "unreasonable" lies at the heart of the two cases the court will hear on Tuesday.

The court has acquired two new justices since the Booker decision, adding still more uncertainty to this complex picture. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. replaced two justices, Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who believed that the guidelines were constitutional. Those justices were thus dissenters from the first half of the opinion and joined the majority in the second half to permit the continued use of "advisory" guidelines.

But last month, Chief Justice Roberts joined the court's 6-to-3 decision striking down California's sentencing law on the ground that it gave judges more power than the court's recent precedents permit. Chief Justice Rehnquist would almost certainly have come down on the other side. Chief Justice Roberts's vote in that case, Cunningham v. California, at least suggests the possibility that the new chief justice may believe that the guidelines pose a constitutional problem that cannot be remedied by the device of calling them advisory.

In the Booker decision, the justices expected Congress, which established the guidelines system in the Sentencing Reform Act of 1984, to respond by amending the law to meet the court's objections; "the ball now lies in Congress's court," Justice Stephen G. Breyer wrote for the majority in the decision's second half.

But Congress has not acted and shows little appetite for doing so. After allowing dozens of sentencing appeals to accumulate and watching conflicts among the federal circuits over how to interpret the Booker ruling grow more entrenched, the justices in November accepted two cases that frame different aspects of the same basic question: what is the role of the sentencing guidelines in the post-Booker world?

The new cases break down that broad question into a series of smaller questions of great practical importance:

If a sentence is within the range set by the guidelines, should that sentence be presumed to be reasonable? Does a sentence outside the range carry a presumption of unreasonableness and require a special justification? What kind of justification? If the guidelines are entitled to more weight than the other sentencing factors that Congress included in the Sentencing Reform Act, how much more weight?

On the other hand, if the guidelines are simply one factor among others, how are their often harsh terms to be reconciled with the statute's instruction to judges to "impose a sentence sufficient, but not greater than necessary"?

Of all these issues, the reasonableness presumption for a guidelines sentence is the most important, for the reason that judges have continued to impose sentences within the guidelines most of the time — in 86 percent of all sentences, according to a study last year by the United States Sentencing Commission. Of the 12 regional appellate circuits, 7 have adopted the presumption.

To the Justice Department and the sentencing commission, the agency that determines the sentencing guidelines for all federal offenses, the presumption of reasonableness is the correct response to the Booker decision, consistent with both the ruling and the statute. To the defense bar and others who criticize the sentencing guidelines as overly rigid and mechanistic, the presumption defies the constitutional holding of the Booker ruling.

The presumption "simply resurrects the system rejected in Booker," Thomas N. Cochran, an assistant federal public defender in Greensboro, N.C., told the court in the brief he filed on behalf of Victor A. Rita Jr., the defendant in one of the two new cases. Mr. Cochran will argue Mr. Rita's case, Rita v. United States, No. 06-5754. It is an appeal from the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, in Richmond, Va., one of the circuits that has adopted the reasonableness presumption.

Mr. Rita is a retired marine and former criminal investigator for the immigration service, 57 years old and in poor health in part because of injuries suffered in Vietnam and the Persian Gulf war. He was convicted of obstructing justice and making false statements to a federal grand jury that was investigating the sale of kits for making machine guns.

He argued that his military and government service and poor health warranted a sentence below the 33-to-41-month range provided by the guidelines. But the trial judge imposed a 33-month sentence, which the Fourth Circuit, applying the reasonableness presumption, affirmed.

In the second case, Claiborne v. United States, No. 06-5618, the trial judge was notably more sympathetic to the defendant, Mario Claiborne, who pleaded guilty in Federal District Court in St. Louis to possession of cocaine with intent to distribute. Mr. Claiborne, then 20 years old, faced a sentence of 37 to 46 months.

But the trial judge imposed a sentence of only 15 months, telling Mr. Claiborne that a higher sentence "would be tantamount to throwing you away." The government appealed, and the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit ruled that the "extraordinary" variance, 60 percent lower than the low end of the guidelines range, could be justified only by equivalently extraordinary circumstances, which it found were not present.

Mr. Claiborne, who is also represented by an assistant federal public defender, Michael Dwyer, has served his 15 months. If the justices uphold the Eighth Circuit, he faces resentencing and a possible return to federal prison.

Supreme Court Revisits How Much Leeway Judges Can Have In Sentencing (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, February 20, 2007

WASHINGTON

Two years ago, the US Supreme Court struck down the federal sentencing guidelines system because it forced judges in some cases to increase a criminal's punishment based on information that had never been proved to a jury.

The Constitution says that every defendant has a right to a jury trial, and the high court ruled that such a mandatory sentencing system violates that right.

Instead of invalidating the entire guidelines system and leaving it to Congress to fix the problem, five justices agreed to craft a remedy to retain most of the guidelines. But the result has confused many judges across the country and caused federal appeals courts to rule in conflicting ways.

Tuesday, the high court is set to hear oral argument in two cases that analysts say may help clear up some of the confusion. The decision will be closely watched.

"We are talking about the rules that govern every federal case – 80,000 cases a year," says Marc Miller, a law professor and sentencing scholar at the University of Arizona College of Law.

In its 2005 decision, the Supreme Court ruled that the sentencing guidelines were no longer mandatory, only advisory. "The district courts, while not bound to apply the guidelines, must consult those guidelines and take them into account when sentencing," Justice Stephen Breyer, declared in a second part of that decision.

Justice Breyer didn't stop there. He and his four colleagues empowered the appeals courts to police this new sentencing system by examining whether sentencing judges were being unreasonable in the way they determined punishment.

In a dissent, Justice Antonin Scalia warned that Breyer's remedial action would "wreak havoc" in federal district and appeals courts. Although it is unclear exactly how much havoc has been wreaked, there is no doubt that many courts are struggling to interpret the decision.

At issue is how much weight judges should give to the guidelines now that they are only advisory?

On one side are those who argue that sentencing judges should be free to adopt or reject the guidelines on an equal footing with several other factors Congress has identified as important sentencing objectives. The key, they say, is that judges rely on reasoned judgment rather than a mechanical guidelines formula to mete out punishments.

On the other side are those who say the guidelines must be afforded an exalted status among sentencing factors since they represent the collective wisdom of the US Sentencing Commission created by Congress.

Five of the nation's 12 appeals courts have embraced the former approach, while seven have embraced the latter approach.

Specifically, the question is whether appeals court judges should award a presumption of reasonableness to any sentence imposed within the range of the guidelines.

Such an approach promotes clarity, stability, and uniformity in the sentencing nationwide, supporters say.

Critics say it erodes the advisory nature of the guidelines and judicial flexibility at sentencing, potentially raising the same constitutional objection that led to mandatory guidelines being struck down in 2005.

The two cases being heard Tuesday had been decided by appeals courts that award a presumption of reasonableness to sentences imposed within the guideline range.

One involves Victor Rita, a decorated combat veteran of the Vietnam and Gulf wars, who was convicted in North Carolina of making two false statements to federal agents about a parts kit he had purchased for a vintage battle rifle. Mr. Rita had no prior criminal history and there were no aggravating characteristics related to his background. But a pre-sentence report prepared under the federal sentencing guidelines classified Rita as an "accessory after the fact" to alleged import violations by the company that sold him the parts kit.

That classification – never presented to the jury at his trial – doubled his potential prison term from 15 to 33 months.

The judge sentenced Rita to 33 months in prison in accord with the guidelines. The Fourth US Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the sentence as presumptively reasonable since it was within the guidelines.

Rita's lawyers say the courts placed too much weight on the guidelines and never explained why other factors pointing to a lesser sentence were rejected.

The other case involves an example of a judge imposing a sentence that is less than half as long as the guidelines suggest.

Mario Claiborne pleaded guilty to distribution and possession of crack cocaine. He had evidence of a stable home life, no prior criminal history, and no one was threatened or injured during the crime. But the bag of crack cocaine weighed 5.03 grams. The extra 0.03 grams significantly increased his potential prison term.

Nonetheless, Mr. Claiborne's sentencing judge rejected the suggested guidelines sentence of 37 months and instead imposed a 15-month prison term.

Federal prosecutors appealed, and the Eighth US Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the sentence. The appeals court said that a guidelines sentence is "presumed reasonable" and that a sentencing judge who rejects the guidelines sentence must offer a compelling justification to warrant the difference between the higher and lower sentence.

The Bush administration is urging the court to declare that guidelines are entitled to a presumption of reasonableness.

"The guidelines are written and revised by an expert agency, with an intent to integrate [all other sentencing] factors and with input from Congress and sentencing judges across the country," writes US Solicitor General Paul Clement in his brief.

Lawyers for Claiborne and Rita say the sentencing judge should consider all the relevant sentencing factors and hand down a fair and just sentence. If the guidelines are truly advisory, a judge's sentence should be upheld, they say, even when it deviates from the guidelines.

The ruling is not likely to change dramatically the leniency or severity of most sentences, analysts say, but if the court rejects the presumption-of-reasonableness approach, it will probably trigger a somewhat greater variation of sentences.

DA BOOTS PROBER-TURNED-MOB-SWEETIE (NYPOST)

By Larry Celona

The New York Post, February 19, 2007

An investigator for the Brooklyn DA's Office has been forced to resign amid allegations she fell for a jailed mobster - and hatched a plan to bear his love child, The Post has learned.

The 37-year-old prober had been assigned to protect the "mob associate" while he was being held in secret hotel rooms for interviews about the bombshell corruption case involving ex-FBI agent Lindley DeVecchio, sources said.

The sources identified her as Maria Biagini, a 15-year veteran of DA Charles Hynes' office who left her job last week.

A Hynes spokesman confirmed the investigator's resignation, but declined to elaborate.

The former investigator, who is now the subject of a federal probe, could not be reached for comment.

Hynes had temporarily taken custody of the federal prisoner to interview him about DeVecchio, the sources said.

DeVecchio is the one-time star FBI supervisor accused of giving sensitive - and deadly - information to Colombo boss Gregory "The Grim Reaper" Scarpa.

Biagini was assigned to keep the mobster under wraps and protect him while he was out of jail, the sources said.

She allegedly loosened her prisoner's strings and allowed him to contact his family and take money from relatives. He used the cash to throw dinner parties, attended by his family and the investigator - all in violation of DA policies, the sources said.

After the prisoner was returned to jail, the investigator allegedly wrote him several letters and visited - which led authorities to uncover their relationship.

In one letter, she suggested a bizarre scheme to get him released to a fertility doctor, who would collect sperm that could be used to impregnate her.

Authorities declined to identify the witness, but insisted he hadn't been a major player in their case and wasn't expected to testify in court even before the relationship was discovered.

Once the FBI's most famous gangland agent, DeVecchio was indicted almost a year ago on four murder charges for allegedly providing inside information to the mob, which then ordered the killings.

Brooklyn prosecutors charged DeVecchio had a "corrupt" relationship with Scarpa, who allegedly had the agent on his payroll in the 1980s.

Scarpa died in 1994 from AIDS.

DeVecchio has maintained his innocence, and his lawyer called word of the investigator's resignation "disturbing."

"If it's true, it's obviously very disturbing," said the lawyer, Mark Bederow.

FBI Probes Edmund Ford's MLGW Bills (WMC)

WMC-TV, February 20, 2007

Action News 5 has learned federal agents have subpoenaed records from Memphis Light, Gas and Water concerning City Councilman Edmund Ford's previous utility payments.

Sources tell Action News 5 the FBI has interviewed a number of City leaders during the past week and a statement from the public utility confirms that officials there have responded to a subpoena for records. Their interest - we've learned - revolves around embattled Councilman Edmund Ford, recently indicted on charges he took bribes in exchange for votes.

Sources confirm that agents have subpoenaed three years worth of utility bills in Ford's name.

FBI Questions MLGW About Edmond Ford (WHBQ)

WHBQ-TV, February 20, 2007

-- Memphis, Tenn. (WHBQ FOX13 MyFoxMemphis.com) -- The FBI and MLGW are working together as part of a federal investigation that involves a Memphis City Council member.

FOX13 has confirmed that FBI agents questioned several MLGW employees about a former customer, who was also the former chairman of the city's utility committee, Edmond Ford.

Last week MLGW hosted some unexpected guests.

"Last Tuesday and Wednesday we were visited by representatives from the Federal Bureau of Investigation," said Odell Horton, Jr., an MLGW attorney.

MLGW said the federal agents, armed with a subpoena, spent several hours over the two days talking to four employees.

"They were asking about a particular person's accounts...They were asking in particular to an ongoing investigation. It is my understanding that at this point and time it is inappropriate to talk about a particular person's account," said Horton, Jr.

Horton said the company had no idea the FBI agents were coming, but said MLGW cooperated completely.

The visit by the FBI comes amid a federal corruption investigation into Memphis City Councilman Edmund Ford, the former chairmen of the council's Utility Committee.

"I think at this point in time it is inappropriate to talk about any customer's account," said Horton. "They were asking about billing. Issues with billing, what type of issues were they looking for in terms of billing in terms of payment plans and those types of things," said Horton.

Despite MLGW's statement, FOX13 has confirmed that federal investigators did question employees about Councilman Ford.

So what happens next?

MLGW said it expects to forward some paperwork to the FBI over the next couple of days.

It's not clear if the agents will be returning to MLGW.

Ford's attorney Michael Schools had no comment for the story. He said neither he nor his client has any idea what the feds are looking for or what it's connected to.

FOX13 was unable to get in contact with with the FBI.

Councilwoman Carol Chumney, the current chair of the utility committee, said she didn't know about the FBI visit, but she plans to make inquiries into what happened and why she wasn't informed.

Councilman Once Oversaw Budget, Hasn't Been Paying (MCA)

By Trevor Aaronson

Memphis Commercial Appeal, February 20, 2007

Indicted City Councilman Edmund Ford hasn't been paying his power bills -- and federal authorities want to know why.

Last week, the city's publicly owned utility company, Memphis Light, Gas and Water Division, received federal grand jury subpoenas requesting all billing information for three of Ford's MLGW accounts as well as internal communications related to those accounts.

Advertisement

MLGW general counsel Odell Horton Jr. confirmed that money is owed on the accounts but would not say how much. He refused to disclose the property addresses to which the utility accounts were assigned.

"MLGW is cooperating with an ongoing investigation," Horton said. "At this point in time, we think it is inappropriate to discuss any particular customer's account regarding this investigation."

Horton said MLGW will comply with the subpoenas by Friday.

The owner of E. H. Ford Mortuary Service, Ford was until recently chairman of the council's General Services & Utilities Committee, which oversees MLGW's budget and spending.

It's unclear whether the subpoenas relate to a new investigation of Ford or an inquiry into possible malfeasance at MLGW.

Ford did not return calls, and MLGW president and chief executive Joseph Lee III declined to comment.

This isn't the first time Ford, who has declared bankruptcy three times, proved to be a problem customer for MLGW.

In January 2003, before Ford was appointed chairman of the committee that provides oversight to MLGW, The Commercial Appeal reported that the councilman's electricity service had been disconnected multiple times for overdue bills ranging from $120.66 to $4,342.18. At the time, Ford advocated flexible billing plans at MLGW.

"Sometimes my business is good, sometimes it's bad," he told the newspaper in 2003. "That's not the issue. It's not about my bill."

Now, it is about Ford's bill. And MLGW already has begun to combat the public-relations problem.

On Feb. 15, two days after MLGW's attorney said the company received the first subpoena, the public utility announced a plan to increase collection efforts on nearly $6 million in delinquent accounts.

Money has been at the root of the council member's recent legal problems. On Dec. 19, 2006, federal prosecutors indicted Councilmen Ford and Rickey Peete on bribery and extortion charges following an FBI sting starring lobbyist Joe Cooper.

FBI Unit Aims To Focus The Inquiry On Child Abductions (SLPD)

By Robert Patrick

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, February 20, 2007

Special Agent Dirk Tarpley was working a routine day on the FBI's violent crime squad last month in Kansas City when he got the call.

"Can you go?" was the question, even before he was told where or why.

Within an hour, Tarpley was rushing across Missouri, astounded to be headed to a place he had been just four months before, after someone kidnapped a girl named Abby Woods.

This time the missing child was a boy named William "Ben" Ownby.

Tarpley is a member of the bureau's 48-member Child Abduction Rapid Deployment Team, a year-old unit designed to rush experienced help to local police dealing with a suspected abduction.

Neither Tarpley nor other investigators interviewed for this report would comment on the case against Michael J. Devlin, who has been charged with kidnapping Ben Ownby and Shawn Hornbeck, or the specifics of the investigation.

But they are eager to talk about what their new setup offers, saying they hope it causes local authorities to call them more quickly and more often.

Both Ben and Abby were taken from Franklin County, where Sheriff Gary Toelke worked closely with the team.

"I couldn't ask for better help than what we got," Toelke said. "If this was a member of my own family, I'd want them investigating."

Before the formation of the team, each FBI office relied on its own expertise, said Roland Corvington, special agent in charge at St. Louis. It could reach out to other offices or to a child abduction unit at Quantico, Va., but most of that help would be by phone.

Now, specialists arrive in person within hours, drawn from across the region. Some agents drove or flew to Franklin County from Oklahoma, Texas, Ohio and Wisconsin.

In the Ownby case, the family notified the sheriff's office, which summoned the FBI. Supervisory Special Agent Tom Blades said an agent was sent from Rolla, Mo., who assessed the situation and called for the rapid deployment unit.

In such a case, calls go out to assemble a team of four to six of the members who are closest and available to leave immediately.

They bring equipment, training and experience investigating kidnapping, violent crime and all kinds of offenses against children. Contrary to common misconceptions, the FBI doesn't have to wait 24 hours or until there is evidence a state line was crossed.

The most hectic time in any investigation is the start, Tarpley said, calling it "controlled chaos." The unit specializes in taming it.

Agents advise local investigators on steps to take and leads to follow. "We're there to help focus the investigation," he said. The FBI teams, said Tarpley, "aren't going to solve any cases per se. The one thing the bureau can bring is an incredible amount of experience and resources..."

Corvington says the team keeps the local strategy on the right track. He noted, "We can't allow ourselves to waste time following one particular path when we should be on another."

Sheriff Toelke called the outside help "just unbelievable."

Local investigators may be good, Tarpley said, but they may have never seen a child abduction before — or not seen as many as the members of the Child Abduction Rapid Deployment team.

He had high praise for local officials on the Franklin Couny cases.

Contrary to the FBI's common portrayal on TV, Tarpley said, agents don't come in and take over. "We're just there to assist," he emphasized.

"It's not about credit. We come in under the radar, and we leave under the radar. And that's the way we like it. Anything that happens is the result of the hard work of the local and federal investigators on the ground," Tarpley said. "We just act to focus it."

Once the focus is achieved, the team may slip away. In fact, members of the team were gone before Ben and Shawn were found in Devlin's apartment, Tarpley explained. "We had done our job."

A Few Degrees Of Separation From Hillary Clinton's Top Adviser (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

Mark J. Penn is a man who wears many hats: high-paid political and corporate pollster, chief executive of an international communications and lobbying company, and chief strategist to New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's bid for the Democratic presidential nomination.

Enough connections for you?

Well, there are more. Penn's firm, Burson-Marsteller Worldwide -- with 2,000 employees and $300 million a year in revenue -- owns BKSH & Associates, the major lobbying firm chaired by Charles R. Black Jr. That's right, Black, counselor to Republican presidents, reports to Clinton's top strategist.

The connections get even more entangled. Burson-Marsteller is a subsidiary of WPP Group, a London-based advertising and PR giant that owns many of the biggest names on K Street. These include Quinn Gillespie & Associates, Wexler & Walker Public Policy Associates, Timmons & Co., Ogilvy Government Relations Worldwide (formerly the Federalist Group), Public Strategies Inc., Dewey Square Group and Hill & Knowlton.

To be more precise, Penn's parent company employs as lobbyists and advisers an ex-chairman of the Republican National Committee (Edward W. Gillespie), a former House GOP leader (Robert S. Walker), a top GOP fundraiser (Wayne L. Berman), and the former media adviser to President Bush (Mark McKinnon).

WPP's Democrats are just as well known. They include an ex-aide to President Jimmy Carter (Anne Wexler), an ex-aide to President Bill Clinton (Jack Quinn), an ex-Cabinet officer for Clinton and Bush (Norman Y. Mineta), and a former top presidential campaign adviser for Al Gore and John Kerry (Michael J. Whouley).

The range of interests represented by these people is a staggering list of corporate America's who's who, with Penn himself a longtime adviser to Microsoft.

"This is a classic example of how big money has inextricably intertwined the campaign advising and lobbying worlds of modern-day Washington with potential conflicts of interest all over the place," said Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, a watchdog group.

WPP insists that things are not quite so intertwined and that its units are strictly segregated. "The various WPP businesses are purposely run independently, and there is no risk of any conflict between clients," said Howard Paster, who is Penn's boss, an ex-aide to President Clinton and a high-level volunteer for Hillary Clinton's campaign.

"I also, personally, don't do any lobbying," added Penn, 53.

But WPP does encourage cross-referrals, especially to avoid conflicts within its firms. "We occasionally will do things with one of the other companies," said Quinn, whose firm worked with Burson-Marsteller's polling firm, Penn, Schoen & Berland Associates, on the reelection of Italy's former prime minister Silvio Berlusconi. The polling firm, of which Penn remains president, is the WPP unit that will be paid millions by the Clinton campaign for Penn's attention.

And Clinton will be happy to pay it. "He's a critical member of our campaign, and we're lucky to have him," Clinton spokesman Phil Singer said.Jefferson's Reprieve?

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit has reversed the conviction of a former District police detective in a case that experts believe might make it tougher for the feds to prosecute Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.).

The court voted 7 to 5 on Feb. 9 to overturn the 2002 conviction of Nelson Valdes on three counts of receiving illegal gratuities. Prosecutors said he passed along information from restricted law enforcement databases to an FBI informant who paid him $450.

But the court ruled that the gratuities law did not apply to Valdes's conduct -- his use of the databases was not "an official act" because it did not spur a police investigation.

The same issue hovers around Jefferson. He's under investigation for allegedly taking cash -- $90,000 of which was famously found in his freezer -- in exchange for using his congressional clout to arrange business deals. Two businessmen have pleaded guilty to giving Jefferson money to promote a company marketing new technology in Africa. But was that promotion an "official act"?

"Prosecutors are not only going to have to prove that a gratuity was given," said ethics expert Kenneth A. Gross, "but that it was for an action that was within the official duties of the government official." That's now harder after Valdes.Earmarks Were Us

Citizens Against Government Waste is Washington's leading opponent of pork-barrel spending. Its annual Pig Book, which lists the government's narrow giveaways, is used by news outlets worldwide to ridicule federal earmarks.

But now that these pet projects are being scaled back -- the Pig Book this year will be more a pamphlet than a book -- CAGW is expanding its other efforts against government wastefulness. It is stepping up campaigns against farm subsidies and federal interference on the Internet. It's also going global, fostering affiliates as far flung as South Korea and Jamaica.

Luckily, its donations remain strong despite the decline of earmarks, said President Thomas A. Schatz, who has worked for the $5 million-a-year group for two decades. "We haven't seen the end of waste -- to say the least," he said.Democratic Hires of the Week

Democrats, who are now in demand thanks to their takeover on Capitol Hill, are shuffling jobs all over town. Bruce Andrews was stolen away from Quinn Gillespie & Associates to run the Washington office of Ford Motor Co. He will be replaced at Quinn Gillespie by Chris McCannell, former chief of staff to Rep. Joseph Crowley (D-N.Y.).

Elsewhere, Stephen Brown left Dutko Worldwide to open the Washington office for Tesoro, an oil refining and marketing firm. R. Scott Silverthorne left the Capital One Financial's lobby shop to become vice president for government affairs of MasterCard Worldwide. And Broderick Johnson, a former chief House lobbyist for President Bill Clinton, is moving to Bryan Cave Strategies from AT&T. Johnson, one of Washington's top African American lobbyists, was pursued for weeks by several firms and was represented by superlawyer Robert Barnett.

Democratic job jumping has been particularly pronounced among high-tech groups. Former congressman Dave McCurdy (D-Okla.) departed the Electronic Industries Alliance after nine years to head the Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers. Harris Miller, former president of the Information Technology Association of America, was named president of the Career College Association. And David Hantman, chief of staff to Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), will join Yahoo's lobbying office.It's All in a Name

RightClick Strategies, a consulting firm that has long helped Republican lawmakers design their Web sites, changed its name after last year's elections to Adfero Group, erasing any implication that it's only right-leaning. The firm said the switch was planned before the Democratic sweep.

Parry, Romani DeConcini & Symms, on the other hand, is extremely straightforward. Its Web site is LobbyCongress.com.

Gunman Ignites Frederick Inferno (WP)

By Philip Rucker And William Wan

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

A gunman entered a liquor store in Frederick yesterday, shot at police, locked himself in the store during a 30-minute standoff and ignited a fire that engulfed and gutted a two-story shopping plaza along one of the Western Maryland city's major commercial corridors, police said.

James Douglas, 29, of Frederick walked into Jim's Liquors at Antietam Village Center about 12:30 p.m., showed the owner a handgun and told him, "Get out," Frederick Police Lt. Thomas Chase said. Police said the store's owner, whose name they would not release, called Douglas a frequent customer and knew him by a nickname, "Menace."

Nobody else was in the store, Chase said, and the owner left to call police. When two officers pulled up, Douglas fired at least one shot at them through the store's glass door. Police then surrounded the shopping plaza and ordered nearby businesses to lock their doors and windows.

Alone in the store, Douglas called friends and relatives on his cellphone. Police crisis management officers reached him on the line, Chase said.

"While we were negotiating with him, he set the store on fire," Chase said.

Authorities had not located Douglas last night, and police said it is likely that he died in the fire. Nobody else was injured, Chase said. He added that a search of the liquor store will begin this morning.

Douglas apparently lit boxes of liquor to ignite the blaze, which spread quickly and destroyed all 14 stores in the center, Chase said. "It's completely gutted," he said.

The 1970s-era shopping center, in the 1500 block of Opossumtown Pike, is at the heart of Frederick's commercial corridor. Roads around the center were closed for nearly four hours, snarling holiday traffic.

Businesses destroyed in the blaze included a branch of Frederick County Bank, a Dunkin' Donuts, a Quiznos sandwich shop, a medical supply store, a hair salon and a dry cleaner. A restaurant on the bottom floor, Latino Grill, was going to open next week, but it was destroyed.

Police have not determined why Douglas targeted the liquor store but said there are no confirmed past grudges with the owner. Authorities characterized the incident as an attempted armed robbery.

"Anytime a guy walks into a liquor store with a gun, it would draw us to conclude that he's robbing the place," Chase said.

Douglas lived one block from the store in the three-story Country Hill Apartments, according to several neighbors who said they were his friends. They said when they heard sirens, they went out to watch.

Leslie Horner, 33, said she listened as a friend and Douglas talked to each other on their cellphones. The friend asked Douglas, " 'Do you have anyone in there with you? Do you have any hostages?' " said Horner, who said she has known Douglas for 10 years. She said she will never forget his answer: " 'No, it's just me and God in here now.' "

Another friend, Shantel Harris, said Douglas "said he wanted to come out, but he was so scared they'd shoot him."

While firefighters hosed down the ambers, a woman who identified herself as Douglas's sister ran through the police tape screaming and cursing at authorities.

"I lost a life!" she yelled, pointing at the charred shopping center. She would not give her name to reporters.

The fire let off billowing clouds of black smoke and a pungent odor from burning brick and metal across Frederick, witnesses said.

Bottles of alcohol accelerated the fire, Chase said.

"You could hear muffled popping sounds as the liquor bottles were burst from the flames," he said.

Bystanders said they could feel heat from the fire a block away.

Flames tore through the shopping center surprisingly fast, said George William, manager of a Roy Rogers restaurant across the street.

"I was in shock," he said. "It was dark. We have a fog all over the place. The roadway was just covered in smoke."

Eyewitness Jim Conway said: "The cannons of water were just pouring into the building. When I came here, the middle of the roof was still up, and now just look at it."

The flames melted the center's brown metal roof, which was left hanging in slivers.

It took nearly one hour for firefighters to control the blaze in the smoldering shopping center. As late as 5 p.m., small fires were still burning in one of the shops.

Staff members at La Petite Academy, a child-care center across the street from the plaza, who were supervising more than a dozen children, locked the center's doors for 3 1/2 hours after learning that a gunman was in the area. "As soon as we heard about the incidents going on, we immediately went on lockdown," employee Nicole Ohanian said. "It was just for the children's safety."

Employees in an accounting firm, also across the street and also under lockdown, said they watched the blaze from their office windows.

A man who would identify himself only as Kim said he has owned Antietam Village Dry Cleaners in the center for 12 years. He was evacuated and left his papers, car keys and coat in the store.

"Someone started shouting, 'Get out! Get out!' " Kim said, standing coatless in the frigid winter air.

Danielle Poe, on her way to her job as a medical assistant at Plastic Surgery One, pulled into the parking lot and found police officers with guns aimed at the liquor store. She was not allowed to get out of her car.

"There were cops with assault weapons," said Poe, 26.

One officer "told everyone to get back because they were in the line of fire," she said. "I saw some people run. . . . Two seconds later, there were flames inside the store. Within minutes, the whole top floor of the building was in flames."

Nancy Piper, 58, who has lived a block away for 30 years, was a longtime customer of Jim's Liquors.

"It had a great bunch of people working there," Piper said. "They would even carry your purchases out to the car for you. Everyone was on a first-name basis with them."

After A Rampage, Trying To Grasp What Led A Son To Kill (NYT)

By Martin Stolz

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

SALT LAKE CITY, Feb. 19 — At 1 a.m. last Tuesday, the parents of Sulejman Talovic called the police to report him missing. After watching television news coverage, they feared he might be among those dead or wounded in a shooting rampage at a mall here. One hour later, with the arrival of detectives, they discovered the shocking truth, that their son, 18, was the gunman.

In six minutes on the night of Feb. 12, Mr. Talovic shot nine customers at the Trolley Square mall, killing five and seriously injuring four others. The attack ended when the police shot and killed Mr. Talovic after he refused to surrender his 12-gauge shotgun.

Mr. Talovic's motive remains a mystery, investigators say.

In the week of grief and confusion since the shooting, the Talovic family has been struggling to unearth some explanations. Their reflections, inadequate as they may seem, revolve around a handful of formative experiences: war in his native Bosnia, rejection at school and difficulty in assimilating in the United States, they said Sunday in the living room of his aunt's tidy apartment.

If the public has come to see Mr. Talovic as a deranged killer, the family knew him as a shy and generous boy.

The gunman's aunt, Ajka Omerovic, and his father, who was visibly exhausted, spoke to a reporter just hours after Mr. Talovic's body was cleansed in an Islamic ritual in preparation for its burial in Tuzla, Bosnia, expected later this month, and after days of funerals for shooting victims across the Salt Lake Valley.

At the funerals, two of the victims' families called on the public to forgive the teenager and to support his family in their sorrow.

The Talovics are saddened and bewildered, said the father, Suljo Talovic, 42. The last time he saw his son alive was at home after work, he said. Sulejman had returned from his job at a uniform laundry company, showered and left without comment. At 2 a.m., detectives came to the door and informed the family of his crime and death. Within hours, Sabira Talovic, Sulejman's 37-year-old mother, collapsed and was hospitalized with what her husband said was a heart attack.

"It's very painful," Suljo Talovic explained, his syntax slightly imperfect but his message clear. "I have pain for my son. I have pain for everybody who has died. I am sorry for everybody."

The Talovics had no information on how Sulejman had obtained his weapons and ammunition. The police could not be reached to comment on a report in The Salt Lake Tribune that the shotgun had been bought legally at a sporting goods store.

In Bosnia, the Talovics lived on a small subsistence farm in the village of Talovici. Suljo Talovic, also a carpenter, often worked on construction projects in Switzerland and in Belgrade, the Yugoslav capital. Until Serbian forces began a siege of Talovici in April 1992, they said, theirs had been a humble but happy life, surrounded by more than 100 relatives.

When the Serbian militias arrived, Suljo hid in the hills. In the village, his family went without food for days at a stretch. Life was defined by explosions and gunfire. The family said Sulejman, then 4, had seen his baby sister die at home because of a lack of medicine. Some family members believed he had seen his grandfather's execution, though there was disagreement over that.

After a year, Sabira escaped with Sulejman on foot and on a relief supply truck to Srebrenica. Some weeks later, her husband was reunited with the family in Tuzla, where they remained for several years.

In 1998, Sulejman and his family moved to Utah, where his aunt, Ms. Omerovic, the sister of Suljo, had established roots. In the Sunday interview, Ms. Omerovic expressed gratitude to Americans, who she said had helped the refugees to "forget about the war," a sentiment expressed repeatedly in recent days by Bosnian-Americans in Utah.

Sulejman, a bashful child, struggled with English and with relationships. Ms. Omerovic, who sometimes supervised him as a dishwasher at the Utah Jazz arena, said she had seen her nephew joking with co-workers. "He was willing to be friendly," she said. "He just didn't find his way on how to do it."

In 2004, two classmates threatened Sulejman with a knife, his father said. His mother, frightened, then signed a form releasing him from attending school, the family said.

Sulejman began accompanying his father to construction jobs, and he readily handed over his earnings to help his parents and three younger sisters.

Police investigators are now trying to assemble a psychological profile of Sulejman.

His father, who says he abhors violence, said that perhaps his son had been affected by an accumulation of bad experiences, "a little bit, little bit, little bit, and after too much, he's like an explosion."

The Talovics said they wished they could question Sulejman and understand the shooting. Ms. Omerovic said the Bosnian civil war alone as an explanation made no sense to her because all Bosnians had been "touched by war" but had not committed crimes.

"We are praying to God," the aunt said, "and asking God to forgive Sulejman for what he did and to forgive his soul."

Florida Executioner Says Procedures Were Followed (NYT)

By Lynn Waddell And Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

TAMPA, Fla., Feb. 19 — A member of Florida's execution team told a panel studying lethal injection protocols on Monday that intravenous lines had been placed properly in the arms of a condemned inmate who took 34 minutes, twice as long as normal, to die.

The man, who testified by phone and whose voice was electronically altered to shield his identity, said he had medical qualifications but would not elaborate. He added that in any event he did not consider the execution a medical procedure.

"Absolutely nothing is remotely connected with medicine," the man told the panel, which former Gov. Jeb Bush appointed in December to study whether Florida's lethal injection system could be improved. "From that point on, the condemned inmate will not leave the chamber alive. It is done as quickly as possible. It is done as humanely as can be done under the circumstances."

The man, who identified himself only as "medically qualified," was the second member of Florida's execution team to address the panel this month.

On Feb. 9, the lead executioner in the case of Angel Diaz, who took 34 minutes to die, told the panel, "I have no medical training or qualifications."

Some witnesses to the execution have said that Mr. Diaz, who was put to death on Dec. 13, gasped and appeared to grimace in pain as the procedure stalled. But state corrections officials have told the panel that he did not voice discomfort or appear to be in pain.

A preliminary medical examiner's report suggested that intravenous needles placed in Mr. Diaz's right and left arms plunged through his veins into tissue, preventing the drugs from quickly entering his bloodstream. An autopsy found a 12-inch chemical burn on Mr. Diaz's right arm and an 11-inch burn on his left.

Mr. Bush halted executions in Florida on Dec. 16, when the preliminary autopsy results came out, and appointed the panel to study lethal injection protocols. The panel is to submit recommendations to Gov. Charlie Crist by March 1.

Monday was the fifth time that the lethal injection commission met. It has heard testimony from doctors and prison officials as well as from members of the execution team. State Senator Victor Crist, a member of the panel who helped write Florida's lethal injection law, said Monday that based on the testimony so far, he did not think anything had gone wrong with Mr. Diaz's execution other than the unusual amount of time it took.

Like most states with lethal injection, Florida uses three drugs: one to put the inmate to sleep, one to paralyze his body and a third to stop the heart.

Senator Crist, who is not related to the governor, said he planned to recommend several changes to ensure that future executions did not raise questions about whether the execution was done properly and whether the inmate suffered. He said camera surveillance should be added so that the execution team, stationed outside the execution chamber, could view the inmate from angles other than through the existing window.

He also said that the inmate's IV line should be checked after the administration of each drug to make sure it was properly inserted, and that the inmate should be "thumped or shaken" to make sure he was unconscious after receiving anesthesia.

"Doggone it, go out there and thump on them, shake the body to make sure they are out," Senator Crist said. "If the first drug is administered properly, then regardless of what else is pumped into his system he will never know it."

Armed And Dangerous (WP)

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

CPL. KEITH Washington, the Prince George's County police officer who shot two unarmed furniture deliverymen in a dispute at his home three weeks ago, one of them fatally, is on administrative leave pending the outcome of an investigation into the incident. That status notwithstanding, he remains certified as a police officer, meaning he is still authorized to carry a weapon issued by the department. Given what is known about his past, and his repeated problems with anger management, you'd think Prince Georgians might justifiably be nervous about that.

But not Jack Johnson, the Prince George's county executive. Mr. Johnson is an old associate and booster of Cpl. Washington's, having hired him first as his driver and then, two years ago, as his deputy director of homeland security, despite public warnings about Cpl. Washington's checkered past, volcanic temper and tendency to turn routine encounters into tempestuous ones. Now that Cpl. Washington has killed one man and badly injured another, Mr. Johnson says the officer will not be returning to his position in the county department of homeland security. Well, that's comforting. Less comforting, however, is Mr. Johnson's prescription -- that Cpl. Washington resume work as a police officer.

In fact, it's hard to think of a worse place for Cpl. Washington than the police department. In incident after incident over the years, on duty and off, including ones involving his daughter, his homeowners association and a fender bender that he was investigating, Cpl. Washington is alleged to have exhibited rough, menacing or violent behavior, often in response to seemingly ordinary circumstances. Three years ago he was suspended from the police force for an off-duty scuffle. Now, using his service weapon, a 9mm Beretta, he has shot two unarmed Marlo employees who were delivering a bed set to his home; both were apparently hit multiple times.

We hope an ongoing investigation will reveal how a dispute over the delivery of a bed set escalated to the point where Cpl. Washington not only brandished a weapon but felt it necessary to pull the trigger again and again. The facts surrounding those shootings are still uncertain: One man is dead; another hasn't yet talked to police, prosecutors or a grand jury; and Cpl. Washington's own account hasn't been heard in public. So we won't prejudge the outcome of the investigation. But it seems fair to wonder whether Mr. Johnson's cavalier prescription -- to send Cpl. Washington back to active duty as a police officer -- is not premature, at the very least.

CIVIL LAW:

Hillary's Brother Due Back In Court (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, February 20, 2007

A federal judge has reopened a bankruptcy case in which a trustee is demanding that one of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's brothers repay more than $100,000 in purported loans from a carnival outfit whose owner was pardoned by President Clinton.

Anthony D. Rodham received $107,000 in payments from Tennessee-based United Shows of America Inc. before the company went bankrupt in 2002, according to court records.

United Shows' owners -- Edgar Gregory Jr. and his wife, Vonna Jo Gregory -- were pardoned by Mr. Clinton in March 2000, despite an objection by the Justice Department. The couple was convicted of bank fraud in 1982 for illegally giving loans to friends. Mr. Gregory died in 2004.

After court-appointed trustee Michael Collins took over the company's finances, he obtained a default judgment against Mr. Rodham, saying he "received the benefit of the loans without making any repayment."

Mr. Collins' collection effort spawned court actions last year against Mr. Rodham in D.C. Superior Court and the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Alexandria.

In September, an attorney for Mr. Rodham, of Vienna, Va., persuaded a federal judge to set aside the default judgment, saying he did not get proper notice of some of the proceedings.

After setting aside the default judgment, the case was essentially closed because of what Mr. Collins called a procedural glitch.

U.S. Bankruptcy Judge Marian F. Harrison on Jan. 30 granted a request by Mr. Collins to reopen the case.

DOJ_NMG_0133813

A status hearing was scheduled for today in Nashville, Tenn., but likely will be continued until next week, Mr. Collins said.

"We want to get the case on a scheduling track, so we can proceed to trial," he said.

Mr. Rodham has declined to speak about the case, and his attorney did not return a phone call yesterday.

Mrs. Clinton, New York Democrat, announced last month that she was forming a presidential exploratory committee. Yesterday, a spokesman for her presidential exploratory committee had no comment.

When Mr. Clinton pardoned the Gregorys, Mr. Rodham reportedly said he worked for United Shows as a consultant. He denied taking money to lobby for the couple's pardon.

Mr. Rodham has not filed an answer to Mr. Collins' complaint. But in legal pleadings, his attorney, Samuel Crocker, said Mr. Rodham says the money that he received from United Shows was compensation, not loans.

"Defendant was owed compensation for the services he rendered," Mr. Crocker stated in the filings.

However, Mr. Collins, in bankruptcy filings last year, said each of the 16 checks from United Shows to Mr. Rodham had a note at the bottom indicating that the payments were loans.

In addition, Mr. Crocker said Mr. Rodham received a summons but never found out that there had been a motion for a default judgment because the notice was sent to the wrong address. Mr. Rodham previously lived in the District.

Once Mr. Collins obtained a default judgment last year, he hired attorneys to file collection judgments to pursue Mr. Rodham's assets in the District and Virginia.

Mr. Collins said he is not ruling out a settlement in the case. He said an out-of-court agreement seemed to be a possibility.

Although the default judgment was set aside, Mr. Rodham has been ordered by Judge Harrison to pay more than $19,000 to cover Mr. Collins' legal expenses in connection with the collection efforts.

Mr. Collins said Mr. Rodham has complied with that court order.

Don't Fall For Hot Pink Camels (NYT)

The New York Times, February 19, 2007

Wall Street analysts may be applauding R. J. Reynolds for introducing a feminized version of its macho Camel cigarette brand, and company executives clearly think they have hit on an innovative marketing strategy. But this new attempt to woo women smokers can only be viewed as another cynical blow to public health.

The Reynolds executives apparently don't care that lung cancer among women is the only major form of cancer whose death toll is rising. Lung cancer kills far more American women than does the much more feared breast cancer. And smoking is overwhelmingly the leading cause of lung cancer, not to mention its contribution to heart disease, emphysema and all sorts of other health problems.

So now comes R. J. Reynolds with its new female-friendly Camel No. 9 and a campaign to promote it costing an estimated $25 million to $50 million. The name is supposed to evoke "cloud nine" or being "dressed to the nines," according to Reynolds marketers, although some think it may also suggest luxury perfumes like Chanel No. 19 and romantic songs like "Love Potion No. 9." As described by Stuart Elliott in last Thursday's Times, the company is reaching out to women with slogans like "light and luscious," hot pink and teal packages and ads adorned with flowers.

This would all seem laughable if it were not so pernicious. No doubt Reynolds will fall back on a tobacco company mantra: it's not trying to woo new smokers to a dangerous product; it's just trying to convert existing ones to its brand. But we all know that the tobacco business will wither away unless it finds new smokers to replace those who quit or die.

Bipartisan bills were introduced in both houses of Congress last week to give the Food and Drug Administration needed authority to regulate tobacco products and restrict marketing to young people, consistent with free-speech principles. That may not do much to wean their elders from the habit. But it could stop young women from being entrapped by cynical marketers.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

A Hearing Without Being Heard (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

JACKSONVILLE, Ala. -- Lilly M. Ledbetter says she almost stopped breathing when she heard her name called that day, her eight-year battle over alleged pay discrimination finally reaching the ultimate legal forum, the U.S. Supreme Court.

"We'll hear argument next in Ledbetter versus Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company," Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. announced.

DOJ_NMG_0133814

The odds are akin to being struck by lightning, having your case plucked from the thousands of others who have vowed, like you, to take the fight all the way to the Supreme Court. And then you find it's not so much about you anymore.

It was the only time that November morning that any of the nine justices spoke Lilly Ledbetter's name.

When she thought back last week on the arguments before the court, she remembered them as not being much about her complaints about Goodyear, or Goodyear's complaints about her. "Except when my lawyer got up, it [seemed to be] based on changing the law somewhere down the line," she said. "That's what it boils down to, I guess. It tends to leave the person out."

At a forum late last year, Justices Antonin Scalia and Stephen G. Breyer, usually the court's yin and yang on matters of constitutional interpretation, agreed that that is how it should be. They were asked whether their duty was to provide justice for those who came before the court or simply to interpret the law.

"The point of the law is to satisfy a human desire for justice," Breyer explained, but he added: "You don't necessarily get to that end by simply trying to look for what is the intuitively nicer result in each case."

Scalia was blunter. "By the time you get up to an appellate court -- and lawyers ought to learn this -- I don't much care about your particular case," he said. "I am not about to produce a better result in your case at the expense of creating terrible results in a hundred other cases."

A specific Supreme Court decision may contain obvious benefits for the winner -- see George W. Bush, circa 2000. But it can often be an inconclusive way station for the plaintiff, sometimes leading only to additional years of litigation.

Jose Antonio Lopez, for instance, has already won his case at the Supreme Court this term. The justices ruled 8 to 1 that the Bush administration cannot automatically deport legal immigrants convicted of minor drug crimes.

But the decision came a little late for Lopez, who had returned to Mexico rather than remain in jail to see if the Supreme Court would take his case. His lawyer is trying to get him a new hearing in this country. But the more lasting impact of Lopez v. Gonzales is that thousands of immigrants may now contest the government's deportation plans.

Supreme Court cases outlive the individuals who give them a name, and give rise to legal precedents beyond the specific cases. That explains why Ledbetter finds herself supported by a large contingent of women's groups and civil rights organizations that she had never given much thought to -- "The ACLU is supporting me; I don't know how we picked them up" -- and opposed by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the Bush administration.

She knows it's not personal.The Law's Fine Print

What justices find interesting in Ledbetter's case, according to the language of the Supreme Court, is this:

Whether and under what circumstances a plaintiff may bring an action under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 alleging illegal pay discrimination when the disparate pay is received during the statutory limitations period, but is the result of intentionally discriminatory pay decisions that occurred outside the limitations period.

What Ledbetter and Goodyear have been fighting over since 1998 when, at the company's urging, she took the early-retirement offer is this:

Whether she was paid less than the men she worked with because of discrimination or because she wasn't a very good worker.

There's no dispute that after nearly 20 years at the Goodyear plant in Gadsden, Ala., most of them in a salaried managerial position, Ledbetter, 68, was paid less than any of the men she worked with, even those with less seniority.

Ledbetter had always thought that was the case -- some of her bosses had even told her so. But it was spelled out clearly in an anonymous letter she received after she stopped working for Goodyear that contained the rankings and salaries of everyone she worked with.

Her lawyers showed it to the jury on a huge board.

But Goodyear contended that the salaries must be looked at with the rankings. The company said Ledbetter's lower pay was the result of a merit pay plan meant to even the field, and reward supervisors for good work rather than longevity. Ledbetter was typically at the bottom of the rankings, the company argued, and even then she received raises, albeit smaller than those of the men ranked above her.

The jury sided with Ledbetter, saying it was "more likely than not" that she had been paid "an unequal salary because of her sex." Jurors awarded her $3,514,417.

Which was reduced to $360,000 by the judge, who said that was the maximum the law allowed.

Which was reduced to $0 by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit, which said Goodyear may have discriminated against Ledbetter at some point, but not in the 180 days before she filed her complaint, as the Title VII law prescribes.

Which is what has the justices interested.

Ledbetter's lawyers, backed by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, said that the 11th Circuit's decision is contrary to law the Supreme Court itself has established, and that many other lower courts have followed. They argue, in effect, that pay decisions tainted by discrimination become new violations of Title VII each time that employee receives a paycheck. So the discriminatory action fell within the time guidelines in the law, they say.

But Goodyear's lawyers said that the 11th Circuit had gotten the standard right, and that the law is intended to stop ongoing discrimination. Ledbetter could not show that the company had discriminated against her the last time it decided to approve or withhold a pay raise. The solicitor general -- the lawyer who represents the official position of the government before the court -- agreed, and in a notable break, said the EEOC was misreading the Supreme Court's earlier decisions.Awaiting a Decision

Ledbetter flew up from Alabama for the oral arguments, scheduled for the Monday after Thanksgiving. From her spot in the second row, she watched for signs. She knew that it takes at least four justices to agree to hear a case, and although those sessions are secret, she assumed they were for her. But she didn't know who they were, nor whose vote could be the fifth one she needed.

She didn't think it would be Roberts. Genial in public appearances, he's a sharp-edged questioner, and she recalled his comments being all about whether a finding for Ledbetter would undo the statute of limitations and open employers to decades-old discrimination complaints, she said.

Ledbetter was intrigued by Justice Clarence Thomas, who she'd been told might not automatically be on her side. As is his custom, Thomas did not ask a question during the hour-long argument, but Ledbetter thought he seemed unusually interested.

"He kept sending out for law books -- he had that poor guy running -- and by the end he had a stack of books up to there," she said.

And Ledbetter had a good feeling about the only woman behind that long mahogany bench; Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg's questions sounded most supportive, she said. Out on the court plaza later that day, after the reporters had gone, a Georgetown professor introduced herself to Ledbetter and told her that Ginsburg had been discriminated against early in her legal career.

But sympathies are one thing, as Breyer and Scalia indicated in that December forum, and the law is another.

"If you're incapable of producing a policy result that you don't like simply because the statute requires it," Scalia told his audience, then look for another line of work. "Run for Congress or something."

Waiting in Jacksonville for a decision that could come anytime before the court finishes its term at the end of June, Ledbetter said she thinks it could go either way.

"I think it's moved on to the law," she said. "Strictly the law."

Study: Stricter Voting ID Rules Hurt '04 Turnout (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

WASHINGTON — Voter identification requirements designed to combat fraud can reduce turnout, particularly among minorities, a new study shows.

A study by the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University shows turnout in 2004 was about 4% lower in states that required voters to sign their name or produce documentation. Hispanic turnout was 10% lower; the difference was about 6% for blacks and Asian-Americans.

The study, presented to the U.S. Election Assistance Commission this month, comes as voter identification requirements are being subjected to increased scrutiny. Two researchers last year told the Election Assistance Commission that they found little evidence of voter fraud at polling places.

Thomas O'Neill, who led the Eagleton research team, said the new study shows that "the harm may be as great as the benefit."

The commission's chairwoman, Donetta Davidson, called the study "premature." More work needs to be done, she said. "You can't make determinations based on one year," she said. "We have new states that have ID requirements now that weren't in that review."

In 2005, Indiana enacted the nation's stiffest photo ID law. Yet turnout increased 2% in November compared with 2002, the previous non-presidential federal election year.

In local races before the November elections, "we could not find one instance where a legitimate voter could not vote," said Indiana Secretary of State Todd Rokita, a Republican.

Under federal law, first-time voters must verify their identity. Nearly half the states go further, requiring some identification from all voters — ranging from a signature to a government-issued photo ID, which is required only in Indiana.

Photo ID laws in Georgia and Missouri have been blocked in court. A photo ID law in Florida allows voters to choose from many forms of identification.

Liberal groups such as Common Cause have fought the measures on claims that they disenfranchise the poor, minorities and seniors.

Several states are considering photo ID laws this year, including California, Colorado, Kansas, Mississippi, Oklahoma, Texas and Washington. Most of the efforts face substantial opposition. "We've been beating that horse for two or three years now," said Tim Storey, an elections expert at the National Conference of State Legislatures. "The states that were going to do it have mostly done it."

The Eagleton Institute research relied on data from 2004, before some of the toughest ID laws were passed. It shows that as requirements stiffen — from stating a name to signing it to presenting documentation — turnout drops slightly. The researchers considered other factors, including contested elections, registration requirements, race, ethnicity, age, education and income. They used a 2004 Census Bureau survey to determine racial and ethnic breakdowns.

"It validates some of the things that have been said all along about the problems of voter ID," said Kimball Brace of Election Data Services. Taken together with the earlier research by Tova Wang and Job Serebrov that found little evidence of voter fraud at polling places, it shows voter ID laws can have more of a negative than a positive impact, Brace said.

Advocates of tougher ID requirements cite Indiana. The state did extensive voter education before the election and allowed voters without ID to cast provisional ballots, which are less likely to be counted.

"It wasn't the horrible thing that some feared," said Thor Hearne of the conservative American Center for Voting Rights. Hearne predicted continued support for state ID laws if they are carefully drafted and implemented to avoid a drop in turnout.

Campaign Strengthens For A Voting Paper Trail (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb, Special To The Washington Post

The Washington Post, February 19, 2007

Efforts are intensifying in Congress to pass legislation that would require electronic touch-screen voting machines used in federal elections to provide paper trails that could be checked in the case of a recount.

The new momentum is the result of lingering concerns about the machines as the 2008 presidential primaries fast approach, as well as strong support for changes by the new Democratic majority, with Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), chair of the Rules Committee, taking a leading role.

"We are closer to paper-trail legislation than we have been before," said Doug Chapin, director of Electionline.org, an elections clearinghouse.

"Democrats are committed to election-reform legislation that requires all voting machines produce a paper trail," said Brendan Daly, a spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

The work at the national level echoes moves in many states. Often under pressure from voting-rights groups, 27 states have decided to require paper trails.

Last month, Gov. Charlie Crist of Florida went a step further, asking the legislature to pay for replacing touch-screen machines by next year with optical-scan devices, which read paper ballots. Virginia and Maryland are considering similar moves.

Florida has special significance because it was home to the recount dispute in the 2000 presidential election that began the national focus on how Americans vote. In response to that election, Congress passed a law in 2002 that provided billions of dollars to the states to replace outdated voting machines.

The new, high-tech machines were in many cases easier to use and more accessible for disabled people. But a coalition of computer scientists and voting-rights groups argued that the touch-screen devices without printers were vulnerable to tampering and that results could not be verified if they broke down.

In Congress, Rep. Rush D. Holt (D-N.J.) has introduced legislation to require paper trails and audits that test the paper results against the electronic tally, among other things. The bill has nearly 200 co-sponsors, and Holt wants it to take effect before the first primaries in January. Feinstein plans to introduce a similar bill soon.

"In basic terms, it would reestablish the principles of reliability and auditability," Holt said. "Citizens are disturbed that they feel they can't rely on the results of the election."

Weighing heavily on the minds of Democrats is last year's congressional race in Sarasota, Fla. Congress has seated Republican Vern Buchanan, but Democrat Christine Jennings says the Electronics Systems & Software touch-screen machines failed to count 18,000 votes that were cast for other offices but did not indicate a vote for Congress.

Without a paper record, there is no way for the machine to do a recount; Jennings has asked in court for access to the machines' source code -- the inner workings of the software that runs the machines -- to see whether there was a glitch. So far, she has not received access and has filed a protest with the House Administration Committee.

"Imagine what would happen if a similar undercount occurred in a swing-state election in the presidential contest and there was no independent means of verification," Feinstein said during a hearing on election administration this month. She asked government auditors to probe the Sarasota case.

Not everyone agrees paper trails are a panacea. Daniel Tokaji, assistant law professor at Ohio State University and associate director of its election-law program, said Holt's bill's focus on paper trails reflects a desire for a simple fix.

"It could well create more problems in terms of both creating post-election litigation and creating administrative problems in counting these paper strips," Tokaji said. "We know they can be compromised, torn, crumpled," and have printing problems, he said.

While Congress considers voting machine legislation, the Election Assistance Commission, the federal agency that helps states run elections, is taking a more direct role in testing the machines before they are used.

In the past, an association of state election directors had certified testing labs on a volunteer basis. That approach generated concerns that labs would use varying standards and would not be subject to sufficient oversight.

These concerns were heightened last month when it was revealed that a Colorado company had been temporarily banned from testing equipment, after authorities said it was failing to exercise proper quality control.

Now the Election Assistance Commission will certify labs in consultation with the National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST).

"It's the first time the federal government has ever been involved in testing voting equipment and, with NIST recommending their accreditation, that puts a more stringent position on the labs to meet all of the qualifications," said the chairman of the Election Assistance Commission, Donetta Davidson. "That definitely puts more credibility in the process."

New Jersey Begins Offering Civil Unions To Gay Couples (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

Hundreds of gay couples received the same legal protections as married couples early Monday when a law took effect to make New Jersey the third U.S. state to offer civil unions.

The civil unions -- which offer the legal benefits but not the title of marriage -- were granted automatically to the hundreds of gay New Jersey couples who have been joined in civil unions or married in other states or nations.

At least one couple held a ceremony at the first possible moment. Steven Goldstein and Daniel Gross reaffirmed their Vermont civil union shortly after midnight. They would have had the rights in New Jersey even without holding a midnight ceremony here.

State Sen. Loretta Weinberg, a prime sponsor of the civil unions law who hosted ceremonies for couples including Messrs. Goldstein and Gross in her office, called the day "a big giant step forward." A handful of town halls across the state also opened at 12:01 a.m. to accept civil union license applications from couples who had not been so joined previously. They must wait 72 hours before they can hold civil union ceremonies, and several plan to exchange vows early Thursday.

Among those couples were Marty Finkle and Michael Plake of South Orange. A few dozen friends, Mr. Finkle's 17-year-old daughter and several local officials showed up to cheer the couple as they filled out paperwork in their town hall. The couple also was one of the first in the state to register in a domestic partnership in 2004. Domestic partnerships offered a handful of the benefits and obligations of civil unions.

New Jersey lawmakers hastily created civil unions last December, less than two months after a state Supreme Court decision held that gay couples had a right to the same benefits as married couples.

Gay rights activists in the state say they will continue to press for full marriage rights through both political channels and lawsuits. Some social conservative groups, meanwhile, are pledging to block same-sex marriage by pressing for an amendment to the state constitution that prohibits such unions. Forty-five states have legal or constitutional bans on same-sex marriages. Only Massachusetts allows gay couples to marry, while California offers domestic partnerships.

Mr. Goldstein, the chairman of the gay rights group Garden State Equality, and Mr. Gross, a vice president at Goldman Sachs, held their ceremony behind a desk in a cramped office instead of a more idyllic or religious spot. There were several kisses, a prayer reading, friends and journalists, but no music, no dancing and none of the breaking-of-the-glass that is traditional in Jewish weddings. The couple did that in a Jewish wedding service in Canada in 2002 -- the first same-sex union featured in the wedding pages of the New York Times -- and promised even grander festivities if they can gain the right to marry in New Jersey.

As part of their ceremony, their rabbi, Elliott Tepperman, asked the people gathered: "Do you vow to continue your support for true marriage equality?" "This was really all about receiving a piece of paper that had some recognition of our status," Mr. Gross said. Teaneck registrar Laura Turnbull finished processing their civil union license -- No. 1 -- at 12:09 a.m.

Meanwhile, in Asbury Park -- a community revived largely by a growing gay population and one where two men were married, though it was not recognized in 2004 -- five gay couples completed civil union licenses in the first hour of the day.

Eagerness And Some Resignation As Civil Union Law Takes Effect (NYT)

By Ellen Barry

ASBURY PARK, N.J., Feb. 19 — Mark Rado and Degn Schubert could be forgiven for sounding a little jaded on Monday, as they waited with four other couples in the lobby of the Asbury Park Municipal and Police Complex.

This would be, by their own count, the seventh time that they had tried to make their union official. They twice registered as domestic partners in California, organized an elaborate commitment ceremony, and then married, ecstatically, under the watch of Mayor Gavin Newsom of San Francisco. Then the state annulled that marriage, along with other same-sex marriages, and Mr. Rado and Mr. Schubert once again registered as domestic partners.

Now they were doing it again: Waiting, with a bouquet of alstroemeria and purple tulips, for Asbury Park's deputy city clerk, D. Kiki Tomek, to take their application for a civil union in New Jersey.

"It becomes sort of a chore," said Mr. Schubert, who is 40 and lives in Asbury Park. They discussed which of their proliferating anniversaries they would celebrate. June 28? Feb. 13? Or the date three days from Monday, when their civil union can be performed, Feb. 22?

"I wish they would just call it marriage," Mr. Schubert said, "and be done with it."

About a dozen couples visited clerks' offices in New Jersey on Monday, the first day on which people were allowed to submit applications for civil unions, which guarantee all the rights and benefits of heterosexual marriage. New Jersey is the third state to offer civil unions, following Vermont, which introduced them to rapt national attention in 2000, and Connecticut, which quietly followed suit in 2005.

Massachusetts is the only state in which same-sex couples can marry. California has a domestic partnership law that guarantees many of the rights of marriage.

A handful of couples in New Jersey were so eager to take advantage of the new law that they waited outside clerks' offices until 12:01 on Monday, when the first civil unions could be processed. Among that group, some said the experience was bittersweet; activists had held out hope that New Jersey would follow Massachusetts as the second state to grant same-sex couples the right to marry.

But Beth Asaro, 47, who submitted an application for a civil union with her partner, Joanne Schailey, in Lambertville, could not contain her happiness. She said her outright joy at forming a civil union could be a function of her age and the hostility she faced when she was younger.

"Being gay, you're used to kind of hiding it and not making it front and center of your personality," Ms. Asaro said, "but last night, man, we were out there — that we had gotten these rights from our state. It was pretty exciting, very validating and very liberating."

Civil unions, she said, are "enough for right now."

"I know it sounds so trite," she said, "but it's true."

There was a jovial atmosphere on Monday outside Asbury Park's vital statistics office, where couples filled out their applications beside stacks of recycling bulletins and annual water quality reports. The star of the show was Ms. Tomek, who is beloved among gay people in Asbury Park for processing marriage licenses for same-sex couples for three days in March 2004, an act of guerrilla clerkship that was almost immediately blocked, via a faxed letter, by the state attorney general.

Ms. Tomek opened up the office for the occasion Monday morning — a federal holiday — wearing an animal-print tunic, high-heeled boots and big gold-hoop earrings; when Tom Pivinski, 64, said he had not brought government identification, she good-naturedly agreed to identify him by examining one of his tattoos. One by one, she swore in applicants and told them where to sign.

"Come to Asbury Park, baby, where it all happens," said Terence J. Reidy, Asbury Park's city manager.

The new law stemmed from a lawsuit filed in 2002, when seven same-sex couples were denied marriage licenses. The case, Lewis v. Harris, was eventually appealed to the New Jersey Supreme Court, which ruled in October that the State Constitution guarantees same-sex couples all the rights and benefits of marriage.

But the court passed on to the Legislature the thorny question of whether same-sex unions could be called "marriage," reasoning that "the great engine for social change in this country has always been the democratic process." On Dec. 21, Gov. Jon S. Corzine signed a law that created a legal structure for civil unions.

Applicants for civil unions — like prospective brides and grooms — must wait three days before a license is granted and a ceremony performed, so couples who submitted applications on Monday are planning to hold rapid-fire civil union ceremonies early Thursday morning — at 12:01, 12:05, 12:07 and 12:10 a.m.

Others will not have to wait. The state attorney general, Stuart J. Rabner, announced on Friday that gay couples with marriages or civil unions performed in other states or countries would have their status recognized as civil unions in New Jersey. The state's first civil union ceremony was performed at 12:01 a.m. Monday, in Teaneck, for Steven Goldstein, the chairman of Garden State Equality, and his partner, Daniel Gross, whose civil union had been performed in Vermont.

Mr. Goldstein, who fought vigorously last fall to legalize gay marriage in New Jersey, said the ceremony was "one of the most bittersweet moments" of his life. He said the small turnout Monday morning was proof that other gay couples felt the same way.

"There's a bit of happiness on one hand, but no satisfaction," he said. "Before, we in the gay community sat in the back of the bus. Now, we're allowed to sit in the middle of the bus."

But Bill Whitefield, 40, who stopped by Ms. Tomek's desk Monday afternoon, said the light showing proved just the opposite. Three years ago, he said, gay couples in Asbury Park crowded into this office to apply for marriage licenses, panicked that their rights would be taken away by new laws.

Since the ruling in Lewis v. Harris, he said, that urgency is gone. He and his partner are in no rush; they are thinking of marrying in two years. Mr. Whitefield, a native of Nashville, said he had heard plenty of grumbling about the civil union law, and he wishes his friends would look at the bright side.

"We have a lot of New York radicals here," he said. "I say that with the utmost affection."

ANTITRUST:

Merger Would End Satellite Radio's Rivalry (NYT)

By Richard Siklos And Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

The nation's two satellite radio services, Sirius and XM, announced plans yesterday to merge, a move that would end their costly competition for radio personalities and subscribers but that is also sure to raise antitrust issues.

The two companies, which report close to 14 million subscribers, hoped to revolutionize the radio industry with a bevy of niche channels offering everything from fishing tips to salsa music, and media personalities like Howard Stern and Oprah Winfrey, with few commercials. But neither has yet turned an annual profit and both have had billions in losses.

While there had been speculation of a merger, neither side had engaged in serious negotiations until December, when both companies determined it was in their best interests to complete a deal while the Bush administration was in power, people in the negotiations said.

The companies said yesterday that their $13 billion merger — code-named Project Big Sky by XM — would give consumers a broader range of programming, while eliminating overlapping stations that focus on genres of music. At the same time, they said, they could cut duplicated costs in sales and marketing.

A merger would require antitrust approval from the Justice Department and would have to be considered in the public interest by the Federal Communications Commission.

Under their operating licenses, XM and Sirius were prohibited from ever owning each other's license. The commission could waive that rule. But critics pointed to its rejection of the merger of the satellite television broadcasters EchoStar and DirecTV four years ago.

Questioned last month about a possible Sirius-XM merger, the F.C.C. chairman, Kevin J. Martin, initially appeared to be skeptical, but later said that if such a deal were proposed, the agency would consider it.

In a statement yesterday, Mr. Martin acknowledged that the F.C.C. rule could complicate a merger but said the commission would evaluate the proposal. "The hurdle here, however, would be high," he said.

The proposed merger, first reported yesterday by The New York Post, promises to be a test of whether regulators will see a combination of XM and Sirius as a monopoly of satellite radio communications or whether they will consider other audio entertainment, like iPods, Internet radio and HD radio, to be competitors.

"If the only competition to XM is Sirius, then you don't let the deal through," said Blair Levin, managing director of Stifel Nicolaus & Company and a former F.C.C. chief of staff. But Mr. Blair said he expected the F.C.C. to approve the merger.

"It's my view that in looking at this picture, the Justice Department is going to conclude that the market is contestable, that there's various ways these services compete and they'll allow this merger."

Both Sirius and XM have been rapidly adding customers since they began selling the concept of subscription-based radio available coast to coast about six years ago. XM ended 2006 with nearly eight million customers but Sirius increased its subscriber base by 80 percent last year, to about six million, after it signed Mr. Stern in a $725 million cash and stock deal.

Still, both companies had expected faster growth, and the real number of subscribers may be less than appears at first glance. Many receive the service free for a trial period when buying a new car or truck.

The two services have some $6 billion in accumulated losses. Both companies' share prices have slumped recently as investors cooled on the companies' prospects for generating profits, given the heavy costs of acquiring programming talent like Mr. Stern and the radio rights to the National Football League and Major League Baseball.

The companies' services are, for the moment, not compatible. If the merger were approved, officials said yesterday, they would provide subscribers with technology that would allow them access to both services.

Each sells subscriptions for $12.95 a month. The cost of the combined service is yet to be determined.

Pricing the service is only one of many commercial and operational challenges the merger would face. For one thing, XM has prided itself on being advertising-free while Sirius sells ads on its talk radio fare, including Mr. Stern's shows.

Craig E. Moffett, an analyst with Sanford C. Bernstein & Company, said it was not clear that Mr. Stern, Ms. Winfrey and some of the other major draws on the channels would be readily accessible to the merged companies' wider audience.

Mel Karmazin, the longtime broadcasting executive who has been chief executive of Sirius for the past two years, said he had tried to reach Mr. Stern, who is on vacation, but had not yet done so, and a company spokesman said Sirius does not discuss its contracts.

The new company's name and where it would be based — Sirius is in New York and XM in Washington — have not yet been determined. Mr. Karmazin would continue as chief executive while Gary Parsons, XM's chairman, would remain as chairman of the merged company.

In an interview yesterday, Mr. Karmazin and Mr. Parsons said they believed they could prove the combination would be in the public interest.

Mr. Parsons said that unlike EchoStar and DirecTV, whose only rival was cable television, the satellite radio companies have a very small audience compared with the ways people get music, information and entertainment in audio formats, including iPods and the Internet. "The only thing that you could even think of as similar between those companies and us is that they both use satellites," Mr. Karmazin said.

But critics are lining up. The National Association of Broadcasters, a trade group that represents broadcast radio and television stations, issued a statement within hours of the XM-Sirius announcement.

"In coming weeks, policy makers will have to weigh whether an industry that makes Howard Stern its poster child should be rewarded with a monopoly," it said.

XM and Sirius had been in a mating dance for years, with Mr. Karmazin and Mr. Parsons flirting both publicly and privately. According to people involved in the talks, they began serious talks just before Christmas.

Anxious about Mr. Karmazin and Mr. Parsons being spotted together, the two sides decided to meet in an inconspicuous spot: the Upper East Side apartment of one of Mr. Parsons's bankers, Dennis S. Hersch, a former lawyer who joined JPMorgan Chase two years ago.

Mr. Karmazin met with Mr. Parsons for several hours in Mr. Hersch's living room one morning in late December, these people said. They sat on sofas flanked by their advisers, James B. Lee and Mr. Hersch of JPMorgan Chase, which represented XM, and Paul Taubman of Morgan Stanley, which worked for Sirius. The men decided to pursue a deal.

An army of merger and antitrust lawyers for both sides worked several marathon weeks of conference calls and trips to Washington to gauge the political climate for the transaction before opining that the deal should pass regulatory muster. Simpson Thacher & Bartlett and Wiley Rein are representing Sirius; XM is being advised by Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom; Jones Day; and Latham & Watkins.

About a month later, the two sides reconvened, this time at Mr. Karmazin's apartment in the Trump International Hotel and Tower just off Columbus Circle overlooking Central Park. It was a daylong negotiation. But both sides were far apart on price: Mr. Karmazin didn't want to pay much of a premium and Mr. Parsons was seeking an even higher one than he got yesterday. Mr. Parsons and his advisers left the apartment thinking the talks might collapse.

About a week later, after talking to their boards, the two sides were coaxed back together, both giving a little on price. Two weeks ago, Mr. Parsons returned to Mr. Karmazin's apartment. This time, the men reached a deal and shook hands on it.

Sirius To Acquire Larger Rival XM For $4.57 Billion (Correct) (BLOOM)

By Christopher Stern

Bloomberg, February 20, 2007

(Corrects dateline.)

Feb. 19 (Bloomberg) -- Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. agreed to buy larger rival XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. for $4.57 billion in stock to combine the only pay radio companies and stem billions of dollars in losses.

Mel Karmazin, chief executive officer of New York-based Sirius, will be CEO of the combined company, and Gary Parsons, chairman of Washington-based XM, will continue as chairman, the companies said today in a statement.

Sirius and XM faced pressure to merge after losing a combined $7 billion to attract subscribers over the past eight years and signing talent including Howard Stern and Oprah Winfrey. The merger will face antitrust scrutiny and must also be approved by the U.S. Federal Communications Commission.

``To make themselves stronger in the long term, they really need to benefit from the synergies a combination offers them,'' said David Bank, an analyst at RBC Capital Markets in New York. ``I see it as a huge positive.''

The combined companies will attempt to cut costs by negotiating new programming agreements and deals with automakers who install the devices in cars, said Bank, who rated XM shares ``outperform'' and Sirius ``sector perform.''

Under the terms of the accord, which the companies describe as a merger of equals, XM investors will receive 4.6 shares of Sirius common stock for each share they own. Shareholders of each will own about 50 percent of the combined radio company.

New Board

The deal values XM at $17.02 a share, based on Feb. 16 closing prices, the last trading day in the U.S. markets before Presidents Day. That represents a 22 percent premium over XM's close of $13.98. Sirius closed at $3.70. The companies have combined debt of $2.56 billion and cash of about $638 million as of September.

The new company's board will consist of 12 members, including Karmazin, 63, and Parsons, 56, four independent members named by each company, and one representative from each of General Motors Corp. and American Honda. Hugh Panero, 50, CEO of XM, will continue in his role until deal closes, which both companies expect this year.

Sirius and XM will operate independently until the deal is completed, the companies said. The name of the combined company and the location of its headquarters will be decided later.

Regulatory Scrutiny

Sirius and XM anticipate a rigorous review by the Justice Department and FCC. The companies said today they are competing for customers in a broad media landscape that includes products such as Apple Inc.'s iPod, cell phones that play music and Internet music stations.

``What this is really about is war,'' said Karmazin, who has spent four decades in the radio industry and was president of Viacom Inc. before joining Sirius in November 2004.

When the FCC authorized XM and Sirius to offer satellite radio service in 1997, it barred the two companies from merging. The FCC envisioned the two would compete with each other and provide consumers with an alternative to traditional radio.

The proposed merger will face a high level of scrutiny at the FCC, Chairman Kevin Martin said in an e-mailed statement.

``The companies would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off with both more choice and affordable prices,'' Martin said.

Sirius and XM will argue the competitive landscape has changed since the commission passed the rule barring them from combining 10 years ago.

Competes with iPod?

``From a government perspective, it's tricky,'' said Blair Levin, a media policy analyst with St. Louis-based Stifel Nicolaus & Co. ``Does something like the iPod really compete with satellite radio?'' If federal regulators decide it doesn't, the deal is likely to be rejected, Levin said.

Shares of both Sirius and XM declined 47 percent last year on concern over losses and subscriber growth.

XM finished the year with 7.63 million subscribers, shy of the 7.7 million to 7.9 million it had forecast in November. The number of users rose 29 percent from 2005.

Sirius subscribers increased 82 percent to 6 million last year, in line with its forecast.

As of Feb. 16, Sirius had a market value of $5.2 billion, while XM was valued at $3.75 billion.

Sirius And XM Agree To Merge, Despite Hurdles (WSJ)

By Sarah Mcbride, Dennis K. Berman And Amy Schatz

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

The proposed $11.4 billion merger of struggling satellite-radio operators XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. and Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. sets up a crucial test for the nation's regulators: how to weigh the limits of consolidation against rapid changes in media technology.

DOJ_NMG_0133822

The deal is structured as a 50-50 "merger of equals," giving XM and Sirius shareholders an equal stake in the combined company, and potentially uniting a roster of talent that includes Sirius's shock jock Howard Stern and daytime-TV personality Oprah Winfrey, one of XM's biggest stars. The agreement calls for Sirius Chief Executive Mel Karmazin to serve as CEO of the new entity, which would have more than $2.3 billion in long-term debt. XM Chairman Gary Parsons would be chairman.

TEXT OF STATEMENT

Read the text of the statement1 by XM and Sirius on their merger of equals. · Tale of the Tape: XM and Sirius2

But because XM and Sirius are the only two companies licensed by the Federal Communications Commission to offer satellite radio in the U.S., the deal is likely to face significant regulatory obstacles.

Broadcasters said yesterday that they will fight the proposed merger, and FCC Chairman Kevin Martin released an unusually grim statement saying that the two companies will face a "high" hurdle, since the FCC still has a 1997 rule on its books specifically forbidding such a deal which would need to be tossed. The transaction also requires the Justice Department's blessing.

Indeed, XM and Sirius may be rushing into a deal because they sense the regulatory terrain will only get tougher. People close to the matter said that the two companies acted because the climate is already changing with the election of a Democratic-controlled Congress. Future developments -- such as the possibility of a Democratic president -- could make it even harder for the proposed merger to pass muster.

In their strategy, the two companies may be subtly acknowledging the risks before them: By conceiving their deal as a merger of equals and declining to say which company name would emerge ascendant, they minimize the business risks should the deal fall through. If, for example, the combined company were to be dubbed Sirius, XM could be vulnerable to a decline in sales during a regulatory review period that could last a year. A person familiar with the negotiations said the two companies have set March 1, 2008, as their "drop-dead date," after which either side can walk away if approval is not granted.

The coming regulatory battle is likely to focus on the definition of satellite radio's market. The two companies are expected to argue that the rules established a decade ago, which require two satellite rivals to ensure competition, simply don't apply in today's entertainment landscape.

Since 1997, a host of new listening options have emerged, making the issue of choice in satellite radio less important for consumers. Executives cite a new digital technology called HD radio, iPod digital music players, Internet radio and music over mobile phones as competitors that didn't exist when the satellite licenses were first awarded.

Just a few years ago, the two satellite rivals were the hot new technology on the media scene, offering consumers greater choice in both music and talk programming in exchange for a monthly subscription fee. But while both companies have continued to add subscribers steadily, their growth has slowed, in part because of the other new devices and services competing for the same potential listeners.

Both XM and Sirius have continued to lose money. In 2005, the companies had combined losses of $1.5 billion, after losing a combined $1.4 billion the year before. Their 2006 results haven't been released, but Goldman Sachs analyst Mark Wienkes estimates that Sirius lost $1.1 billion on revenue of $628.8 million last year, while XM lost $658.2 million on revenue of $914 million.

Consumers and their advocates are likely to worry that a combined company would mean higher prices for satellite-radio service. Both companies now charge $12.95 a month.

But company executives say market forces would limit the possibility of higher prices. "We are competing with companies that give away their product for free," said Mr. Karmazin, alluding to conventional over-the-air radio.

Satellite-radio customers will still be able to use their existing satellite radios for the foreseeable future, but to take advantage of a combined service, they probably would need to upgrade to a newer radio. Currently, Sirius and XM run on separate, incompatible systems, although a team of engineers from both companies has been working on a radio that could pull in both signals.

"The benefits to the subscribers are awesome," Sirius's Mr. Karmazin said in an interview. "We can combine [research and development] resources and come up with cooler, more advanced products that will satisfy them more. We're going to have the ability to negotiate better with our receiver manufacturers."

The companies could also eliminate duplicative services. For example, XM features a Christian-music-themed channel called "The Message," while Sirius has its own Christian pop channel dubbed "Spirit." By Mr. Karmazin's reckoning, the two companies could eliminate such overlap and concentrate on unique shows and new technology to deliver it. "There's going to be more consumer choice," Mr. Karmazin said.

It remains to be seen whether the FCC shares that view. In his statement yesterday evening, Mr. Martin said the FCC would certainly review the deal, but "the companies would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off -- with both more choice and affordable prices."

A larger problem for the companies, however, is opposition from broadcasters, to whom Mr. Martin has been an ally in the past. Two years ago, the National Association of Broadcasters lobbied hard against XM's effort to acquire WCS Wireless LLC for $195 million. The deal would have given XM additional radio frequencies and allowed it to expand its service.

Broadcasters, however, complained that XM would use the acquisition to provide local programming, which isn't allowed under its current license. Ultimately, the deal fell through after languishing without action at the FCC for nearly a year.

The broadcasters quickly went on the offensive yesterday. "When the FCC authorized satellite radio, it specifically found that the public would be served best by two competitive nationwide systems," said NAB spokesman Dennis Wharton. "Now, with their stock prices at rock bottom and their business model in disarray because of profligate spending practices, they seek a government bailout to avoid competing in the marketplace."

The FCC's five commissioners will need to be convinced that there's enough competition in the market to support a merger. One issue the agency will likely consider, FCC officials say, is satellite radio's popularity with consumers and the two companies' long-term prospects if they don't merge.

With the FCC currently immersed in what's likely to be a protracted fight over changes to media-ownership limits, it may not be an auspicious time to propose a deal to consolidate the satellite-radio industry.

Democrats at the FCC have been more assertive since their party took control of Congress. And some lawmakers have already begun to express doubts about the deal.

Massachusetts Democrat Edward Markey, chairman of the House subcommittee that oversees the FCC, said yesterday that he will review the proposed merger's effect on consumers. "In light of the dramatic consolidation of radio ownership...I believe that the merger of the only two satellite radio companies must be assessed with an eye toward ensuring that it does not have a similar, deleterious effect on diversity on the dial and localism in radio coverage and reporting," he said in a statement.

Under the deal, XM shareholders will receive a fixed exchange of 4.6 shares of Sirius for each of their XM shares. Based on stock prices Friday, that meant that XM holders would receive $17.02 for each of their shares, a premium to Friday's close of $13.98. XM Chairman Parsons had argued for more, people familiar with the matter said, based on his company's more-extensive deals with auto makers and its 7.6 million subscribers, compared with Sirius's six million. But Mr. Karmazin stuck to his guns, stressing Sirius's bigger market capitalization and faster growth rate.

The market was already responding to the possibility of a deal on Friday, bidding XM stock up by nearly 8%. In agreeing to a premium for XM, Sirius is getting a larger ownership stake than if it had simply contributed its business into a new company.

So-called "mergers of equals" have had a dubious track record, according to a number of academic studies of big corporate transactions. That's largely because under such plans, companies can end up bickering over managerial control and strategy, which can be distracting and ultimately costly to shareholders.

Sirius and XM executives played down that prospect. "Synergies have become such a very large element of value compared to the individual values of the companies," said Mr. Parsons, though he conceded that the two sides debated for months about who should own the biggest part of the company. "That drove us to look at it together."

Sirius has performed better in recent quarters at retail, winning large numbers of customers who walk into a store to buy a satellite radio to add to their car. But XM has positioned itself better for the future, signing up more deals with auto makers such as General Motors Corp., so cars roll off factory lines with satellite radios preinstalled.

Expensive programming one-upmanship has weighed on the stock prices at both companies. For example, in 2004, Sirius said it would pay $500 million over five years, not including performance-based bonuses, to broadcast a morning show starring the colorful Mr. Stern. Two weeks later, XM said it would pay $650 million over 11 years to broadcast Major League Baseball.

"The strategic benefits of a merger would be tremendous," said Craig Moffett, an analyst at Sanford C. Bernstein. "Programming contract renewals would no longer be the subject of bidding wars. Automotive revenue-sharing agreements and retailer commission deals would suddenly be uncontested."

Sirius was advised on the deal by Morgan Stanley and law firms Simpson Thacher & Bartlett LLP and Wiley Rein LLP. XM was advised by J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. and law firms Skadden Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom; Jones Day; and Latham & Watkins.

How Sirius-XM Merger Would Cut Companies' Costs Still Unclear (USAT)

By David Lieberman

USA Today, February 20, 2007

NEW YORK — The vision of a robustly competitive satellite radio business came crashing to Earth on Monday, as the industry's once bitter rivals — Sirius (SIRI) and XM Satellite Radio — agreed to merge, creating a company valued at $13 billion, including $1.6 billion in debt.

Each of the two has created an array of radio channels, and they've amassed more than 13 million subscribers between them but never made a profit.

The announcement also created uncertainty, and provided few answers, for current subscribers and those considering buying one of the services. The two systems are incompatible, and virtually all satellite radios are designed for one and can't receive the other.

PRESS RELEASE: Sirius and XM deal

Sirius CEO Mel Karmazin, who would hold that job at the still-unnamed combined company, sought to reassure consumers.

"You should assume that we're going to continue for a very, very long period of time to offer the Sirius and XM service," he says. "Once this merger is approved, we'll be able to work with receiver manufacturers and chip-set designers to have a next-generation radio that can pick up both services."

Left unanswered is what will happen to consumers who have one of the current generation of radios once it's time to blend the companies.

"The companies will have to announce a fairly complicated technology-migration plan," says Sanford C. Bernstein analyst Craig Moffett.

More may become known today in a conference call the companies plan for analysts and the press.

In addition to the tech hurdles, the companies will have to get the deal to pass muster with antitrust officials and the Federal Communications Commission.

"The companies would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off with both more choice and affordable prices," FCC Chairman Kevin Martin said in a statement. "The hurdle here, however, would be high."

Congress also might have something to say. Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., who chairs the House Subcommittee on Telecommunications and the Internet, said in a statement, "The merger of the only two satellite radio companies must be assessed with an eye toward ensuring that it does not have a … deleterious effect on diversity on the dial and localism in radio coverage and reporting."

The potential for a drawn-out merger transition, following a lengthy approval process, makes it uncertain when executives might find as much as $7 billion a year in savings that they say they can realize, for example by eliminating redundant channels and expenses for transmission and marketing.

Consumer advocates, for their part, likely will pressure regulators and lawmakers for major concessions — if they don't ask for the deal to be rejected outright.

"We're going to raise questions," says Consumers Union's Gene Kimmelman. "I'm not going to say we're going to oppose. I don't know enough about the economics."

He adds that the group likely will call for a la carte pricing, enabling consumers to pay just for the channels they want, and for the merged company to carry additional public-interest programming.

Meanwhile, the National Association of Broadcasters trade association says it'll use its muscle to fight the proposed merger.

"In the coming weeks, policymakers will have to weigh whether an industry that makes (shock jock) Howard Stern its poster child should be rewarded with a monopoly platform for offensive programming," NAB Executive Vice President Dennis Wharton said in a statement.

But the deal should find lots of fans on Wall Street.

Investors and analysts have been disappointed by the slowing growth rate for new subscriptions at Sirius and XM. They picked up a combined 1.8 million subscribers in the fourth quarter of 2006, which is down 12% from the same period in 2005, UBS estimates.

Automakers, led by General Motors, Toyota and Honda, are the biggest contributors to XM's subscriber base. They offer the radios in almost all of their new cars. Sirius has similar deals with Ford, DaimlerChrysler and VW/Audi.

Meanwhile, both companies are grappling with high costs for high-profile content, including XM's deals with Major League Baseball and Oprah Winfrey and Sirius' pacts with the NFL and Stern.

It has become unclear when either of the young companies might be profitable. As a result, "The benefits of a merger are simply too good to pass up," Moffett says. "There are obvious financial synergies from the fact that these two companies run similar operations."

Sirius will offer 4.6 of its shares for each XM share, leaving each side with 50% of the new venture. Sirius closed Friday at $3.70 while XM was at $13.98.

DOJ_NMG_0133825

If approved — something the companies expect by year's end — it will be run by Karmazin, a blunt New York native who built Infinity Broadcasting into a power in conventional radio and helped to make Stern one of the medium's most popular personalities.

XM Chairman Gary Parsons would be chairman. XM Chief Executive Hugh Panero would stay on until the merger closes.

Antitrust fight ahead

It's hard to predict how the bruising fight in Washington will play out. "I think it's more likely than not the government approves it," says Stifel Nicolaus analyst Blair Levin. "But it's a close call."

Antitrust officials will examine whether a satellite radio monopoly would have too much power to raise subscription fees and ad rates, and to force programmers to accept lower payments.

If they can show that broadcast radio will keep the cost of satellite radio from skyrocketing, then "they have a good chance" of winning approval, says William Baer, former head of the Federal Trade Commission's competition bureau and a lawyer with Arnold & Porter.

The NAB and others are expected to argue that a national satellite radio monopoly could overwhelm free, over-the-air local broadcasters. For example, the new company might gobble up top talent — and possibly win additional business in the biggest markets by offering them channels with local news, weather and information.

"That would put them in direct competition with the NAB constituents," Moffett says. "And the NAB is a force to be reckoned with in Washington."

The FCC would have to reverse its mandate in 1995, when it allocated satellite radio spectrum, that "one (satellite radio) licensee will not be permitted to acquire control of the other remaining" one.

A few weeks ago, the companies' stock dropped when Martin cited the rule as an impediment to a linkup. Two days later, however, he noted that the companies could seek a waiver of the rule.

"When the FCC authorized satellite radio, it specifically found that the public would be served best by two competitive nationwide systems," Wharton says. "Now, with their stock prices at rock bottom and their business model in disarray because of profligate spending practices, they seek a government bailout to avoid competing in the marketplace."

Sirius and XM say that they're optimistic. "We would not be announcing this if we did not believe that we could be getting approval," Karmazin says.

They say that they're making the market more competitive, not less.

"Ten years ago, when these satellite radio licenses were being awarded, there were not any iPods; there was no (digital) HD Radio; there was no (community broadband) WiMax; there were not cellphones with music on them," Parsons says. "You've seen an explosion of these alternatives, which are very attractive to the consumer, but they're things that we have to compete with. And if you look at the size of all of those industries putting forth those choices, we're still the young upstarts in the early stages of our growth phase."

If the FCC approves a deal, it's still likely to impose some conditions, Levin says. For example, it could require the combined company to create a family-friendly tier of stations to shield children from risqué shows and to agree to not raise prices for a certain period.

If the companies get their way and merge, they'll face a host of other potentially vexing challenges.

Each has a distinct corporate culture. XM prides itself on its frugality, building its headquarters in a transitional neighborhood in Washington. Sirius spent freely on talent and built a lavish, high-tech studio in Rockefeller Center.

About 34% of XM's revenue goes to programming and marketing expenses, while 47% of Sirius' revenue is eaten up by those costs.

Satellite Radio Firms Plan To Merge (WP)

By Charles Babington And Thomas Heath

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

XM and Sirius, the two satellite radio companies that have spent millions of dollars trying to woo pay-for-service customers, yesterday announced plans to merge in hopes of stemming losses and offering an even larger smorgasbord of music, talk and sports.

If approved by federal regulators, the merger would give all satellite subscribers access to Sirius's Howard Stern, pro football games and NASCAR races, as well as XM's Oprah Winfrey, Major League Baseball and Bob Dylan.

Before XM Satellite Radio Holdings of the District and Sirius Satellite Radio of New York can combine, however, the companies must persuade the Justice Department and Federal Communications Commission that they are complying with antitrust laws, a claim that land-based broadcasters and consumer groups are likely to dispute. XM and Sirius contend that customers have ample audio choices through devices such as iPods and cellphones.

The FCC bars a single company from controlling the satellite radio market, but FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin recently noted that such rules can be changed. Martin said yesterday that the hurdle "would be high. . . . The companies would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off with both more choice and affordable prices."

Officials said the new company's name and headquarters would be determined later. Customers, who now pay $12.95 per month for each company's service, would be able to choose a cafeteria-style range of channels.

"In fact, it will become a company with greater consumer choice," said Gary M. Parsons, chairman of XM. "Certainly, two companies combined would be a much stronger programming lineup."

The merger would be a milestone in the evolution of commercial radio. XM and Sirius, founded in the early 1990s, predicted that enough people would be willing to pay for a wide array of radio choices -- with clear reception, no fundraising appeals and commercial-free music stations -- to allow the providers to turn a profit.

But their bidding war for on-air talent escalated dramatically. Sirius spent $500 million over five years to employ Stern, who earned another $300 million in stock for meeting certain subscriber goals. XM signed Winfrey to a three-year, $55 million contract. Both companies have spent millions of dollars on professional sports deals.

Sirius has reported losses of $3.4 billion over five years. In mid-2006, XM reported a quarterly loss of $231 million, but the company said it had a positive cash flow by the year's end.

Both firms' stocks have experienced a bumpy ride over the past several years. Shares of XM, which number more than 300 million, soared to nearly $40 in 2005 but closed Friday at $13.98 per share. Sirius, which has more than 1.4 billion shares, reached nearly $9 at its peak in 2005. Sirius shares closed Friday at $3.70 per share.

In a joint statement, Sirius and XM executives called the proposed deal an "all-stock merger of equals" with a combined "enterprise value" of about $13 billion. The figure is their estimation of the combined operation's worth, including net debt of about $1.6 billion.

XM shareholders would receive 4.6 shares of Sirius common stock for each XM share they own. Mel Karmazin, chief executive of Sirius, would become the new company's chief executive. Parsons, chairman of XM, would become chairman of the merged company. The new company's 12-member board of directors would include Karmazin, Parsons and four independent members designated by each company. General Motors and American Honda, which include satellite radio as a standard feature in many new cars, would each provide one board member.

"We believe the standard for approving the deal is whether this is in the public interest," Karmazin said in a conference call with reporters. "We believe there is tremendous benefit that accrues to the public."

Officials said they hope to complete the merger, which was approved by the boards of both companies, by the end of the year.

XM and Sirius face emerging competition from the conversion of AM and FM stations to digital broadcast signals. Traditional analog AM and FM broadcasts provide only one channel per frequency and limited sound quality. In the past few years, however, most AM and FM stations have converted to digital signals, which improves sound quality and gives them the ability to broadcast "side channels" in addition to their main frequencies.

The proposed merger also faces significant regulatory and technological hurdles. The most recent merger attempt comparable to the XM-Sirius proposal came in 2002, when the satellite TV companies Echostar Communications and DirecTV tried to merge. The two companies told the FCC and the Justice Department that they needed to combine resources and expand programming to compete against what they called the "monopoly" of cable-TV providers. They promised more channel choices and the rollout of high-speed Internet access via satellite. The FCC and Justice Department rejected the merger, calling it a clear-cut "two-to-one" deal that would probably result in higher prices for satellite-TV subscribers.

William Baer, an antitrust lawyer at Arnold & Porter, said regulators would give the proposed merger a close look. "It comes down to price competition," Baer said. "At the end of the day, they have to be able to show that the pricing of satellite radio is going to be constrained by these alternative forms of listening, such as standard radio, iPods, Internet radio and cellphones. The question that the Department of Justice will look at is whether satellite radio prices will go up if there is only one provider tomorrow."

Rebecca Arbogast, a telecom industry analyst for the brokerage firm Stifel Nicolaus, said XM and Sirius were smart to start the merger effort in time to complete it before Democrats have the chance to win the presidency -- and appoint top Justice Department and FCC officials. "If they waited until a Democratic attorney general were in place, then it would be a much closer call," Arbogast said.

To help the proposed XM-Sirius merger at the FCC, Sirius has hired the communications law firm Wiley Rein of the District. Managing partner Richard E. Wiley is a former FCC chairman. Martin, the FCC chairman, is a former associate of the firm.

The proposed XM-Sirius merger will face opposition from the National Association of Broadcasters, the trade group of AM and FM radio stations, and local television stations, which has fought the satellite radio services on various fronts since their inception.

"Given the government's history of opposing monopolies in all forms, NAB would be shocked if federal regulators permitted a merger of XM and Sirius," NAB spokesman Dennis Wharton said in a statement. "In coming weeks, policymakers will have to weigh whether an industry that makes Howard Stern its poster child should be rewarded with a monopoly platform for offensive programming."

The NAB has fought XM's rollout of local traffic and weather channels, now in 21 areas, including the District and Baltimore. The NAB says the move violates the spirit of the FCC's intention to license a national satellite radio service. Radio stations in those areas fear losing advertising to XM, which airs commercials on its traffic and weather reports, unlike its music channels.

Gene Kimmelman of Consumers Union said his organization will "raise some antitrust concerns, forcing Justice to look at whether there's a unique satellite market that needs to be preserved with competition."

If the merger is approved, XM and Sirius must reconcile different forms of satellite technology. XM's two satellites are in low-angle, geo-stationary orbit in the Southern sky above the United States. Sirius's three satellites orbit in a figure-eight over North America. Because Sirius's satellites are directly overhead, their signals are less likely to be blocked by tall buildings, trees and mountain ridgelines to the south. However, because the Sirius satellites move in the sky throughout the day, Sirius customers with stationary units sometimes have to move their antennas from one side of the house to another. The problem is less pronounced for Sirius mobile units, such as in cars.

Both services augment their satellite feeds with hundreds of terrestrial "repeater" devices mounted on structures around the country that help broadcast the signal in high-density areas, such as cities.

Sirius struggled with management and technical problems and fell behind XM early on, then surged ahead by launching its first satellite in 2000. XM beat Sirius to rollout, launching its service in September 2001. Sirius made a limited rollout five months later. By the end of 2006, Sirius had 6 million subscribers to XM's 7.6 million.

XM subscriber John Goodman of Tuckahoe, N.Y., said he has several questions about how the deal will affect him.

"My biggest question is what happens to my XM receiver," Goodman said. "I have spent over $100 on my XM receiver so I can listen to the Red Sox games when I'm in the house or outside. How does all this impact me?"

XM, Sirius Cut Deal To Unite Satellite Forces (WT)

By Kara Rowland

The Washington Times, February 20, 2007

Rivals XM Satellite Radio and Sirius Satellite Radio agreed to combine in a $13 billion stock transaction, the companies announced yesterday.

Under the deal, billed as a "merger of equals," Sirius Chief Executive Officer Mel Karmazin and XM Chairman Gary Parsons will keep their respective positions in the combined company. XM CEO Hugh Panero will stay on until the deal closes, which the companies expect to happen by the end of the year.

Shareholders of District-based XM and Sirius, based in New York, each will own about 50 percent of the new company, whose name and headquarters have not been determined.

The deal, pending regulatory approval, would join the only players in the decade-old industry. Together, XM and Sirius fund a roster of high-profile talent ranging from shock-jock Howard Stern to daytime talk-show queen Oprah Winfrey, catering to 14 million subscribers.

"We are excited for the many opportunities that an XM and Sirius combination will provide consumers," Mr. Parsons and Mr. Panero said in a joint statement that touted more programming choices and billions of dollars in savings.

While receivers for both companies can't receive signals from each other, Mr. Parsons and Mr. Karmazin told the Associated Press yesterday they are developing receivers that could receive both signals. Meanwhile, the company is working on other arrangements to bring formerly exclusive programming to both subscriber bases, they said.

Currently, XM has more than 7.6 million subscribers and a market capitalization -- the value of a company based on the stock price multiplied by the number of shares outstanding -- of $3.75 billion, while Sirius has more than 6 million subscribers and a market cap of $5.2 billion.

The rate of subscriber growth has slowed at both companies, which had combined revenue of $1.5 billion last year. XM and Sirius also have drawn the ire of Wall Street for bleeding millions of dollars on competing with each other over the years for high-priced talent.

"This is happening because investors are just out of patience," said Tom Taylor, editor of Inside Radio. "They're just tired of this spiral of red ink, of losing money and costs that continue to go on."

The two companies' rosters mirror each other. XM boasts of personalities such as Oprah and shock jocks Opie and Anthony, with content from Major League Baseball, IndyCar Series Racing and college football's Bowl Championship Series. The Sirius lineup includes Mr. Stern, Martha Stewart, the National Football League, NASCAR and the National Basketball Association.

The merger must be approved by the Federal Communications Commission and Department of Justice.

The FCC's rules on satellite radio licenses currently bar such a deal, and Chairman Kevin J. Martin said yesterday the regulatory hurdle would be "high."

"Obviously, the commission will evaluate any transaction filed to make a determination whether or not approval would be in the public interest. The hurdle here, however, would be high as the commission originally prohibited one company from holding the only two satellite radio licenses. The companies would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off with both more choice and affordable prices," said Mr. Martin, a Republican.

The Justice Department did not respond to requests for comment yesterday, a federal holiday.

Sirius and XM are expected to make the case that market conditions have changed significantly since 1997, and they alluded to that in their announcement yesterday.

"The combined company will be better positioned to compete effectively with the continually expanding array of entertainment alternatives that consumers have embraced since the Federal Communications Commission first granted our satellite radio licenses a decade ago," Mr. Parsons and Mr. Panero said.

Representatives for Sirius and XM did not return calls seeking additional comment.

Rumors of a merger between Sirius and XM have been brewing for months, fueled by analysts' speculation and public statements made by the companies' executives. Last month, at the International Consumer Electronics Show in Las Vegas, both Mr. Parsons and Mr. Karmazin appeared open to the idea, with Mr. Karmazin noting that "consolidation creates value."

The deal has its critics. In a statement yesterday, Dennis Wharton, executive vice president of the National Association of Broadcasters, described the deal as "a government bailout to avoid competing in the marketplace." The NAB is a trade group whose members include traditional radio stations.

The board of directors for the combined company will have 12 members. In addition to Mr. Parsons and Mr. Karmazin, each company will name four members. General Motors Corp. and Honda Motor Co. will each have a seat.

The companies will hold a conference call this morning to discuss the deal.

On Friday, shares of XM closed at $13.98 and Sirius closed at $3.70 on Nasdaq. Markets were closed yesterday in observance of Presidents Day.

Sirius CEO Spent His Career Making Deals (USAT)

By Laura Petrecca

USA Today, February 20, 2007

If there's anything that Mel Karmazin knows, it's the art of the deal.

The 63-year-old media executive has spent most of his career expanding the reach — and public profile — of the companies he's run.

Since he joined Sirius Satellite Radio in November 2004 as CEO, he's signed big-name talent to create channels such as Martha Stewart Living Radio and Jamie Foxx's The Foxxhole. Now, with the planned XM and Sirius merger, he's slated to take over as CEO of the combined company.

The native New Yorker got his start as a radio ad salesman at WCBS in 1967. He joined John Kluge's Metromedia in 1970, rising to general manager, before leaving in 1981 to become president of Infinity Broadcasting. He became Infinity's CEO in 1988.

It was in the 1980s and 1990s at Infinity that he really made his mark — expanding it from a fledgling company to a radio empire, buying up stations around the country, particularly in major markets.

It also was at Infinity that Karmazin first worked with Howard Stern. (Although Karmazin was Stern's boss when both worked for Infinity, he didn't engineer the shock jock's highly publicized move to Sirius. Stern jumped over before Karmazin.)

In January 1997, Karmazin became CEO of CBS Radio when Infinity and Westinghouse/CBS merged. By May of that year, he was named CEO of the CBS Station Group of radio and TV station assets. After Viacom acquired CBS in 2000, Karmazin became that company's president and chief operating officer.

Let XM And Sirius Merge (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0133829

The Los Angeles Times, February 20, 2007

The FCC shouldn't stop the nation's two providers of satellite radio from joining forces, because they would be only one of many in the audio entertainment business.

FEDERAL REGULATORS are notoriously slow to act, yet it took the chairman of the Federal Communications Commission less than half a day to erect a daunting roadblock to the proposed merger of the country's two satellite radio services, XM and Sirius. Within hours of the companies' announcement of their intention to combine operations, FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin reacted, saying that XM and Sirius "would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off with both more choice and affordable prices."

Martin's two-pronged test sets a nearly insurmountable bar. It's hard to argue that "more choice" results when the only two suppliers of a product combine, or that the merged entity will be deterred from hiking the fees paid by its subscribers (14 million at last count). In addition, when the FCC issued two licenses for a national satellite radio service in 1997, it said that they could not be owned by a single company.

That said, Martin's statement is inconsistent with the approach the FCC has taken on media consolidation in general. The goal should be to promote choice not in the niche occupied by XM and Sirius but in the general market of audio entertainment. That market is very competitive, particularly among national players.

Consider a few statistics. Half of the new cars sold in the U.S. this year will have stereo systems designed to work seamlessly with an iPod. These and similar devices can also play podcasts — a recorded program that emulates over-the-air radio — from more than 44,000 sources. Of the roughly 12,500 over-the-air stations pumping out conventional radio broadcasts, about 1,200 also broadcast in digital — frequently, with more than one channel in different formats. And a growing number of mobile devices are able to tap into the expanding ranks of online music services.

Meanwhile, Sirius and XM are bleeding money at a prodigious rate as they try to amass the subscribers needed to overcome their debt and depreciation costs. Allowing them to merge could save them billions of dollars in marketing and maintenance expenses while preserving satellite radio as one of many alternatives available to consumers.

Anticipating resistance from the FCC, the companies said they would let people subscribe to channels on a more a la carte basis — a favorite cause of Martin's, at least where cable and satellite TV are concerned — and broaden their programming. They also said the combination would lead to less expensive receivers and more advanced services, such as delivering improved traffic and weather reports. The FCC should look at these concessions, declare victory and approve the merger.

Hollywood Gets Tough On Movie Copying In Canada (NYT)

By Ian Austen

The New York Times, February 19, 2007

OTTAWA, Feb. 18 — Canada heavily promotes itself as a place to make films. But now it has a more dubious distinction: an analysis by the Motion Picture Association of America has found that 30 to 40 percent of the bootleg DVDs sold in the United States were made by camcorders smuggled into Canadian theaters.

In response, 20th Century Fox Film is considering holding back film releases for the Canadian market, and the film industry in general is calling for stricter Canadian laws. One theater chain has even equipped some its staff with night-vision goggles to better ferret out copiers.

The apparent rise of Canada's illegal film industry stems from several factors. Tighter federal and state laws in the United States covering film piracy have not been matched by similar legislation in Canada. And because most film releases are simultaneous in Canada and the United States, Canadian pirates get a head start relative to their counterparts abroad.

And, finally, even industry officials acknowledge that Canadian pirates offer technically superior work.

"There are professional Canadian camcord rings and they are very, very good at what they do," said John G. Malcolm, the director of worldwide antipiracy operations for the Motion Picture Association of America in Los Angeles. "There is a premium placed on getting early copies and high-quality copies. Everyone in the industry knows that camcording in Canada is a major, major problem."

The film industry's estimate of how many black market DVDs originate from Canadian multiplexes is not simply a guess. In many release prints, almost unnoticeable identification marks are scattered throughout random frames.

On the studios' behalf, Technicolor and Deluxe Laboratories, the leading producers of those prints, regularly analyze illicit DVDs as well as online film postings, uncover the identification codes and then use them to trace the copies back to the theater where they were videotaped.

In Canada, that trail usually leads to theaters in the Montreal area, which is estimated to be the source of three-quarters of the illicit copies that come from the country.

In the United States, federal law as well as 40 state laws can impose harsh penalties for videotaping movies from theater screens, a process known as camming. In Canada, however, it violates copyright laws only if the police can show in court that the camera operator intended to commercially distribute copies of the recording.

"It's very hard for us to prove that a person is actually doing that," said Ellis Jacob, the president and chief executive of Cineplex Entertainment, Canada's dominant theater chain, speaking from Toronto. "All we can do is get rid of the patron and ask them not to come back."

Like everyone in the Canadian theater business, Mr. Jacob has received two letters from Bruce Snyder, the president of domestic distribution for Fox. (All studios treat Canada as part of the United States market.) The messages were blunt. Describing the situation in Canada as "an out of control epidemic," Mr. Snyder warned the theater owners that Fox may delay Canadian releases by several weeks.

In an interview, Mr. Snyder said he has no complaints about companies like Cineplex, which are, after all, his customers.

"I am not mad at the exhibition community," Mr. Snyder said. "The exhibitors are doing everything they can to help us." Like Mr. Jacob, his concerns are with Canadian law and law enforcement.

Canada accounts for about 7 to 10 percent of a film's total North American revenue. The spillover effect of movie coverage by American television and publications would be diminished if Mr. Snyder delayed Canadian releases.

"It's a drastic step," Mr. Snyder said. "But you've got to plug that hole somehow. It could be short-term damage for long-term benefit."

In the interim, Cineplex has supplied several theater managers with night-vision goggles and increased the surveillance of theaters, particularly during afternoon screenings. After an extensive investigation, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police arrested one Montreal man in September for taping movies. Working with the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Canadian police has traced his handiwork to black-market DVDs sold in New York.

Because prosecutors are still working out formal charges, the man cannot be identified. Sgt. Jean-Yves Ducharme of the Mounted Police in Montreal said the man is less than 30 years old and "a person who did not make a lot of money out of it."

The suspect, he added, was a computer enthusiast who appeared to be motivated by producing high-quality copies and distributing them as close to a film's release as possible.

Canada's theater owners and other film industry groups are pressing the Canadian government to make the simple act of recording from a theater screen a crime. Mr. Jacob said they have received little response to date.

Christian Girouard, a spokesman for Canada's justice department, said officials were discussing the situation with the industry and other government departments. He said he was unable to describe what, if any, measures might be taken.

Scor Likely Isn't Done Pursuing Converium (WSJ)

By Ian Mcdonald And Goran Mijuk

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

Swiss reinsurer Converium Holding AG spurned a takeover proposal from French rival Scor SA. But the courtship isn't likely over and it may be the first of many this year in the European insurance sector.

Converium said yesterday its board rejected a proposed offer of three billion Swiss francs ($2.43 billion) made by Scor over the weekend. If merged, the two companies could leapfrog several competitors to become one of the world's five largest reinsurers depending on how it's measured. Reinsurance firms essentially backstop insurance companies' biggest risks in return for a cut of their premiums.

Scor said it secured a 32.9% stake in Converium and approached the board regarding a proposed offer of 21 francs a share for the rest -- a 12% premium to the stock's closing price Friday. A 33.3% stake would require a formal offer, according to Swiss securities rules. Scor said it is convinced that a tie-up makes sense, so it is unlikely that chatter about a merger between the two will end there.

Scor said a merger with Converium was "a unique strategic opportunity to create a top five global multiline reinsurer in this time of market consolidation."

Converium said the offer "fundamentally fails to recognize the value of Converium's franchise and growth prospects, and is not in the interest of Converium, its shareholders and its customers."

A Converium spokesman noted that Scor's official stake will be filed publicly this week and that Converium remains focused on growth and profitability targets laid out in recent weeks. A Scor spokesman declined to comment beyond the company's statement.

The Scor offer could be the first of several in the insurance sector this year. Cost cuts and below-average claims have left many European insurers with billions more than regulators require to back up their policies. At the same time, maturing insurance markets in the U.S. and Europe have lead analysts to expect single-digit premium growth -- particularly in property-casualty coverage -- in coming years. Some players may seek growth by buying up rivals with today's excess cash.

"I think it will be a busy year," said Joseph Rohm, a financial-services analyst with T. Rowe Price Group Inc. in London. "Because of all the excess capital being generated and the difficulties some companies will have finding growth, I think we'll see a lot more deals."

Analysts have estimated that European insurers finished 2006 with more than €50 billion, or about $66 billion, more in the bank than regulators require. Greater scale typically benefits insurers by potentially lowering their borrowing costs. This will be a greater focus in coming years as new solvency rules expected in 2010 will favor companies with broader diversification.

This could lead smaller participants such as Scor and Converium to weigh merging. "This offer is a good example of the kinds of deals we might see this year," Mr. Rohm said.

Scor's move follows the 2006 takeover by Swiss Reinsurance Co. of General Electric Co.'s reinsurance operations, a deal that was aimed at boosting both companies' capital strength and global reach.

A takeover by Scor would create a company with substantial life and nonlife business with annual premiums of about €5.3 billion. It would catapult the combined entity close to the world's largest reinsurers -- led by Swiss Re; Munich Re AG; Berkshire Hathaway Re, a unit of Berkshire Hathaway Inc.; and Germany's Hannover Re AG.

Analysts said the timing of the bid was sensible as Converium shares are relatively inexpensive due to the company's restructuring.

But some, such as Oddo Securities analyst Nicolas Jacob, warned that investors worry Scor would have to make another call on capital markets to finance a merger and that the move indicates a troubling strategic shift toward the risky nonlife reinsurance sector, where Converium is focused. Scor came close to financial collapse in 2002 after losses from contracts written in the 1990s plunged it deep into the red. It was saved by capital increases of more than €1 billion and a huge restructuring plan.

Its focus shifted toward life reinsurance, which has a steadier claims record than the more volatile property-and-casualty reinsurance sector that is often prone to huge claims from catastrophes.

Scor shares fell 7.3% to €19.57 in Paris yesterday. Converium rose nearly 14% to 21.35 francs in Zurich.

Converium is still smarting from a heavy restructuring in the wake of a massive reserve shortfall in the U.S. in 2004, which required the company to issue new shares, reduce staff and leave the U.S. reinsurance market. Although it has since turned profitable and boasts a strong capital base, Converium is still rated triple-B by most rating agencies, a level deemed too low for a reinsurer to do bulk business.

However, Converium expects an upgrade to the crucial A-level later this year once an industrywide probe by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission is expected to be finalized. Such a step wouldn't just boost its share price but also likely help spur premium growth and profitability, analysts said.

Vulcan To Acquire Florida Rock (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

Making a long-term wager on the now-faltering construction markets in the U.S. Sunbelt region, Vulcan Materials Co. yesterday said it agreed to acquire Florida Rock Industries Inc. in a cash and stock deal valued at about $4.6 billion.

Florida Rock makes construction aggregates such as concrete and distributes gravel and sand.

The total blended cash and stock consideration of $68.03 a share, based on the 4 p.m. price of Vulcan Materials' stock Friday of $111.81 a share, represents a premium of 45% for Florida Rock shareholders based on the company's own 4 p.m. Friday stock price of $46.96. The price is only slightly above Florida Rock's 52-week-high of $66.10.

In an interview, Vulcan Chief Executive Officer Donald M. James said the combined company's largest market will be in public infrastructure, such as highways. That said, "we are not afraid of the residential market. We recognize there is a correction going on. This is an opportune time for Vulcan to make a transaction."

Florida Rock's shares have fallen 17% over the past year, as investors feared booming growth in Florida would taper off as part of a nationwide real-estate slowdown.

"It's a cyclical business," noted Florida Rock CEO John D. Baker. "Housing markets clearly got ahead of themselves, and we're going to see a correction. It may take three months or it may take six months."

He noted, however, that "Florida is going to come back. Florida is looking to when the first baby boomer turns 65 in a year or two. Long term that's a great thing, and that's what Vulcan saw" in making the deal.

Vulcan is based in Birmingham, Ala., while Florida Rock has its headquarters in Jacksonville, Fla.

DOJ_NMG_0133832

The deal, which should close in mid-2007, is expected to be neutral to Vulcan Materials' earnings this year and accretive next year and beyond.

Vulcan Materials said it anticipates annual pretax cost synergies of about $50 million and expects the combined company to have aggregate reserves totaling about 13.9 billion tons.

Goldman Sachs Group Inc. and Wachtell, Lipton, Rosen & Katz acted as financial and legal advisers to Vulcan Materials. Lazard Ltd. and law firms Weil, Gotshal & Manges LLP and McGuireWoods LLP advised Florida Rock.

Apple Gets More Time To Answer IPhone Suit (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

Apple Inc. was granted more time to respond to Cisco Systems Inc.'s claim that its new iPhone mobile handset infringes on a Cisco trademark. Cisco said it agreed to give Apple until tomorrow to file its legal response in the case. The San Jose, Calif., networking company said Apple asked for a second extension after the initial extension ended Thursday, and Cisco complied. Cisco filed suit in U.S. District Court in San Francisco on Jan. 10, arguing the Cupertino, Calif., maker of electronic products and computers infringed on a trademark Cisco obtained in 2000 with its acquisition of Infogear Technology Corp. Cisco markets a phone with the iPhone name through its Linksys division. Apple has called the suit "silly" and says that other products also use the iPhone name, but the companies have been trying to resolve the issue through negotiations.

Supreme Court To Rule On US Patent Law (FT)

By Patti Waldmeir In Washington

Financial Times, February 20, 2007

The Supreme Court will on Wednesday test the global reach of US patent law, in a case that could have big implications for new technology industries such as software and biotechnology.

The case concerns whether Microsoft should be liable for damages overseas for infringing a software patent owned by AT&T for the manufacture of synthetic speech. It will test the extraterritorial application of US patent law in the information age at a time when courts around the world are struggling to apply national laws to increasingly globalised economic activity.

However, the court is also being urged to use the case to look at a much bigger issue: the scope of what can be patented in the first place, including software. If the court takes up that issue – a move that is far from guaranteed – it could make an even bigger impact on US patents and incentives for innovation.

The software group and the telecommunications company have hired powerful lawyers to fight this battle whilst a wide range of high-tech, biotech and other corporations, as well as the US government, have joined the legal battle by filing “friend of the court” briefs warning of the impact of the case on the future of US innovation.

The federal appeals court that heard the Microsoft case gave US patent law a very broad reach but the Supreme Court may take a more narrow view, giving high-tech companies more protection against patent lawsuits based on exports.

AT&T won a claim that Microsoft infringed its -patent by including its technology in the Windows operating systems installed in computers built in the US. This case tests whether Microsoft must also pay when it sends Windows versions including the AT&T technology overseas for installation in -foreign-made computers.

The dispute centres on a law aimed at preventing companies from circumventing US patent law by shipping “components” overseas for assembly. The case tests whether software is such a “component” and whether creating copies of software overseas from a master disk shipped from the US is covered by that law.

The case will be heard at a time of unprecedented up-heaval in the patent system. The Supreme Court is expected to rule shortly in a case that could set new standards for when an inventions is deemed too obvious to warrant a patent. Congress is also planning substantial legislative reforms.

The Virtue Of Patents (WSJ)

By Laura Peter

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

There is a large risk that Congress may deform the patent system rather than reform it. For in its quest to modernize the antiquated and underfunded system for protecting our inventions, Congress has trotted out an easy target -- so-called "patent trolls" -- to justify changes that would stifle innovation, benefiting large technology companies at the expense of smaller ones.

"Patent trolls" are typically companies that buy patent rights from inventors, then receive royalties from other companies who actually use the patents. Inventors get either a single payment, or a share of the royalties. In some cases trolls (like other patent owners) must go to court to enforce their patents; and like any group, some of them use abusive litigation against large technology companies in the hopes of extorting settlements.

But large technology companies often "troll" themselves, using their own portfolio of thousands (if not tens of thousands) of patents to sue smaller firms financially unable to defend themselves. And when the claims are unmerited or frivolous, this is a rather convenient way to stifle competition.

Thus, it is right to end frivolous trolling, but the right way is through narrow, targeted reform. Unfortunately, some reform proposals cast too wide a net, and would hurt small technology companies' ability to benefit from their own inventions.

First, Congress is considering proposals that would excessively limit the ability of small technology companies to amend pending patent applications known as "continuation" patents. These patents, however, are a primary way that emerging technology companies protect themselves. One invention can actually consist of tens of smaller inventions, but it can be prohibitively costly for an emerging company to file patents covering all of them; and sometimes the potential value of a component invention is not apparent until a market develops later. Thus, limiting these patents too much would just reward copycats with resources, and not the innovators.

Second, Congress is considering greatly expanding the ability of large technology companies to challenge smaller companies' patents even after they are issued. As a witness testified, a cheaper, faster alternative to litigation for challenging the validity of patents would help eliminate the need to pay for many licenses -- this, however, is wrongheaded. Already, well-funded companies have proved their willingness to pile multiple challenges in multiple proceedings on smaller firms.

Currently, for example, a large company can challenge a patent both in court and with the federal Patent Office, forcing a small firm to fight on two fronts. Adding yet another battlefront would simply hurt smaller firms, who are often pushed to the brink of bankruptcy defending their rights, without ensuring greater justice.

Finally, these and other proposed reforms would materially increase the costs of filing for patents. This could devastate emerging companies which pour all of their resources into the tools and people needed to turn their ideas into products. They often are not patent-savvy, or cannot afford the huge expense of filing good patents.

To fully appreciate how vulnerable emerging companies can be, keep in mind that patents can cost anywhere from $5,000, to $50,000. In Silicon Valley, the price for a good-quality patent is about $12,000. Does it seem absurd that these relatively small sums could stand in the way of emerging companies? Ask yourself whether Don Hewlett or Steve Jobs could have afforded the patents necessary to protect themselves if their filing and litigation costs surged at the same time a larger company sent lawyers to their garage doors.

By weakening the patent system, Congress would harm the ability for smaller companies to benefit from their innovations. If they cannot reap these benefits, they will not have the money to invest in commercializing their innovations and bringing them to market. And, without that money, they will be unable to invest in other new products and technology, meaning that innovation could become the purview of a few large companies with big budgets.

There is, however, a reason why so many advances come from garages, living rooms and basements -- large companies do not have as much freedom to pursue creativity to where it might lead them. Emerging companies, however, often begin as research and development firms who only later try to generate revenue to help them reach the critical mass so that they can become true manufacturers.

So, when you hear about patent trolls, think of Segway (inventors of the two-wheeled, self-balancing transportation device), think of Andre Pavel (the inventor of the Walkman personal stereo), and yes, think of H-P and Apple decades ago. They each were at the forefront cutting-edge technology and had to defend and assert their patents to become what they are today.

Ms. Peter is general counsel of Immersion Corporation and recently served on a judicial committee on patent litigation reform in Texas.

Neutrality On The Net Gets High '08 Profile (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

Bloggers and other Internet activists made their marks in the past two presidential elections chiefly by building networks of political enthusiasts and raising money for candidates. Now, they are pushing aggressively into policymaking -- and not just over high-profile issues such as Iraq.

They are pressing candidates to back a handful of issues that are obscure to many Americans but vital to those who base their livelihoods on the Internet and track its development.

Armed with massive e-mail lists and high-speed networks, these activists are bypassing the familiar campaign tactics of door-knocking and phone-banking. They are also using their new-age technologies for an old-fashioned purpose: making politicians take note of their legislative priorities.

One of those is "net neutrality." Hardly a household term, it has no overtly partisan or ideological dimensions. Yet it is shaping up as a Democratic issue this year, largely because its most fervid advocates are liberal bloggers and other Internet activists who play a big role in the early stages of choosing a Democratic presidential nominee.

Unlike their Republican counterparts, every major Democratic presidential candidate has endorsed net neutrality. The move keeps them in good standing with powerful grass-roots groups, such as MoveOn.org, and costs them little in return -- perhaps a bit of space on campaign Web sites to promote a matter that comparatively few voters might explore.

Net neutrality is a principle that bars Internet providers, primarily phone and cable companies, from charging higher rates to Web-based firms in return for giving their content priority treatment on the pathways to consumers. Without such restrictions, proponents say, a user might find it time-consuming, or even impossible, to call up a favorite site that carriers have relegated to slower lanes for economic or even philosophical reasons.

"It's an issue that really captures the attention of one of their core constituencies, especially the bloggers and 'netroots,' " said Craig Aaron of Free Press, a group that champions net neutrality. "For candidates looking to appeal to those folks, it was important to take a stand," he said, even though "nobody was talking about it a year ago."

A veteran Democratic consultant who spoke on condition of anonymity was more blunt. Among Democratic candidates, she said, "if you're not for net neutrality, then the blogs will kick your" rear. The grass-roots groups that strongly favor it are relatively small but very noisy, she said, "and you just don't want to have to deal with that."

Opposing net neutrality are the telephone and cable companies that control the "pipes" that transport Internet content from producers to users. The companies say they need flexibility to manage Internet traffic, even if it eventually means charging higher rates for priority service.

For several years, the issue has been debated mainly in legal and telecom circles. Recent telecom mergers have raised its profile, however, as regulators considered the possible ramifications of consolidating control over the Internet's major pathways.

Net neutrality restrictions "could prevent broadband providers from offering enhanced levels of service for specialized applications such a telemedicine, or to offer their own branded or co-branded products or services," said Christopher Wolf, co-chairman of Hands Off the Internet, a group sponsored by phone and cable companies . Such arrangements, he said at a recent Federal Trade Commission workshop, "will help pay for the build-out of the next generation of Internet pipes."

Moreover, Wolf said, his industry's critics cannot cite an example in which any U.S. user has been blocked.

But some groups that rely heavily on their Web sites to share information, raise money or promote causes say they fear it's only a matter of time. They cite, for example, a 2005 comment by William L. Smith, then chief technology officer for BellSouth, which has merged with AT&T, that Internet service providers should be able to charge a firm such as Yahoo for the opportunity to have its search site load faster than Google's site.

Last spring, the debate over net neutrality barely scratched the consciousness of Congress, let alone the general public, after a House subcommittee defeated an effort to add net-neutrality restrictions to a multi-faceted telecommunications bill. The 23 to 8 vote goaded more than 850 interest groups, many, but not all, politically left of center, to form a coalition called SavetheInternet.com.

Members included organizations such as Common Cause and the American Civil Liberties Union, but the name that really grabbed the attention of Democratic officials was MoveOn.org. The group, founded in 1998 to oppose the impeachment of President Bill Clinton, rocked the political establishment in 2003 and 2004 with its ability to rally supporters and raise money for causes such as opposing the Iraq war.

With MoveOn.org urging its 3 million members to sign and deliver pro-net-neutrality petitions to senators last spring, congressional support began to grow. The net-neutrality language died in an 11 to 11 Senate committee vote, but its backers claimed a moral victory after a wide-ranging telecom bill, which lacked their amendment, eventually collapsed.

The debate's partisan nature has surprised and disappointed some advocates, who note that conservative groups such as the Christian Coalition of America and the Gun Owners of America are part of the SavetheInternet coalition. The Christian Coalition of America, in its policy statement, said net neutrality is "extremely important to America's grassroots organizations and those Americans who want to ensure the cable and phone companies controlling access to the Internet will not discriminate against groups like Christian Coalition of America." Michele Combs, a spokeswoman for the Christian Coalition of America, said that net neutrality is a nonpartisan matter and that "the conservative side has not been educated on the issue."

MoveOn.org officials agree that net neutrality should transcend political lines. "There's a growing online people-powered movement that has increasing relevance in our politics," said Adam Green, a spokesman for MoveOn.org. "An issue like net neutrality, which directly taps into Internet issues, . . . could have a special energy in the political season," he said. "Every Republican and Democrat who uses the Internet is threatened by corporations that want to control which Web sites people can access."

Global-warming Theory And The Eugenics Precedent (WT)

By John Linder, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 19, 2007

"Global Warming" had a precursor in capturing the hearts and minds of the world. Michael Crichton, in his novel "State of Fear," brilliantly juxtaposes the world's current political embrace of "global warming" with the popular embrace of the "science" of eugenics a century ago. For nearly 50 years, from the late 1800s through the first half of the 20th century, there grew a common political acceptance by the world's thinkers, political leaders and media elite that the "science" of eugenics was settled science. There were a few lonely voices trying to be heard in the wilderness in opposition to this bogus science, but they were ridiculed or ignored.

Believers in eugenics argued that we could improve the human race by controlling reproduction. The most respected scientists from Harvard, Yale, Princeton and other bastions of intellectual rigor retreated to a complex on Long Island named Cold Spring Harbor. Their support came from the Ford Foundation, the Rockefeller Foundation and the Harriman fortune working with the U.S. Departments of Agriculture, State and other agencies.

The "science" was not lacking important public supporters. Theodore Roosevelt, Winston Churchill and Woodrow Wilson were enthusiastic believers. The theory won approval of Supreme Court justices, leaders in higher education and Nobel Prize winners. The founder of Planned Parenthood, Margaret Sanger, was one of the most vocal adherents. She established the first "birth control" clinic in 1916.

They believed that "the best" human beings were not having as many children as inferior ones -- the foreigners, immigrants, Jews, Blacks, degenerates, the unfit and the "feeble minded." Sanger said "fostering the good-for-nothing at the expense of the good is an extreme cruelty." She spoke of the burden of caring for "this dead weight of human waste." H.G. Wells spoke against "ill-trained swarms of inferior citizens." Roosevelt said, "Society has no business to permit degenerates to reproduce their kind." George Bernard Shaw said that only eugenics could save mankind.

Twenty-nine states passed laws allowing sterilization. Ultimately, 60,000 Americans were sterilized -- some legally. The Germans were the most progressive. They had help. The Rockefeller Foundation funded the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute and the work of its central racial scientists, one of whom was Josef Mengele.

Ultimately the "mental defectives" in Germany were brought to newly built houses where they were interviewed. They were then shown to a back room where they were gassed. Eventually the German program was expanded into a vast network that killed 10 million undesirables. After World War II many of the public adherents to the pseudoscience of eugenics went silent. Colleges removed the textbooks and stopped teaching it.

But not everyone went away. As recently as July 24, 2003 Tony Platt testified before the California Senate Judiciary Committee on S.R. 20 relative to eugenics. He agreed that the state should apologize for its actions.

One must ask, "How in the world did university researchers come to conclusions that defended this outrageous affront to society?" A look back at the research concluded that the researchers adjusted their outcomes to support the theory of those paying for the research. This is not unusual. It is very easy to believe that the settled science regarding climate change is just as suspicious, and indeed may be another example of pseudo-science capturing the imagination of politicians, actors and the media elite who have a desperate need to embrace some "science" which may force us to change the way we live our lives. H. L. Mencken once wrote, "The urge to save humanity is almost always a false front for the urge to rule it." We see pictures of huge blocks of ice crashing into the sea from the Antarctic Peninsula, which comprises about 2 percent of the continent. The fact that the remaining 98 percent of Antarctica is growing by 26.8 gigatons of ice per year is ignored.

We are told today that human activity is causing a dramatic increase in carbon dioxide levels that is responsible for "global warming." While a congressional delegation was visiting the Antarctic expedition in January of 2003 we were shown the results of the Vostok ice-sheet cores where temperatures and CO2 levels were measured as far as 400,000 years ago. At that time, the level of CO2 was 280 parts per million parts of atmosphere (ppm), about what it was 20 years ago. The levels of CO2 and temperature rode up and down in consonance over 400,00 years. "Who," I asked, "was burning the fossil fuels 400,000 years ago?" I was treated as though I was rude.

It has been known for years that most CO2 is dissolved in the oceans. It is called "carbon sinking." The oceans typically contain 60 times as much CO2 as the atmosphere. It is also known that colder waters dissolve more CO2 than warm waters. Which do you think is cause and which is effect? We currently have CO2 levels of about 380 ppm. A recent study completed at UC Davis concluded that the amount of CO2 in the atmosphere 300 million years ago was on the order of 2,000 ppm. Then this,

"the same increase that experts expect by the end of this century as remaining reserves of fossil fuels are burned." If it is a given that human burning of fossil fuels is what will cause an increase of CO2 levels up to 2,000 ppm in the next 93 years, don't they owe us an explanation as to who burned those fossil fuels 300 million years ago? In fact we are being treated to a modern scientific shell game. The most prevalent and efficient greenhouse gas is not CO2; it is water vapor, which accounts for about 60 percent of the heat-trapping gases while CO2 accounts for about 26 percent. So, why are we being served a daily diet of our destroying the environment with our behavior as it relates to CO2? Because our behavior has little to do with the amount of water vapor, so it is a non-starter when it comes to those whose principal goal is ruling our lives.

In order to focus on you and what you are doing to increase the CO2 in the atmosphere, which, as everyone knows will destroy the globe, we do not discuss the activities of termites. Fifteen years ago it was estimated that the digestive tracts of termites produce about 50 billion tons of CO2 and methane annually. That was more than the world's production from burning fossil fuel. Additionally, cattle, horses and other ruminant animals are huge producers of both CO2 and methane, but, being unable to respond to our demands on this issue, their activity is ignored.

When it comes to methane, another greenhouse gas, termites are responsible for 11 percent of the world's production from natural sources. Seventy-six percent comes from wetlands, which provide habitat conducive to bacteria, which produce 145 million metric tons of methane per year during the decomposition of organic material. It is curious that the very alarmists on climate change are alarmists on saving and increasing wetlands.

It becomes clear from the literature -- not to mention documentary films -- produced by the alarmists, that if human beings do not change the way we live the planet is doomed. This is not the first charge against human behavior. Many of you will remember the "scientific" studies 30 years ago about the destruction of the ozone layer, particularly at the poles, that would reduce the atmosphere's ability to stop infrared rays from the sun. We would see increasing incidence of skin cancer and increasing temperatures. It was theorized that this was caused by the increased production of chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs) that were used -- as Freon -- in refrigeration units.

When Freon was invented it was considered a miracle gas. It replaced, in refrigeration units, a combination of toxic gases that, if released, actually killed people. But the settled science concluded that human activity was a threat to the planet. We outlawed the production of CFCs and thousands of people across the world died from eating rancid food due to the loss of refrigeration.

The world's production of CFCs peaked at 1.1 million tons per year. If 100 percent of that was released it would have added 750,000 tons of chlorine into the atmosphere. That is insignificant compared to the 300 million tons the oceans yield annually by the evaporation of seawater alone. But that couldn't be controlled so the alarmists went after us.

Indeed, the eruption of Mt. Pinatubo in June of 1991 produced some of the highest levels of chlorine and bromines in history and led to some of the lowest ozone levels ever recorded. You would not know that today. The earth survived.

Today, if there is a settled science, it is adduced by climatologists who have been observing and studying the world for decades. Many are retired and not seeking government grants for research and thus not inclined to reach outcomes that are politically popular. Most have been through more than one alarmist cycle of doom. The predictions by scientists in Time magazine's "Another Ice Age?" in 1974 and Newsweek's "The Cooling World" in 1975 come to mind. The latter article stated that scientists "are almost unanimous in the view that the trend will reduce agricultural productivity for the rest of the century. If the climactic change is as profound as some of the pessimists fear, the resulting famines could be catastrophic."

But wise old heads believe that we are going through normal cycles of heating and cooling that we have seen over hundreds of millions of years as the earth heats and cools when the activity of the sun changes. The earth is heated by the sun. The sun is impacted by magnetic forces creating outbursts called sunspots, which increase the heat it imparts. During the coldest period in the Little Ice Age, which ended near the end of the 19th century, sunspots almost completely disappeared for 70 years. The earth cooled. Sunspot activity has been declining for a number of years and is expected decline by 40 percent over the next decade. The world is about to enter a cooling period. Be prepared to change your lifestyle.

Scientist Group Warns Of Warming 'Threat' (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 19, 2007

The board of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, the nation's leading general science organization, yesterday issued a consensus statement declaring global climate change "a growing threat to society."

The statement, released at a town hall meeting of school teachers in San Francisco, marked the first time that the board of the influential AAAS, publisher of the journal Science, has taken a stand on global warming. AAAS held its annual meeting there over the weekend and organized the town hall on climate change, along with the California Science Teachers Association, the National Science Teachers Association and the United Educators of San Francisco, a union group.

The board's statement attributes Earth's recent warming to human activity, noting: "The atmospheric concentration of carbon dioxide, a critical greenhouse gas, is higher than it has been for at least 650,000 years. The average temperature of the Earth is heading for levels not experienced for millions of years."

The board called for "rapidly reducing greenhouse gas emissions," warning: "Delaying action to address climate change will increase the environmental and societal consequences as well as the costs."

It was the second high-profile statement on the issue in recent weeks: Last month, the United States Climate Action Partnership, a coalition of major companies and environmental groups, called for a mandatory cap on U.S. greenhouse gas emissions in order to curb further global warming. On Tuesday, the Global Roundtable on Climate Change, a coalition of European and U.S. firms such as Air France, Alcoa and Florida Power & Light, chaired by Columbia University professor Jeffrey Sachs, plans to announce a worldwide framework for addressing climate change.

AAAS President John Holdren, a professor of environmental policy at Harvard University, has also publicly backed federal limits on carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases.

"As droughts, heat waves, floods wildfires and severe storms intensify, damages to ecosystems and human society are growing apace," Holdren, who also directs the Woods Hole Research Center, a research and policy analysis institute in Massachusetts, wrote in a letter to the attendees.

The association aired a video at the town hall focusing on the 600 residents of Shishmaref, Alaska, who live on the shores of the Arctic Ocean and are facing beach erosion and thinning ice. Ken Stenek, a science teacher in Shishmaref who attended the session, said the 4,000-year-old Inupiaq village where he lives has been transformed by rising temperatures.

Susanne Moser, a research scientist at the National Center for Atmospheric Research, said the statement by the society reflected scientists' increasing focus on the question of global warming.

"In some sense, it's a continuation of the confirming and reaffirming and underlining of the consensus of mainstream science on climate change," Moser said. "It's really strengthening the case and political momentum" for cutting greenhouse gas emissions.

AAAS also issued at the meeting a teaching guide to global climate change. Teachers said it would help them better educate children about the scientific basis for global warming, since the information on the subject is evolving so quickly.

With New Pipeline Plan, Alaska's Governor Enters Precarious Territory (NYT)

By William Yardley

The New York Times, February 19, 2007

JUNEAU, Alaska, Feb. 15 — The new administration of Gov. Sarah Palin has been full of firsts. Ms. Palin, a Republican, is Alaska's first female governor and, at 42, its youngest.

She held her inauguration in frosty Fairbanks, a first that suited her conservative supporters but slighted the traditional host, this rainy, remote and less Republican state capital. She also appears to be the only governor in history whose spouse is a champion snowmobile racer and a former Arctic oil worker, and is widely referred to as First Dude.

Now, two months after taking office, Ms. Palin wants to become the first Alaska governor to deliver what many others have sought without success: construction of a $30 billion pipeline to transport natural gas from the state's North Slope to markets in the lower 48 states.

It is an enormous project that could strengthen Alaska's energy-based economy for decades to come, while also, according to some estimates, supplying 7 percent of the nation's natural gas annually.

But pulling off this first is shaping up to be more complicated.

Elected by a wide margin after promising to bring "new energy" and "transparency" to the pipeline project, Ms. Palin took office in December and immediately backed away from the negotiations that her predecessor, Frank H. Murkowski, had been pursuing with the three major energy companies that control much of the land where gas would be developed.

Ms. Palin has long criticized those negotiations as back-room dealings whose extensive incentives and tax breaks would have benefited the energy companies, BP, Exxon Mobil and ConocoPhillips, far more than they would have Alaska.

"Don't get me started," she said in an interview in her Capitol office on Thursday.

So next month, Ms. Palin intends to introduce the Alaska Gasline Inducement Act, a bill that would open the bidding to new players, as well as the old ones. She says her plan would ensure new jobs and access to gas for state residents. She also says that whoever gets to control the pipeline must allow for its potential expansion so that other gas developers can use it at reasonable prices, thus encouraging more development.

The new plan, however, would delay a formal agreement until next year at the earliest, and it would be another decade, until 2018, before the pipeline was in operation.

Ms. Palin won votes last fall for vowing to take just such steps, but in taking them, she has stirred concern beyond Alaska at a time when the Bush administration says it wants to develop new sources of energy.

In a report to Congress last month, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission said "the schedule for an Alaska gas pipeline has slipped considerably." The state's senior senator, Ted Stevens, a Republican famous for bringing big projects home, has openly expressed worry.

And on Tuesday, Rex W. Tillerson, the chairman and chief executive of Exxon Mobil, one of the companies that hopes to build the pipeline, said: "I don't really know where we are. I don't think it looks like Alaska knows where it wants to go, either."

Ms. Palin dismissed that talk. But next week, when she attends a National Governors Association meeting in Washington, she plans to visit Alaska's Congressional delegation and meet with officials at Exxon Mobil and the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, among others. Besides putting minds at ease, she said, she wants to broaden the appeal of the project with the goal of gaining leverage in negotiations.

"This project is so much bigger than Alaska and Alaska's interests," Ms. Palin said. "This is for the nation. This is to supply domestically safe sources of fuel. We're going to be able to do that. We should be leading in a national energy plan."

The report by the energy commission suggested just such thinking, although it had a more urgent tone than in earlier assessments and sprinkled in some skepticism.

"The main obstacle to progress on an Alaskan gas pipeline is the failure to resolve state issues necessary before a project sponsor will commit to go forward," the report said. "The fresh competitive approach announced by the new governor must be successful if Alaska gas is to be part of the nation's energy supply solution in the coming years."

Steve Rinehart, a spokesman for BP Exploration Alaska, which controls the most land in the area expected to be developed first, said that with natural gas prices projected to stay relatively high and oil production on the North Slope declining, "the time has come to bring that gas to market."

"It makes sense economically," Mr. Rinehart said. "It makes sense for the life of this oil field."

But in the past, aides to Ms. Palin said, the big energy companies refused to commit to expanding the pipeline or to allow outside companies to use it for reasonable fees.

Mr. Rinehart disagreed. "We were ready to address those issues," he said, "but the process stopped."

Critical to pushing a plan through is the state's 60-member, Republican-controlled Legislature. Mr. Murkowski, a former United States senator, clashed with state lawmakers over his pipeline plan through his final days in office. Ms. Palin, by contrast, has echoed their concerns about giving away too much in tax breaks to the energy companies.

"What the governor has is a lot of credibility with the public," said State Representative John Harris, the speaker of the House. "She's been a breath of fresh air, in my opinion."

Lyda Green, president of the Senate, said Ms. Palin came to office without the intimate knowledge of the energy and financial industries that Mr. Murkowski had. But "she's a very quick study," Ms. Green said. "She has good people around her."

Ms. Palin has brought back some top staff members who left in protest over how Mr. Murkowski had been conducting the pipeline negotiations. Now she wants them to help her complete the deal that Mr. Murkowski never could.

"We are crafting this whole process with our arms open, even for Exxon," Ms. Palin said. "Come on in and let us know what you have in terms of a proposal to commercialize Alaska's natural gas."

Environment: What Are You Doing Here? (NSWK)

By Richard Wolffe

Newsweek, February 19, 2007

He heads Treasury, not the EPA, but Hank Paulson is investing time in making this White House greener.

Judging by the photos on the walls of his vast office, the new Treasury secretary has a gentler approach to the world than, say, Vice President Dick Cheney. While Cheney likes to hunt small birds with a shotgun, Hank Paulson shoots them with a camera. Photos of unusual birds—Paulson's vacation pictures, taken by his wife—hang above Bloomberg computer terminals feeding the latest Wall Street data to his desk. "If you look around here," he tells NEWSWEEK, gesturing at his photos, "I have spent a huge percentage of my time off in beautiful places, outdoor places, saving the land, wilderness, parks ... Conservation is my passion."

Paulson is a rare species inside the Bush administration. Environmentalists see this White House as a bastion of backward thinking; Bush has angered them (and America's allies) by sometimes questioning the science of global warming. Yet Paulson cares deeply about climate change: during his seven-year run as chairman and CEO of Goldman Sachs, the investment bank issued a policy paper backing the science on warming and promoting investment in alternative energy.

In recent months Paulson has played a leading role in the administration's debate about energy—and he's had an impact on environmental policy. It was Paulson who encouraged the former oil executives in the West Wing to embrace ambitious targets to cut by 20 percent the amount of gas Americans are forecast to consume by 2017 (part of the plan outlined in Bush's State of the Union). White House officials portray the policy as a team effort, but identify Paulson as a driver. "He was very involved in the energy proposal," says a senior White House official, who declined to be named while talking about the internal debate.

Paulson had an expansive view of his job almost as soon as he started in June. By August he had identified energy security as one of his priorities, as well as Social Security reform and trade with China. A small team began working on ideas outside traditional Treasury business—some of them so politically sensitive that the team feared they might leak out before the November elections. Among them: putting a floor on the price of oil to subsidize alternative fuels. White House and Treasury officials deemed that idea too costly to administer—and out of line with GOP ideology. So Paulson's team worked with Bush's economic aides and the Department of Energy to head in a new direction: setting higher standards for fuel efficiency and alternatives like ethanol to spur new technologies. But there was some pushback. Bush's aides were concerned about the impact these proposals would have on a weakened Detroit, since higher-mileage standards favor foreign rivals. The solution was to allow for variable efficiency standards by car size.

Environmental groups were disappointed that Paulson didn't persuade Bush to wage a war against global warming. But the goal of using more alternative fuels and raising auto efficiency is still a significant change for an administration whose vice president once pooh-poohed conservation as "a sign of personal virtue." (Cheney's policy request: that the strategic petroleum reserve be doubled during the next 20 years.) Even green advocates concede there are some positive steps in the new strategy. "They are apparently serious about raising fuel-economy standards, and that is the most meaningful thing in the plan," says Dave Hamilton, director of global warming and energy programs at the Sierra Club.

To Paulson, the new energy strategy succeeds by giving something to just about everyone—even if green activists aren't totally thrilled. "Some people's expectations got so high they thought it was going to solve all the environmental problems, energy security, it was going to encompass everything, and they were disappointed," he says. "This policy has got some important positives for the environment, but they are collateral." Paulson may be an avid bird watcher, but while he's working for President Bush, he's keeping his head out of the clouds.

Mr. Spitzer's Chance On Warming (NYT)

Given the concerns of the new Democratic Congress, as well as persuasive new scientific evidence of the dangers of climate change, Washington may finally be ready to address the problem of global warming. The chances of that would be better still if New York's new governor, Eliot Spitzer, would commit himself and the state to a cause that needs all the friends it can get.

Mr. Spitzer should quickly commit himself to establishing ambitious goals for reducing emissions of carbon dioxide from cars, power plants and other industrial sources in New York State, and to writing regulations to achieve those goals. That will mean butting heads with powerful constituencies like the utilities, but Mr. Spitzer has always enjoyed a good fight. And with California's governor, Arnold Schwarzenegger, already committed, Mr. Spitzer's intervention could tip the national debate and compel Washington to move more quickly than it might have to endorse meaningful federal legislation.

California has pointed the way. In October it became the first state to mandate reductions of greenhouse gas emissions from every sector of the economy. The plan calls for reducing such emissions to 1990 levels by 2020, with a longer-range goal of an 80 percent reduction by 2050. A state law already requires automobile companies to begin producing more fuel-efficient cars. And in January, Mr. Schwarzenegger ordered refineries and other fuel producers to reduce emissions by 10 percent, largely through the development of alternative fuels. California has also warned that it will stop buying electricity from power producers outside the state that produce heavy carbon dioxide emissions.

This would be a hard act to follow for any governor, but to some extent Mr. Spitzer's path has already been smoothed by his predecessor, George Pataki. Mr. Pataki joined with California in demanding more fuel-efficient cars and increased funds for energy-efficiency programs, and he directed that by 2013 one-quarter of New York's power must be produced by renewable fuels. And — perhaps most important — Mr. Pataki enrolled New York in an effort to reduce regional greenhouse gas emissions involving seven Northeastern states.

Mr. Spitzer, who built a formidable environmental record of his own as attorney general, has endorsed all of these programs. But he will have to go further if he intends to match Mr. Schwarzenegger. Among other things, he must help get the regional greenhouse initiative up and running, and make sure that any new power plants built to meet the state's energy needs use the most modern technologies and add as little as possible to the atmosphere's already heavy carbon burden.

This is a tall order even for an aggressive new governor. But the good news is that most of what Mr. Spitzer must do can be accomplished by executive order, thus skirting an unadventurous Legislature that tends to prefer business as usual.

Informal Survey Shows Shops Have Halted Sales Of Paraphernalia (ESG)

Elmira Star-Gazette, February 20, 2007

A crackdown on retail stores selling products that might be used in conjunction with illegal drugs in the city of Elmira appeared to be having an impact Monday.

In an informal survey by the Star-Gazette on Monday of seven city convenience and variety stores, only one offered an item that probably has no other use than for inhaling illegal drugs.

Last Friday, Elmira Police Chief W. Scott Drake III and a member of the United States Drug Enforcement Administration visited five businesses in the city that were found to be selling drug paraphernalia, including crack and methamphetamine pipes, scales and drug packaging materials.

The businesses had been visited on Jan. 24 and asked to voluntarily stop selling the items. Four of the five businesses were still selling the materials Friday.

Those businesses were put on notice that it is a violation of federal law to sell drug paraphernalia, and they were told that if they continued, they would be subject to arrest and the seizure of their businesses.

The crackdown was part of Operation Halt, the city's broad effort to reduce and eliminate drug trafficking and drug-related crime.

"We won't hesitate to go after them with the full force of local, state and federal laws," Drake said in a news release.

The five stores allegedly involved haven't been publicly identified. But the stores surveyed Monday by the Star-Gazette were both privately owned variety stores and chain convenience stores.

Some clerks said they had never sold such items as cigar wrappers and rose pipes while others said they once did, but have removed all such items from their shelves.

Those who said they had removed drug-related paraphernalia said they did so at the request of the police because they didn't want to risk breaking any laws.

Rose pipes are an item that cost less than $2 that purports to be a gift item of a miniature flower sealed by foil in a cylindrical glass tube. However, police said its only use is for inhaling illegal drugs like crack cocaine and meth.

None of the seven stores visited Monday had so-called drug starter kits -- common items like scales and small sealed plastic bags.

"The chief and his command staff deserve a lot of credit," Elmira Mayor John Tonello said Monday night. "They have made a huge impact in a short amount of time."

Tonello said he is also impressed with the citizens and business involvement in reporting suspicious activity on the new police tip-line.

The Elmira Police Department's new anonymous tip line, (607) 271-HALT (4258), has fielded 53 calls since its debut Jan. 24 as part of the drug control effort.

"By using 271-HALT, citizens are helping us crack down on crime," Drake said. "We're off to a great start."

It's an idea that appeals to regular citizens who want to help improve their communities.

"To me, drugs are the scourge of the world," said Penelope Patros, 77, of Elmira, who thinks Operation Halt is worth a try.

Criminal Organizations Using The Internet To Recruit, Rob (ABC)

By PIERRE THOMAS, JACK DATE And NITYA VENKATARAMAN

ABC News, February 19, 2007

Feb. 19, 2007 — Imagine being a prisoner in your own neighborhood.

That's how Wichita, Kan., police Chief Norman Williams describes communities struggling with the unexpected and emerging epidemic of gang violence in U.S. cities.

Watch Part 1 of Pierre Thomas' two-part series on gangs tonight on "World News with Charles Gibson."

"They feel that there is no way out, that there's no hope, and so they just have to live with it. It has a tremendous impact on quality of life in a in a neighborhood," Williams said of those communities.

Williams says that there's a new generation of gang members, and that they're starting as young as ages 11 to 14.

"The concerns you have with that generation is they do not have a criminal history. And so because they do not have a criminal history, we don't have a lot of information on them," Williams said.

Without that information, Williams says, members of the new gang generation will commit many crimes before they develop criminal records — acts that will instill fear and danger within many communities.

"What we're finding is a lot of our kids have no respect for life. They don't respect their life, and thereby they don't respect other peoples' lives. They think that the violence is like playing a video game. You turn it on and off. And it's not," he said.

Gang Recruitment Moves Online

According to a recent survey by the Justice Department, there are currently more than 21,000 gangs in the United States. Their membership is 700,000 strong and growing, and they're using the Internet to recruit members.

By posting online content that glorifies the thug lifestyle, gangs are using the Web to recruit — some using children as young as 8 years old as part of the online recruiting process, known as "Net Banging."

They sell drugs and guns, run car theft and prostitution rings, and use "bling" — money, cars, and jewelry — to entice troubled teens from poor neighborhoods, many with little or no family to speak of.

And the types of gangs fueling the country's surge in violence run the gamut: international gangs like MS-13, the Bloods and Crips, motorcycle gangs and local street gangs.

How Gangs Emerge

Chip Burress, assistant director of the FBI's Criminal Division, said, "It's not becoming an epidemic, it is an epidemic."

Burress says gang activity "starts small" with a handful of people who "begin to get a little more organized in their patterns of activity."

"They take control of territories and [they] recruit new members. They have to have some mechanism for making money, and usually that's in the drug trade, or the gang, or the firearms trade," Burress said.

"With that, you begin to get numbers," he said, "and you begin to get the type of traffic in an area that brings the standard of living down for the people that are living in that neighborhood."

An Inside Look at Gang Initiation

Undercover FBI video released to ABC News reveals footage from one gang initiation: a group of Bloods gathering with potential recruits in East Orange, N.J.

As their meeting began, the gang's leader, Tewhan Massacre Butler, preached to new recruits.

"I put my life on the line for y'all every day, every day," Butler says. "I am facing the rest of my life in prison for every one of y'all."

Some of the recruits in the video — many who appear to be teenagers — are eager to "bang," or join the Bloods.

"I am ready to bang it official," one recruit says.

"Ready to bang for the Blood here," says another.

To join, the initiates must endure an intense beating for at least 31 seconds.

The FBI says the Bloods in the video, known as the "Double II Set," were a particularly violent subset of the gang, murdering more than two dozen people over a three-year period.

FBI special agent "John," who targets the group, said one case in particular continued to haunt him.

"Right here, at this spot, a father was killed in front of his children," he said.

"He was killed trying to protect his son from becoming a member of the Bloods," the special agent said. "The man that killed him told another member of the Bloods, 'Take me to get my gun. I'm gonna show you how to murder somebody.'"

One of the challenges the FBI faced when dealing with the Bloods was that the gang was so open about violence that community members were terrified to come forward.

The FBI says it has dismantled that particular franchise of the Bloods. To date, 42 members have been convicted under federal racketeering laws. Though some communities have not been this lucky, in the last year there have been 500 fewer acts of violence on what had been the gang's turf.

The Federal System

The FBI's Burress says the benefit of having the FBI engaged is access to the federal prison system.

"Gang members who go away to local jails, or even state penitentiaries, go to places where they're not as uncomfortable. They go into structures in prisons that they're very comfortable with." Burress said.

Burress said: "With the federal system, what you get is that gang member's suddenly going to a prison far, far away in a structure where he or she's not comfortable in. As a result, we, I think we do a greater service to the community by putting these guys away in areas where they're not able to continue their criminal enterprise."

Scandal In Colombia Raises Skepticism On Capitol Hill (WP)

By Juan Forero, Washington Post Foreign Service
The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

BOGOTA, Colombia, Feb. 16 -- U.S. support for Colombia has been a foregone conclusion under the administration of President Ãlvaro Uribe, who was elected in 2002. But with a widening scandal tying the president's close supporters to paramilitary groups, policymakers on Capitol Hill say skepticism of Uribe's government is mounting, leading to closer scrutiny of a proposed aid package and free-trade agreement with the Andean nation.

On Thursday, Sen. Ãlvaro AraÃºjo Castro, the brother of Foreign Minister Maria Consuelo AraÃºjo, was arrested along with three other senators and a congressman. Authorities said they are investigating links that those lawmakers -- along with a sixth legislator who remains at large -- may have had ties to a paramilitary organization that has terrorized the country for years while shipping tons of cocaine to U.S. cities.

And Friday, the Supreme Court, which is heading a probe of Congress, announced that it would provide prosecutors with documentation to help determine whether the foreign minister's father, Ãlvaro AraÃºjo Noguera, had ties to paramilitary groups and participated in the kidnapping of a businessman. The foreign minister's cousin, Hernando Molina, governor of the state of Cesar, is also under investigation by authorities for allegedly collaborating with paramilitary groups to carry out killings and finance his campaign.

Uribe said he would stand fast behind his foreign minister in the midst of a scandal that has put eight congressmen behind bars and led to the questioning of dozens of national and local politicians. At a news conference Friday, Foreign Minister AraÃºjo told reporters, "I'm going to keep working with efficiency, honor, results and joy."

Officials in Washington said Uribe's support for the foreign minister would not help the Colombian government in its negotiations with U.S. lawmakers.

"The effects of what we call 'para-gate,' among Colombia followers in Congress, are that more and more folks are starting to get a bit skeptical regarding support, because there's a question of how far-reaching the relationship between the paramilitaries and the government officials is, vis-Ã -vis the president," a senior aide to a Republican senator said on condition of anonymity. "The confidence that we have in Uribe has been what's carried this for so long. That confidence has been brought into question."

Rep. Sander M. Levin (D-Mich.) said Colombian officials cannot count on easy passage of a free-trade agreement or military assistance, as is currently being provided under a program known as Plan Colombia.

"Colombia F.T.A. cannot pass the Congress, as constructed, and Plan Colombia is in more jeopardy because of these scandals, the infiltration of the paramilitary into the inner workings of the Colombian government," Levin said by telephone from Washington. "I voted for Plan Colombia, at least the first few times, but this is a very worrisome development."

Though lawmakers in Washington remain intensely focused on Iraq, it is not lost on policymakers that Colombia remains the biggest recipient of U.S. assistance outside of the Middle East and Afghanistan. Nearly $4.7 billion has been funneled to Colombia since Plan Colombia, an extensive aid package designed to defoliate coca and erode support for Marxist rebels, was instituted in 2000. The assistance has helped Colombia lower violence and tightened bonds between Bogota and Washington.

But Colombia continues to produce more than enough cocaine to meet world demand. And despite a highly touted demobilization that started in 2003, paramilitary groups still thrive, with shadowy new forces killing rivals, union leaders and peasants while battling guerrillas for control of the country's lucrative drug business. In the midst of this tumult, the Supreme Court and a team of prosecutors have begun to unearth extensive ties between paramilitary commanders and dozens of congressmen, regional politicians from coastal states and mid-level administration officials.

For Uribe, the scandal couldn't have come at a worse moment. He, Vice President Francisco Santos and Defense Minister Juan Manuel Santos have made recent trips to the United States to press for approval of a free-trade agreement and more assistance to help the state take control of an unruly countryside. In Colombia's latest proposal, Uribe and his cabinet say they want to spend $44 billion in the coming years -- a program that would rely on a heavy infusion of aid from Washington and European countries.

"The whole scandal and the fact that all of these people are close confidants of the president are really going to muddy the waters as they're looking at a free-trade agreement and a new aid package in a democratically controlled Congress," said Adam Isacson, who closely tracks U.S. aid to Colombia for the Center for International Policy in Washington. "The Colombian government has a rather big sales job ahead of it, and this makes it infinitely harder for them to do that sales job."

Vice President Santos, in an interview, said that the disclosures would never have come out if Uribe's government had not entered into negotiations with the paramilitary organizations, a process that he said not only led to a full-scale disarmament but emboldened institutions such as the Supreme Court to investigate authorities' paramilitary ties.

"We're going to deal with it openly, and confront reality and let the chips fall where they may," Santos said. "The most important thing is that we clearly present what we've done. The United States Congress should be totally calm about there being complete transparency here."

The Bush administration has reiterated its support for Uribe. "We remain committed to the free-trade agreement," Tom Casey, a State Department spokesman, told reporters in Washington. He added that the administration would continue to back anti-narcotics operations in Colombia.

But the latest disclosures have drawn heated criticism, from organizations such as Human Rights Watch and from some of Capitol Hill's more influential shapers of U.S. policy in Latin America, including Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), chairman of the Senate Appropriations foreign operations subcommittee.

"This confirms the concerns that many have had for a long time, that the paramilitaries have infiltrated the economic and political establishment of Colombian society," he said in a statement. "It should give us some pause as to who we are dealing with."

Police Needing Heavier Weapons (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

WASHINGTON — Law enforcement agencies across the country have been upgrading their firepower to deal with what they say is the increasing presence of high-powered weapons on the streets.

Scott Knight, chairman of the Firearms Committee of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, says an informal survey of about 20 departments revealed that since 2004 all of the agencies have either added weapons to officers' patrol units or have replaced existing weaponry with military-style arms.

Knight, police chief in Chaska, Minn., says the upgrades have occurred since a national ban on certain assault weapons expired in September 2004. The ban, passed in 1994, in part prohibited domestic gunmakers from producing semi-automatic weapons and ammunition dispensers holding more than 10 rounds.

"This (weapons upgrade) is being done with an eye to the absolute knowledge that more higher-caliber weapons are on the street since the expiration of the ban," Knight said. He said his own department of about 20 officers is in the midst of determining whether to upgrade its weapons.

Ron Stucker, criminal investigations chief of the Orange County Sheriff's Department in Florida, says the department has been rearming many of its deputies with assault weapons in the past two years.

Stucker says deputies are now "frequently" encountering assault weapons in local robberies and during simple traffic stops. Weapons seizures in Orlando have increased overall by 26% since 2004.

It was not immediately clear whether assault weapons were driving the increase in weapons seizures or were directly linked to the county's record number of homicides in 2006, Stucker says.

In Houston, where homicides were up as much as 25% in 2006 over the previous year, Police Chief Harold Hurtt says the AK-47 assault rifle has become "kind of a weapon of choice" for warring gangs, major drug distributors and immigrant smugglers in a city that has become a major transit point for criminals.

"The reality on the street is that many of these weapons are readily available," says Hurtt, whose department began upgrading its weaponry with assault-style arms about three years ago before he arrived from Phoenix.

Last year, because of the escalation of violence and firepower on the street, Hurtt says he ordered patrol officers to wear body armor. Wearing armor had long been a matter of personal choice for officers.

The chief also is considering a proposal from officers to put 12-gauge shotguns back inside their patrol cars so they can be more accessible.

He said shotguns were moved to the car trunks when the cabs became crowded with laptop computers and other equipment.

Paul Erhardt, a spokesman for major gun manufacturer Sigarms, says the 2001 terrorist attacks, the violence following Hurricane Katrina and other high-profile incidents involving weapons contributed more to law enforcement's interest in rearming officers than any concerns raised by the expiring assault weapons ban. Erhardt's company outfits about 40% of the statewide law enforcement agencies in the USA.

IMMIGRATION:

State Ruling Will Help Some Foreigners Convicted In Florida Fight Deportation (MH)

By Alfonso Chardy And Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, February 19, 2007

Owran Green thought he made a good deal when he agreed more than 13 years ago to plead no contest to assault and battery charges in Broward County in exchange for probation and no jail time.

It would be years before he realized his mistake. The Jamaican, now 35, learned from an immigration attorney that his plea renderered him deportable under a decade-old federal law that made expulsion of most convicted criminals mandatory.

But this past fall, the Florida Supreme Court issued a landmark ruling that could help Green and hundreds of other foreign nationals in the same predicament avoid expulsion if they can show they cut their plea deals without being legally warned about deportation.

The high court's ruling could provide convicted foreigners with another layer of defense against stepped-up efforts by Homeland Security after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to rid the country of immigration violators, particularly those with criminal convictions.

The unanimous Green ruling, issued Oct. 26, has given renewed hope to numerous convicted foreigners now seeking withdrawal of plea deals -- including dozens in Miami-Dade Circuit Court.

Almost all of the pleas in question were struck in the 1990s, when judges didn't uniformly advise defendants they could be deported by pleading guilty or no contest to charges. Most of those defendants have served sentences and are now seeking to have convictions thrown out to inoculate themselves against possible deportation.

"It's had a considerable impact in all of our criminal divisions," said prosecutor Penny Brill, chief of the legal division at the Miami-Dade State Attorney's Office. ``It's now an easier standard for these defendants to meet."

In Green's case, he sought to withdraw his plea in September 2003, arguing that had he been warned about deportation he would have taken his chances at trial. A judge rejected his petition because no actual deportation proceedings had begun.

Green's appeals eventually reached the state's highest court. In the little-publicized opinion, the Supreme Court gave a boost to convicted foreigners seeking to withdraw pleas -- if they can show they were not properly advised by defense lawyers or presiding judges that their convictions could lead to deportation.

The Green ruling, reaffirmed Feb. 8 by the Florida Supreme Court in the Miami-Dade case of Mario Gaston, drastically changed the legal standard for convicted foreign nationals. They now only have to show they were unaware they were "subject" to deportation -- not actually facing a "threat" of expulsion. That was the previous state standard dating to 2000.

The state Supreme Court opinion imposes a two-year deadline to seek such withdrawals. The only exception: if convicted foreign nationals can prove they were unable to ascertain the likelihood of deportation during the two-year period.

"In the short run, it will be of substantial assistance because it lowers the standard of what you need to reopen your criminal case," said Miami attorney Ira Kurzban, an expert in immigration law. But Kurzban criticized the two-year deadline as too restrictive.

Green and his Fort Lauderdale attorney, Michael Cohen, declined comment.

But Jerrard Cutrone, Gaston's Miami attorney, said the Green ruling will benefit many defendants like his client.

"It gives them a chance to revisit their pleas," said Cutrone.

Gaston, a Haitian, pleaded guilty to a charge of carrying a concealed firearm in 1994 and got three months' probation. In August 2004, he asked to withdraw his plea because he was not warned about deportation. The court granted his motion, but the state appealed. The Florida Supreme Court on Feb. 8, citing the Green opinion, ruled in Gaston's favor.

The Green ruling came more than a decade after Congress in 1996 passed laws aimed at deporting all foreign nationals convicted of "aggravated felony" crimes such as drug trafficking. Then in 2001, the U.S. Supreme Court gave some protection to certain foreign nationals who pleaded guilty prior to enactment of the 1996 laws and were not advised that pleading could lead to deportation.

According to congressional and Justice Department figures, more than 238,000 foreign nationals are incarcerated in federal, state and local jails nationwide or about 11 percent of the 2.2 million inmate population in all facilities.

Vacating a plea is a significant step under immigration law.

Convicted foreign nationals can stop their deportation if they meet at least three requirements: They had legal status such as a green card for several years before being convicted; their guilty pleas were vacated; and they face no further charges.

Not all foreigners convicted of aggravated felonies are automatically placed in deportation proceedings.

After they've served their sentences, most wind up in proceedings when they draw the attention of immigration authorities either upon arrival from a trip abroad or while seeking an immigration document such as a work permit, green card or citizenship.

This may change.

A senior immigration official told The Miami Herald last month that Homeland Security is seeking arrangements with Florida correctional authorities to identify all deportable foreign-born convicts while in jail or under probation. That way, Homeland Security can place the foreign inmates in deportation proceedings when they begin their sentences so they can be booted out of the country when they finish their time.

The arrangement would reduce the amount of detention space now needed to hold these convicts in deportation proceedings and cut back on the amount of time immigration agents spend tracking deportable convicts released from jail or in hiding.

The official asked not to be identified because he had no formal authorization to discuss the information publicly.

A program to identify and place in deportation proceedings foreign-born convicts in jail or under probation has been a goal of the immigration service since the late 1990s. But it requires far more money and personnel.

More than 89,000 foreign nationals with convictions were deported in fiscal year 2005, according to the Yearbook of Immigration Statistics.

Border Crackdown Spawns Violence (WP)

By Sylvia Moreno, Washington Post Staff Writer

More Deaths Occurring as Smugglers Fight Over Valuable Human Cargo

SILVERBELL, Ariz. -- Among the statuesque saguaro cactuses in the desert south of this old mining town lies the remnant of a crime scene that federal authorities say signals a troubling and escalated level of violence associated with the human smuggling trade.

Sometime in the pitch-black early morning hours of Feb. 8, a pickup packed with illegal immigrants from Central America, on their way to a presumed stash house in Phoenix, was attacked by two men shooting high-powered assault weapons. The four witnesses found tell conflicting stories about the time, place and other details about the shooting. The abandoned vehicle and two bodies were found near Silverbell, 70 miles north of the Arizona-Mexico border; another body and two survivors were found on the side of a dirt road eight miles north of the mining town.

Three immigrants -- a woman and two men -- were killed, and another woman was seriously wounded by three rounds from an AK-47. An alleged smuggler, whose hand was shattered by gunfire during the attack, is under arrest. The truck driver and another two dozen immigrants remain missing. Inside the yellow police tape strung across prickly pear and ocotillo cactuses lay staples the immigrants carried on their trek across the desert: a package of bologna and a plastic water jug. Personal effects taken from the dead, including blood-smeared pictures of children left behind in Guatemala and El Salvador, are now sealed away as evidence in the Pima County Sheriff's Department.

It is not clear whether this attack was the work of rival smugglers, extremist vigilantes or what are known in Spanish slang here as bajadores-- crews of bandits who steal human cargo throughout southern Arizona and from Phoenix stash houses to extort ransom from their families in Latin America or the United States. What is unusual, said Alonzo PeÃ±a, the new U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement special agent in charge of Arizona, is the recent frequency of the violence, the fact these incidents resulted in deaths and that they occurred in the desert, where the crime scenes are hard to find within the thousands of acres of sand and brush.

"There's more and more sophisticated, high-powered assault-type weapons being used . . . and there are back-to-back incidents," PeÃ±a said.

Smuggling violence has increased in Arizona during the past six months, the byproduct of a clampdown by federal immigration authorities, PeÃ±a said. The U.S.-Mexico border in Arizona remains the busiest illegal entry point in the country, but the increased concentration of Border Patrol agents and National Guard troops stationed there during the past year has made it harder to cross.

In the past 18 months, enforcement operations have been stepped up in Arizona, with strong backing from Gov. Janet Napolitano (D), who declared a state of emergency in Arizona's border counties in 2005 because of illegal immigration.

Those efforts appear to be working. Border Patrol statistics show that arrests of illegal immigrants in the Tucson sector, which includes 135 miles of border, dropped 11 percent overall last year and are down 9 percent since October, compared with the same period the year before. Deaths from heatstroke and dehydration in the Arizona desert just north of the border, which averaged 160 annually between 2000 and 2005, also dropped slightly last year, said Pima County Medical Examiner Bruce Parks.

The result, PeÃ±a said, is that a cargo of illegal immigrants that makes it across the border is worth more now. "This is raising the cost to do business for the smugglers," PeÃ±a said about the stricter border enforcement. "The commodity is more valuable, so [rival] smugglers are trying to get hold of it."

A few days after the assault near Silverbell, two men were found dead in the desert west of Phoenix, which local authorities believe was connected to illegal smuggling. In late January, a truckload of illegal immigrants was ambushed in the desert near

Eloy by several armed men wearing camouflage clothing and berets, surviving immigrants said. The driver was killed and one immigrant was wounded.

Just last week Pima County authorities found another body in the desert. Officials estimated it had been dead for two weeks and said they believed it was also connected to human smuggling.

"Unfortunately, this is a common occurrence," said Pima County Sheriff Clarence Dupnik, whose detectives are charged with solving the homicide near Silverbell. "This is not an aberration. And to be honest, the chances of solving this is not good."

With illegal immigrants facing increased risk of capture at or near the border, smuggling organizations are waiting for them to get well north of the border before hijacking them, usually at gunpoint. For some years, such incidents have been seen in and around Phoenix, where the bajadores break into immigrant stash houses to take over what is known as the "collections process." While immigrants wait for relatives and friends to send the agreed-upon smuggling fees so they can move on to their final destinations farther north or west, the bajadores take the group hostage and begin extorting exorbitant ransom fees.

One such violent crew, known as the Franco organization, with roots in Sinaloa, Mexico, made its mark four years ago in Phoenix by taking hostage more than 50 illegal immigrants in a stash house and viciously beating them, burning them with cigarettes and putting plastic bags over their heads while holding them at gunpoint.

A month ago, one Franco bandit was sentenced in U.S. District Court in Phoenix to life in prison plus seven years on a conviction of conspiracy, hostage-taking, harboring illegal aliens, and possessing and using a firearm to commit violence. Another participant in the hostage-taking had been sentenced previously, and three other defendants are set for sentencing next month.

Between April 2005 and July 2006, 65 similar cases involving Phoenix stash houses were discovered by federal agents, PeÃ±a said. Still, the recent desert shootings, resulting in fatalities, stand out.

"Sadly, violence has become the norm," said Angel RascÃ³n, a special agent in the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement's Phoenix office. But when they "end up happening in such frequency and in death, that's alarming."

U.S. 'Rewarded' Alien For His Testimony (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 19, 2007

An illegal alien got a "get out of jail free card" plus U.S. legal documents and monetary compensation from federal prosecutors in exchange for his testimony against a U.S. Border Patrol agent accused of using excessive force during an arrest.

Former agent David Sipe, who was convicted and fired, recently won an acquittal at a court-ordered retrial.

A federal appeals court in Texas ordered the new trial, saying prosecutors gave the illegal alien and two others additional inducements not disclosed at the time for their testimony, including Social Security cards, witness fees, permits allowing travel to and from Mexico, living expenses and free use of government phones.

"The government stated in writing the aliens were allowed to remain and work in the United States pending trial and specified that 'no other promises or advantages' had been given," the court said. "That was not true."

Mr. Sipe, 35, of Bethany, Okla., was convicted in 2001 after a five-day jury trial in McAllen, Texas, before U.S. District Judge Ricardo Hinojosa. U.S. Attorney Mervyn Mosbacker Jr.'s office charged the agent with using excessive force and causing bodily injury in the 2000 arrest of a Mexican national, Jose Guevara.

Mr. Sipe's attorney, Jack Lamar Wolfe, sought a new trial, accusing prosecutors of "misrepresentations and nondisclosures." After a hearing, Judge Hinojosa ordered a new trial, a ruling upheld by a 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals panel in Austin, Texas.

The appeals court agreed that prosecutors suppressed evidence that would have been favorable to Mr. Sipe's defense. The new trial was moved to Brownsville, Texas, before U.S. District Judge Andrew Hanen, and an acquittal was handed down Jan. 26.

The court said that in its pre-sentence report, prosecutors disclosed information to a probation officer they had not given to the defense, including evidence that the illegal aliens had received numerous benefits in exchange for their testimony.

"They were essentially given all, and more, of the benefits they were arrested for trying to obtain illegally benefits so valuable that they took great risks to obtain them by crossing the border illegally," the court said.

Mr. Sipe, through his attorney, is seeking to be reinstated. Mr. Wolfe said his client was fired because of the conviction "and for no other reason, so with that conviction now gone, he ought to be able to get his job back."

In its ruling, the court also said the government failed to disclose that after Mr. Sipe's arrest and before the trial, Mr. Guevara was caught by Border Patrol agents in the company of illegal aliens, and the arresting agents released him when he displayed a card given to him by prosecutors.

"Since Guevara had been granted free passage in his deal with the government, his arrest with illegal aliens was evidence that he was a transporter, as well as evidence of the extent of the government's support accorded him in order to obtain his testimony," the court said. "As the defense termed it, Guevara was given a 'get out of jail card.' "

The court said that although there was evidence of Mr. Sipe's guilt, the prosecution's withholdings prevented him from exposing "significant weaknesses in the government's case at every turn."

Mr. Sipe was indicted in November 2000 for using excessive force. Before the trial began, he filed motions seeking, among other things, what benefits the government had given the aliens. The government responded by saying three aliens who would be called to testify Mr. Guevara, Nehemias Diaz and Evarado Sanchez and were allowed to remain in the United States to work pending trial, but that "no other promises or advantages" had been given.

The court said the government also failed to disclose that the other two illegal aliens called to testify in exchange for immunity had been living with Mr. Guevara during the months before trial.

In 2000, Mr. Sipe was on the border near Penitas, Texas, responding to a sensor alarm when he spotted 12 to 15 illegal aliens. After ordering the group to halt, records show, Mr. Guevara, Mr. Diaz and Mr. Sanchez fled into an area of heavy reeds. Mr. Sipe said he was defending himself when he struck Mr. Guevara with a flashlight.

Mr. Guevara required five stitches in his head and later won an $80,000 settlement from the government.

Asylum from the asylum process

TWO YEARS AGO, the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom released a report detailing the upsetting inconsistency with which immigration agents and judges treat foreigners seeking asylum in the United States. The study's conclusion: Asylum seekers are often not given a fair chance to argue their cases, putting legitimate claimants -- especially those who can't contact a lawyer -- at risk of being sent back to their countries of origin, where they face retribution from their governments. This month, the commission issued a follow-up that included a report card on the government's progress since the original study. Both the Department of Homeland Security and the Justice Department earned a fair number of D's and F's from the bipartisan group.

In the 2005 report, the commission found that statements taken by immigration officers early in the process were often incomplete and that claimants were often not given the chance to correct them. Yet immigration judges heavily relied on the statements to make their determinations. Access to legal counsel was also found to be inconsistent, a major problem when, according to the commission, asylum seekers with lawyers are about 11 times as likely to have their applications approved.

The commission has not conducted an exhaustive study examining the scale of these problems since its 2005 report. Rather, the panel used the government's sins of omission as evidence that the situation has not improved over the past two years. It noted that the Department of Homeland Security in particular has released little information on the progress, if any, it has made on implementing many of the recommendations in the 2005 report.

Leaving aside some of the more controversial recommendations the commission offered in its previous report -- such as giving front-line officers the power to grant asylum at an early stage -- there is no good reason that, after two years, Homeland Security has not been able to adopt much of the commission's advice. This includes expanding video monitoring systems at border stations, improving training and instruction of federal immigration agents, and ensuring consistent access to pro bono legal services. If the government has made progress, it should get credit. If it hasn't, the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom, and Americans in general, should know.

Immigrants: The Unsung Heroes Of The U.S. Economy (USNEWS)

By Renuka Rayasam

U.S. News and World Report, February 18, 2007

While illegal immigration attracts the spotlight, another facet of the issue is just coming into view: Immigrant entrepreneurs are helping fuel the U.S. economy. Recent studies show not only that immigrants are starting businesses at a faster rate than native-born Americans but that many of those businesses are refreshing neglected inner-city neighborhoods.

That's what Alfredo Rodriguez wants to do in a small corner of Newark, N.J. The native of the Dominican Republic moved to New York when he was 5 years old and has worked in the grocery business since he was 12. In 2002, he bought a 53,000-square-foot supermarket and transformed it to meet the tastes of Hispanic shoppers. Now about 90 percent of his customers are Latin American immigrants. Every week 5,000 customers visit his store for staples like frozen plantains, boosting his annual sales to $9 million.

"Hispanic immigrants spend more than traditional customers," says Rodriguez, a U.S. citizen. Not only are they willing to pay more for items that remind them of home, but many also like to cook generous portions in case an unexpected visitor drops by, he says. He wants to expand his Xtra Supermarket and make the surrounding strip into a center that caters to immigrants.

It's the kind of pattern that's enlivening immigrant pockets in cities like New York and Los Angeles, according to the Center for an Urban Future. In 2005, first-generation immigrants started 22 of L.A.'s 100 fastest-growing companies, the center says. From 1994 through 2004, while the number of new companies grew 9.6 percent in New York overall, in the Flushing neighborhood of Queens, an immigrant magnet, they grew 54.6 percent.

Billions. Like Rodriguez, many of the new entrepreneurs are starting companies that cater to local communities, whether by selling India's Bollywood movies or East Asia's bubble tea. "They are the first ones to be able to respond to the consumer face of the immigrant community," says Michael Barrera, head of the U.S. Hispanic Chamber of Commerce. Barrera estimates that by 2010 the number of Hispanic-owned businesses will grow to 3.2 million from 2 million today and will generate $465 billion in goods and services.

About 85,000 immigrants started new companies in 2005, according to the Kauffman Foundation. That newcomers start businesses at a higher rate than native-born Americans "comes as no surprise," says Robert Litan, Kauffman's vice president of research and policy. "Immigrants have a higher propensity to be self-employed, because often it is the only way to crack the economic system."

Even highly educated immigrants may lack the language skills or cultural knowledge necessary to break into corporate America, says Susan Au Allen, president of the U.S. Pan Asian American Chamber of Commerce. They often prefer to be their own boss, she says. About a quarter of the engineering and technology companies started from 1995 through 2005 had at least one immigrant founder, according to a Duke University and University of California-Berkeley study.

To get started, immigrants typically tap into family networks with established local roots, says Litan. It's how Rodriguez got his start in the grocery business. In 1985, he bought his first grocery in Queens with the $25 a week his mother had been setting aside for him for a decade. After he sold that store, he began working at his father-in-law's stores before branching out on his own again. "It's just natural," Rodriguez says, that he followed in other immigrants' footsteps.

TAX:

Ebay Fights Plan To Shop Users To IRS (FT)

By Eoin Callan In Washington

Financial Times, February 20, 2007

Ebay is fiercely resisting a Bush administration plan it says will force it to snitch on customers who are not paying tax on billions earned on the popular online auction site.

The Treasury estimates it could collect $2bn in unpaid tax if companies such as eBay reported American users who carry out more than 100 transactions worth at least $5,000 a year to the Internal Revenue Service.

But an eBay spokesperson said: “We do not believe it is our responsibility to serve as the go-between. We believe that it is the seller’s responsibility.” The company pointed out that many users file self-employment and business tax returns based on their eBay income.

Ebay said it would co-operate with IRS investigations into specific persons but would not voluntarily report its customers’ sales “en masse”.

The US measure, planned to come into effect on January 1, 2008, would only affect American users of eBay, but separately this week UK Revenue and Customs warned taxpayers to report income from eBay activity or face penalties.

Ebay says the measure is especially unfair because it does not apply to rivals such as Craigslist, the online classified advertisement site, whose business models do not have the auction or payment tools of eBay.

Ebay has more than 200m registered users of its auction services and estimates 4.3m rely on its website for a significant portion of their income.

The company, which has a market valuation of $47bn, has mobilised its extensive lobbying network in Washington to resist the Treasury by challenging its authority and questioning the legality of the government proposals.

Pamela Olson, a tax partner at Skadden, said: “The proposal is aimed at companies like eBay facilitating the sale of personal property for their customers.”

Representative Rick Boucher, a member of the internet caucus in Congress, said he had been in touch with eBay and would rally opposition on Capitol Hill.

DOJ_NMG_0133849

Barbara Weltman, an expert on eBay sellers, said the company did little to encourage tax compliance by customers, but already collated the data the IRS was seeking.

"It is a burden but it is doable," she said.

The company is marshalling legal arguments that it does not meet the government's definition of a "broker" and that the millions of auctions that take place on its websites are not actually auctions.

"We do offer sellers auction-like transactions but they are not auctions," said a spokesperson, citing technical definitions in state law that an auction has no fixed end-time.

The fate of the Treasury plan is likely to depend on the success of eBay's lobbying and wider talks between the administration and Congress about President George W Bush's budget proposals.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Senate GOP Ready To Fight For Agenda (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 19, 2007

Senate Republicans have pledged to fight for up-or-down votes on President Bush's judicial nominees and to make his tax cuts permanent, but they face an uphill battle in pushing their agenda.

Republican leaders have outlined seven issues they plan to highlight in the shadow of the Democratic majority, which has its own priorities and the power to bring them to the floor.

"Obviously, in the minority we don't get to set the agenda, but we expect to be offering our ideas" in the form of amendments to other proposals, said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican.

Senate Republican Conference Chairman Jon Kyl of Arizona said his party unanimously agreed on a set of guiding principles and revealed them in advance of forthcoming legislative specifics.

Mr. Kyl called the seven principles a "good starting point" Thursday as lawmakers prepared for a weeklong recess. In addition to judges and tax cuts, the broad principles promise a commitment to "fiscal restraint" and to fight the war on terrorism, among other things.

"We are committed not only to effectively communicating our vision for the nation but also demonstrating through debate and legislative action that Republican ideas are better for America," Mr. Kyl said.

Democrats weren't sure what to make of the Republican plan.

"There's very little to quibble with because much of it comes straight out of the Democratic agenda," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat.

As for judicial nominees, Mr. Reid has promised to quickly hold votes on "consensus" candidates.

"But if the president sends us divisive, right-wing ideologues, he can expect to face trouble in the Senate," Mr. Manley said.

Democrats have blocked many of Mr. Bush's nominees using a filibuster.

Among the other examples of legislation Mr. Kyl said may result from the Republican principles:

·Attempting to make the Bush tax cuts permanent;

·Supporting Mr. Bush's plan to increase the size of the military;

·Pushing earmark reform;

·Expanding domestic oil production and alternative energy research.

Another of the seven issues is related to health care. Republicans say they will propose creation of small-business health-insurance plans, expansion of health savings accounts and support for the health care tax plan Mr. Bush promoted in his State of the Union address last month, with the idea "all Americans can receive quality health care."

"It's not enough just to play defense. You need to have a positive agenda that you believe in and that you're going to fight for," said Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott, Mississippi Republican.

One of the thornier issues at the bottom of the Republican agenda is immigration reform.

Last year, 23 Senate Republicans faced wrath from conservatives for joining Democrats to pass a "comprehensive" immigration plan that opponents said rewards illegal aliens.

Mr. Kyl said members learned from the November elections, and he thinks both parties are "committed" to dealing with an immigration plan.

"We are all reformulating our views on how to proceed with this," he said, noting broad Republican support for securing the border and making sure workplaces follow immigration law.

DOJ_NMG_0133850

Mr. Manley said when the Senate returns from recess it will likely consider implementing the remainder of the September 11 commission recommendations, passing changes to the prescription-drug program and funding for embryonic stem-cell research. All three measures have already passed the House.

Information, Please (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, February 19, 2007

Deep inside the Library of Congress, 500 researchers pound out the secret intelligence Congress uses to make law.

Legislators request 6,000 Congressional Research Service reports a year, on weapons systems and farm subsidies, prescription prices and energy use. Together, they offer what lobbyists and industry want most: clues to what's next on the Hill.

For years, open-government groups have fought to make the reports public, and for years, many lawmakers have kept them under wraps. Or so they thought.

By insisting on secrecy, Congress instead created a bootleg market for the research. Every day, a small Texas company compiles the reports and sells them to lobbyists, lawyers and others who pay thousands of dollars for a peek at the reports and what they say about the congressional agenda. And it's all legal.

"How I get them is my trade secret . . . but I get them all," said Walt Seager, who digs up the reports for Gallery Watch, a legislative tracking service.

The Congressional Research Service (CRS) was established in 1914 as Congress's supplier of nonpartisan research and analysis. Its reports are neither classified nor copyrighted, but they've long been the exclusive property of lawmakers, who distribute them as they see fit. Taxpayers supply the agency's $100 million annual budget, inspiring open-government groups and some lawmakers, including Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) to push for public release of CRS reports.

"The Library of Congress is a national treasure. The public deserves ready access to the reports it prepares for Congress, and easy online retrieval is the obvious answer," Leahy said. "We need to keep moving toward that goal."

But each time the topic comes up, it runs into a wall erected by lawmakers such as Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), who "like many members of Congress, views CRS as an extension of his staff," said Aaron Saunders, Stevens's spokesman. If the reports were made public, "every time a member requests a particular document, the public may infer that he's staking out a particular policy position."

CRS's director, Daniel P. Mulhollan, has left it to Congress to decide. "Once a report is produced for the Congress, it becomes the property of the Congress," he said in a statement. "CRS itself has no public role and is prohibited by law from publishing its work."

It's up to members and committees, Mulhollan said, to release the reports "directly, by inclusion in congressional publications or through their own Web sites."

Open-government groups have a problem with that: "CRS is Congress's brain, and it's useful for the public to be plugged into it," says Steven Aftergood, an open-government advocate who runs the Federation of American Scientists' Secrecy News blog.

Aftergood and others have fought back by posting every CRS report they can find on their Web sites. But watchdog groups have released only about 10 percent of the total, not enough to reveal the patterns that suggest what Congress might do next.

Subscribers to Gallery Watch pay about $4,000 a year to get all the CRS reports, online and searchable, delivered weekly.

Gallery Watch sells other legislative tracking tools, but the reports are the key reason clients subscribe, said Patrick Riendeau, a sales executive. Besides lobbyists, lawyers, and corporations, universities and news organizations subscribe.

At a recent meeting for potential customers, Riendeau explained that clients scan the reports for intelligence "kind of how the CIA operates," by spotting the political trends suggested by their contents and timing, he said. About a year ago, lawmakers made a flurry of requests for CRS reports related to North Korean counterfeiting of U.S. currency; not until months later, when the Treasury Department cracked down on North Korea, did the issue appear in newspapers.

Gallery Watch, owned by the Capitol Hill newspaper Roll Call, gets the publications from Seager, 68, a former trade magazine journalist based in Damascus, who for 20 years has mined the Hill for them.

"I'm just an old Washington journalist who knows how to find things," Seager said. He got started, he said, two decades ago when he found a CRS catalogue of new reports in a congressman's office. He made copies of it and sold subscriptions, with instructions on how to get the reports by contacting lawmakers. When CRS stopped publishing the listing, Seager started finding the reports himself.

"I upload an average of about 100 a week" to Gallery Watch, he said.

If the reports were ever made available to all, "I would comfortably retire to my mountain retreat in West Virginia and be very happy, because that's the way it should be -- taxpayers pay for them," he said.

But he doesn't think that will happen. For one thing, he said, "incumbents like to provide them to their constituents [saying] 'glad to be of service, hint, hint, remember me at election time.' "

Second, he said, CRS is "a think tank working for [members] exclusively and not for the people running against them. They've got all this brainpower behind them making them look very knowledgeable."

"The less I know, the better," said Gallery Watch Senior Vice President Arnie Thomas about Seager's methods.

While he would not provide a list of clients, citing privacy concerns, the company's Web site client list includes lobbying and law firms, Mitsubishi, the Mashantucket Pequot Tribal Nation and the Department of Agriculture.

Deloitte & Touche lobbyists hailed Gallery Watch in an online testimonial: "With the collapse of Enron . . . almost daily there were numerous bills being introduced that required us to research and analyze the impact of the proposed legislation on the accounting profession," one said. "We need a tool to tell us when something is going on."

Hospital Investigates Former Aid Chief (WP)

By Dana Priest And Anne Hull

For the past three years, Michael J. Wagner directed the Army's largest effort to help the most vulnerable soldiers at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. His office in Room 3E01 of the world-renowned hospital was supposed to match big-hearted donors with thousands of wounded soldiers who could not afford to feed their children, pay mortgages, buy plane tickets or put up visiting families in nearby hotels.

But while he was being paid to provide this vital service to patients, outpatients and their relations, Wagner was also seeking funders and soliciting donations for his own new charity, based in Texas, according to documents and interviews with current and former staff members. Some families also said Wagner treated them callously and made it hard for them to receive assistance.

Last week, Walter Reed launched a criminal investigation of Wagner after The Washington Post sought a response to his activities while he ran the Army's Medical Family Assistance Center, a position he left several weeks ago. Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, the commander at Walter Reed, said the probe by the Criminal Investigation Command (CID) "reflects the seriousness with which we take these allegations."

Weightman's legal adviser, Col. Samuel Smith, said that "it would clearly be a conflict of interest" prohibited by federal law, Army regulations and Defense Department ethics rules if Wagner used his position to solicit funds for his own organization.

The saga of the Medical Family Assistance Center is just one example of the problems at Walter Reed, where nearly 700 soldiers and Marines from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan live as outpatients while recuperating. Some families are happy with the help they received from Wagner and his office, and many soldiers and their families applauded the dedication of workers there. Others said that they had problems with Wagner and that the center seemed chaotic and disorganized.

"We had many family members who came to me because they couldn't get a respectful and compassionate response from Dr. Wagner," said Peggy Baker, director of a charity that helps wounded soldiers, Operation First Response.

Wagner, who has a doctorate in education, resigned his position last month to work full time on his Military, Veteran and Family Assistance Foundation, based in Dallas. The foundation includes the Phoenix Project, which runs marriage retreats for soldiers returning from combat. According to its Web site, the foundation is supported by several corporations, other foundations and individuals.

In a phone interview, Wagner denied he had solicited funds or made contact with donors during office hours. "It's just not true," he said. "I intentionally stayed out of that. I couldn't do that. I couldn't do both." He said he is not paid by the foundation. The documents that would verify that have not yet been filed with the Internal Revenue Service.

Wagner said his superiors "knew of my involvement right from the beginning." Weightman said the command had been unaware of Wagner's Texas charity until recently.

Wagner defended his work at the center. "My only purpose and my priority 12 to 19 hours a day was to assist the families of the wounded," he said. "I saw 6,000 people coming back from Iraq and Afghanistan. I did my best, but I'm not God. What I did there was a job that was superhuman."

Wagner said that the charity was founded by his brother and that he did not officially become its executive director until he left Walter Reed. But fundraising documents from early January, before he resigned, list him as the director, and the organization's Web site called him its executive director months before he resigned.

In a fundraising letter he signed shortly before he quit the Medical Family Assistance Center, Wagner referred to his work at Walter Reed. As head of the center, he wrote, "I have had over a thousand citizens in this great country asking what they might be able to do at Walter Reed for our wounded troops and their families. I found myself telling them that Walter Reed was blessed with the outpouring of the goodness and generosity of the American public and that if they were really interested in assisting, they should look within their own communities."

But, his letter continued, "I realized they were not working with their local communities so . . . I decided to found the Military, Veteran and Family Assistance Foundation to do just this, to do what I am able to help our soldiers reenter their home and local community."

Wagner included an ambitious business plan to take the charity from a $237,000 pilot project in the first year, which ended in August 2006 -- while he was working at Walter Reed -- to a $145 million foundation by 2011. He signed the letter "Executive Director and Founder."

Leita Sosin, an 11-year Army veteran who worked in Wagner's office for two years, said she complained to him and to co-workers about his involvement with the charity. "It really broke me to see what he was doing," said Sosin, 29, a former Army operating-room technician. "Instead of working with the families at Walter Reed and with us, he spent all his time putting together the Phoenix Project."

Moscow Spencer, a case manager fired by Wagner in October, also complained to her co-workers. "All day long he'd work on his program," she said. "If someone came in to donate money, he would talk to them about his project."

Sosin said the office was overwhelmed by the number of families who needed assistance and who were confused by the complex bureaucracy. "Everyone needed help, but you couldn't get them the help as fast as they needed it," she said. "Someone like me could scream all day about how it was broken, but no one wanted to take the time to fix it."

She also said Wagner was arrogant toward some staff members and families. "People got hurt in the process, whether it be financially or because he promised a lot of things he never followed up on," she said.

In April, Sosin said, she laid out her concerns in a three-page letter to her superiors. She received no response and resigned. Wagner said that Sosin never complained to him and that he had no idea why she quit.

Poverty among soldiers returning from war is not uncommon. While they continue to live on the Army payroll until they return to active duty or are discharged, some experience a substantial decrease in pay when combat pay or hazard pay disappears.

Some Army families breach the poverty line when a spouse quits a job to help the soldier recuperate; the mortgage bill doesn't stop, and they still need to feed their children. Many turn to the generosity of a public eager to prove they have not forgotten the troops' sacrifices. While staff members and soldiers acknowledge that some families take advantage of the plentiful freebies at Walter Reed, many others ask for help only as a last resort.

The assistance center is supposed to be the connection between a soldier's family and private donors. Until recently, it did not accept cash contributions but instead matched families' needs -- for bus or plane tickets, clothing, emergency food vouchers, grants for mortgages or living expenses -- with organizations set up to help.

According to Walter Reed, an average of 14 families a day seek assistance from the center. While it is difficult to quantify the value of donations, the center received $4,500 worth of phone cards in 2006 and handled $1.9 million worth of donated plane tickets. Weightman said the center's staff was recently increased from five to nine employees, with two people assigned to keeping track of the donations, and training has been improved.

The system for receiving donations is often confusing, even for the staff, Weightman said. "There's too much for any one person to know, but depending on the question, they may know [the answer] or direct you to the person who does know it."

Some soldiers go directly to the many volunteer organizations set up to help the wounded. Last year, Wagner began an effort to funnel all requests and donations through the family assistance center. It was a good idea, said Sosin and others, but because Wagner seemed preoccupied, a bottleneck of requests resulted.

"It was really all at the expense of the service member," said Sandra Butterfield, who worked at Walter Reed as an ombudsman for a Defense Department-funded relief organization. "He decreed that everything had to go through him," and it didn't seem to matter if that slowed the process. Officials, she said, "don't understand what it meant to have no money. Family members changed the sheets, empty the bedpan. But they are leaving their homes across the country. . . . Every day I came home angry."

Some families were also angered by the way Wagner treated them.

"The patient care was absolutely wonderful, but the administration was horrible, especially Dr. Wagner," said Maria Mendez, whose 25-year-old nephew, Spec. Roberto Reyes Jr., suffered severe brain and limb damage when a mine exploded near him outside Baghdad. "It was like running around in circles. He was never around."

"They were unprofessional, discourteous and uncompassionate all in one," Mendez said. "I was very surprised. You figure any family who's gone through such devastation, then faces this, to be treated with such unprofessionalism . . . it's like you're putting salt on the wounds."

Frustrated, Mendez set up an account for her sister, Aida Rivera, Reyes's mother, to pay for her stay at Walter Reed. Rivera eventually got financial assistance from the Army and outside organizations, but she also received a $3,519 bill from Mologne House, a hotel at Walter Reed, for her stay as her son's nonmedical attendant.

Staff members from other offices also complained to the command about Wagner, according to memos obtained by The Post. In one, an employee, who asked not to be named, questioned why a soldier's mother "who had subsisted on dried soups . . . due to her lack of funds" could not get help. Four months after approaching the center, the memo said, the mother had not received the per diem owed her as her child's nonmedical attendant "and has no cash for essentials nor emergencies."

A wife who accompanied her wounded husband, who was based in Germany, said Wagner asked her repeatedly why she did not return to Germany so she could continue working. The woman "reported she felt harassed and bullied but that she held her ground," the employee's memo states.

Wagner said families were often angry at his office, not because it failed them but because they were distraught over their situation. "Their true need is an emotional one. They're going to be angry at somebody. . . . I did my best; no, more than my best."

Army Fixing Patients' Housing (WP)

By Dana Priest And Anne Hull

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

Walter Reed Army Medical Center began repairs yesterday on Building 18, a former hotel that is used to house outpatients recuperating from injuries suffered in Iraq and Afghanistan and that has been plagued with mold, leaky plumbing and a broken elevator.

The facility's commander, Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, said Army staff members inspected each of the 54 rooms at the building and discovered that outstanding repair orders for half the rooms had not been completed. He said that mold removal had begun on several rooms and that holes in ceilings, stained carpets and leaking faucets were being fixed.

Walter Reed, the Army's premier medical facility, has turned into a holding ground for wounded soldiers during 5 1/2 years of sustained combat. Almost 700 outpatients suffering from physical injuries and psychological problems live on the 113-acre military post or in nearby quarters. Many linger there for 18 months or longer as they move through the Army's numbing bureaucracy.

A Washington Post series over the weekend described "The Other Walter Reed," where overdoses, suicide attempts and depression among outpatients are the parallel narrative to the spit-polish hallways of the renowned hospital.

Building 18, in particular, symbolizes the indifference and neglect that many of the wounded say they experience at Walter Reed.

Yesterday, Weightman said a broken elevator in the building had been repaired and soldiers were working to improve the outside of the building, including removing ice and snow. The slippery conditions have kept some soldiers in their rooms. A garage door that has been broken for months will soon be repaired as well.

Spec. Jeremy Duncan, whose room has a moldy wall that was featured in one photograph in the Post series, has been moved to another room while workers make repairs. Duncan will be able to return to his room when the work is completed, Weightman said.

Walter Reed and Army officials have been "meeting continuously for three days" since the articles began appearing, Weightman said. A large roundtable meeting with Army and Defense Department officials will take place at the Pentagon early this morning to continue talks about improvements in the outpatient system, he added.

Weightman said the medical center has received an outpouring of concern about conditions and procedures since the articles appeared and has taken steps to improve what soldiers and their families describe as a messy battlefield of bureaucratic problems and mistreatment.

"We're starting to attack how we'll fix and mitigate" some of the problems, he said.

Social workers will now be stationed around the clock at Mologne House, the 200-room hotel on the post where many of the outpatients live. Plans are being developed to better train other staff members who deal with outpatient needs.

The Army will also consider moving some outpatients to its other medical centers throughout the United States and will determine over the next weeks whether more workers are needed at Walter Reed.

Fast-Changing CIA Puts New Emphasis On Recruiting (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, February 19, 2007

At CIA headquarters, iPods are banned. So are cellphones.

DOJ_NMG_0133854

"No personal media things," said Karen Mullet, the agency's chief of employee support.

Workplace restrictions like these are among the smaller sacrifices that CIA employees make on behalf of the nation's security. But a wave of new hires at the agency are very, very tech savvy and, it seems, not shy about their interests.

"They are pushing us to change in ways that, from a security perspective, we might not be ready to change," said Cindy Bower, the CIA's chief of human resources. "They want to use BlackBerrys, and they've got iPods they want to bring in and listen to music."

The new hires also are prodding the agency to improve its information technology systems. "They want it faster and better," said Michael J. Morell, associate deputy director and the No. 3 at the agency. "I think it is a very healthy thing."

Perhaps no federal agency is changing as rapidly as the CIA. The terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, shook up an intelligence community that had been downsizing since the end of the Cold War. Since then, recruitment and hiring have become a CIA priority.

Forty percent of the workforce has arrived since Sept. 11, 2001. Of the new hires, 60 percent are under age 30, and 85 percent are under 40. One in six have military experience.

"We are bringing in today more people than we ever have before," Morell said. The agency set a record for new hires in fiscal 2006 and is likely to come close to doing so again this year and again in fiscal 2008.

Today's CIA looks like "what we call a double-humped camel," Morell said. Most employees have been employed less than five years or more than 15 years, "and not much in that five- to 15-year period," he said.

Despite criticism and controversy in the months after Sept. 11 from Congress and outside investigators, the CIA has proved to be one of the most attractive parts of government for people interested in public service.

Last year, the agency received 134,000 rÃ©sumÃ©s and is on pace to get 160,000 this year, Morell said. That's up from 39,000 to 63,000 a year before the terrorist attacks.

The CIA reviews every rÃ©sumÃ©, but cannot respond to every applicant. Morell and Mullet said the agency is working to change that.

The agency is increasing its ranks of analysts and operations officers (better known as spies), but also needs engineers and professionals in finance, logistics and medicine.

Getting hired, of course, is not easy. The agency looks for people with language skills who have lived abroad and who are at mid-career with experience in industry. About 60 percent of recruits have overseas experience, and about 40 percent have advanced degrees.

Although a quarter of job applicants say they have foreign-language capability, CIA tests find that only 12 percent are proficient.

The hiring process takes nine to 12 months -- from the time a rÃ©sumÃ© is submitted until a letter of acceptance is sent, setting a start date. Employment offers hinge on receiving security clearances, and about 25 percent do not get them, Mullet said.

The hiring surge is part of a "strategic intent" developed by CIA Director Michael V. Hayden that includes an "analysts forward initiative," aimed at getting more intelligence analysts into overseas positions so they gain regional expertise more quickly, and a "leadership development initiative" to make sure the CIA has people who can manage its changing workforce.

Hayden also has called for enhancing diversity at the CIA, eliminating time in grade as a factor in promotions to put more weight on job performance, and requiring rotational assignments across directorates before promotions.

Senior officials are making progress on reshaping the workforce, Morell said. They have identified jobs that require foreign-language skills, and about half have been filled by officers "with significant language capability," he said. That's an improvement over the past four years, and Hayden has formed a group "to figure out what we can do to make it even better," Morell said.

The CIA is especially interested in hiring people who speak Chinese, Arabic, Korean, Farsi, Dari, Pashtu, Urdu and other "mission-critical" languages.

Efforts to improve diversity are paying off and should make it easier for the CIA to operate around the world, Morell said.

In fiscal 2006, 23 percent of new hires were African Americans, Hispanics, Asian Americans and Native Americans. The CIA also is hiring Arab Americans, Persian Americans and South Asian Americans, Morell said.

Half of the managers are minorities or women, a higher proportion than four years ago. Of Hayden's senior leadership team, 35 percent are minorities or women, Morell said. About 30 percent of station chiefs are minorities or women, up from 20 percent three years ago. "So the trends are in the right direction, but we need to do better," Morell said.

The hiring surge, he said, "puts a huge responsibility on this organization to hire the right people, to train them, to develop them." That, and "how well those folks do, will determine how well this agency does 10, 15, 20 years from now," Morell said. "So we are taking very seriously how we invest in them."

Even though employees must leave their iPods and cellphones in their cars while at work on the CIA campus near McLean, the agency has not had problems keeping younger workers.

"We have not yet seen the conventional wisdom of the last five years that Generation Xers and Gen Ys are going to job-hop," Morell said.

Power Shifts In Scalia's Favor On Supreme Court (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, February 20, 2007

WASHINGTON — It has been two decades in the making, but this is the year Justice Antonin Scalia, the Supreme Court's most outspoken dissenter, could emerge as a leader of a new conservative majority among the justices.

Between now and late June, the court is set to hand down decisions in four areas of law -- race, religion, abortion regulation and campaign finance -- where Scalia's views may now represent the majority.

In each of those areas, the retirement of centrist Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and her replacement with Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. figure to tip the court to the right. That would give 70-year old Scalia the chance to take on a role that has largely eluded him: speaking for the court in major rulings.

Scalia is not known for seeing shades of gray in legal disputes; instead, he has favored clear rules and broad decisions.

A series of broad-brush rulings could put Scalia's stamp on some key social issues in the United States. A Scalia-led majority would be likely to outlaw the use of racial guidelines to achieve integration, allow a greater role for religion in public life, uphold stricter regulation of abortion and strike down campaign-funding laws on free-speech grounds.

It is a prospect dreaded by liberals but eagerly awaited by many on the right.

"I'm looking forward to the next 10 to 12 years," said Terry Eastland, publisher of the conservative Weekly Standard.

Although his majority opinions have been few, Scalia's influence has been considerable, especially among lawyers inspired by his championing of "originalism," or strict adherence to the original meaning of the words in the Constitution.

"Justice Scalia has had a bigger impact off the court than on it," said Michael Gerhardt, a law professor at the University of North Carolina. "In his speeches and his opinions, he is trying to reach a wider audience."

Scalia does not grant media interviews, but in recent years he has spoken regularly at colleges and law schools, and he rarely fails to make news with an off-the-cuff comment. When asked to explain his role in the Bush v. Gore decision that halted Florida's recount in the 2000 presidential race, his standard rejoinder is: "Get over it."

"I'm a textualist. I'm an originalist. I'm not a nut," he told students at Claremont McKenna College in Claremont, Calif., earlier this month.

His dissenting opinions have won him "a nearly cult-like following among many conservatives," said author Kevin A. Ring, whose book "Scalia Dissents" contains the justice's writings in a dozen areas of law.

Still, much more than memorable dissents were predicted when Scalia was unanimously confirmed to the high court in 1986. A former law professor, he was seen as smart, witty and charming. Many foresaw him leading a conservative counterrevolution.

But he has never quite lived up to the early promise.

His temperament may be to blame, says George Washington University law professor Jeffrey Rosen in a newly published book that accompanies a PBS series on the Supreme Court. Rosen wrote that Scalia's gruff and acerbic style and his know-it-all manner turned colleagues against him.

His conservative admirers say the blame lies not with Scalia, but with Republican appointees, such as Justices Anthony M. Kennedy, David H. Souter and O'Connor, who turned out not to be true conservatives.

"He is not a split-the-difference type of jurist, and he has needed one extra person on his side," Eastland said.

Even when in the majority, Scalia has written surprisingly few major opinions. William H. Rehnquist, who was chief justice from 1986 to 2005, rarely turned to Scalia, because doing so risked losing the crucial votes of moderates, in particular O'Connor and Kennedy. Often Scalia and his primary ally on the court, Justice Clarence Thomas, wanted to go further.

Last year, there were signs of change. The new chief justice, John G. Roberts Jr., turned to Scalia to write two key opinions.

One concerned whether drug evidence should be thrown out because police, although armed with a search warrant, rushed into a house. Scalia's opinion not only upheld the evidence but also cast doubt on the future of the "exclusionary rule," the doctrine that says judges should exclude illegally seized evidence.

When given a chance to write a decision on wetlands, Scalia's opinion cast aside 30 years of environmental law and largely limited the federal clean-water authority to "navigable" waterways.

In both cases, Kennedy added separate opinions that undercut Scalia's views.

DOJ_NMG_0133856

In sessions that begin Tuesday, this term will give Scalia a chance to make a mark in several areas in which Kennedy usually sides with conservatives.

For example, Scalia has scorned the notion of a strict separation of church and state. Rather, he has said the First Amendment was intended only to bar the government from supporting an official national religion. In his first year on the court, he defended the teaching of creationism in public schools. He has voted regularly since then to allow the government to promote religion in general.

Feb. 28, the court will hear a challenge to the White House Faith-Based and Community Initiatives. A Wisconsin group called the Freedom from Religion Foundation sued, contending the program was an unconstitutional "propaganda vehicle for religion."

The justices will hear the Bush administration's claim that the lawsuit should be thrown out because taxpayers do not have the legal standing to challenge how the president and his advisers conduct their affairs. If the Supreme Court agrees, the ruling could make it much harder for critics to go to court to contest government programs that promote religion.

On other issues, Scalia has argued that campaign finance laws are unconstitutional because they infringe the free-speech rights of donors and candidates.

In late April, the court will hear a new challenge to the part of the McCain-Feingold law that forbids corporations and unions from buying broadcast ads that mention a candidate for federal office within 60 days before a general election or 30 days before a primary. The court could decide the issue narrowly, but a broad Scalia-like opinion could cast doubt on most laws that restrict the raising and spending of campaign money.

Scalia also has called for a strict ban on the use of race by government agencies, including schools and colleges. Without fail, he has voted against affirmative-action policies, but because of O'Connor, the court's majority has stopped short of outlawing affirmative action.

In December, the justices heard a challenge to the use of racial integration guidelines by school districts in Seattle and Louisville, Ky. A decision on that issue, due soon, gives the court's conservative bloc a chance to broadly reject race-based policies.

Also pending is a challenge to the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003, a measure that would outlaw certain midterm abortion procedures. The case does not call into doubt the basic right to abortion set in Roe v. Wade, but a broad ruling in favor of the ban could trigger more stringent regulation of abortion in the United States.

Scalia has repeatedly called for overturning Roe v. Wade and leaving it to states to decide whether to permit or forbid abortion.

The heart of Scalia's message is that much of what the Supreme Court has done in recent decades amounts to an illegitimate power grab. The justices overstep their authority when they stretch the Constitution to resolve current controversies, he says. Issues such as abortion, gay rights and the death penalty should be decided by voters and elected lawmakers, not by judges, he argues.

"I'm one who believes the Constitution should be interpreted exactly as it was adopted," he said in a recent speech. "It should be interpreted as it was written -- nothing more, not less."

Liberal law professors say originalism is more effective as a slogan than as a formula for shaping legal opinions. "It is a good for public relations, and it's good to put in speeches, but it doesn't work in deciding cases," Harvard University law professor Mark Tushnet said.

Scalia's critics also say he has not consistently followed his own theory.

For example, Scalia has regularly voted in favor of white males who challenged affirmative-action policies that benefit blacks, Hispanics or women. He has done so on the basis of the 14th Amendment, adopted after the Civil War, which says no state may deny any person "the equal protection of the laws." Originally, the amendment was intended to protect blacks from discrimination by Southern whites.

The Constitution puts no such "equal protection" restriction on Congress or the federal government. Yet, when white contractors sued in the 1990s to challenge federal policies that benefited minorities, Scalia voted to strike them down as unconstitutional, even though neither words nor the history of the Constitution prohibited such programs.

Scalia's use of originalism "tends to persuade those who already agree with him," said Duke University law professor Erwin Chemerinsky, but "it doesn't persuade those who disagree with him."

Grassley Seeks Democrats' Help On Taxes (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, February 20, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0133857

In a role reversal, Senate Finance ranking member Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) has warned that he may block a House-Senate conference on the minimum-wage bill unless he is assured his Democratic colleagues will join him in demanding inclusion of a sizable tax-cut package.

"The contours of the deal should be known if details can't be," a Grassley aide said of his insistence that Democrats agree to pursue a small-business tax package that is much larger than the $1.4 billion House-passed proposal.

When they were in the minority, Democrats threatened to block House-Senate conferences on a variety of bills, charging that the Republican majority would shut them out of the process and produce final legislation with no Democratic input.

Anticipating criticism from Democrats, the Grassley aide pointed out that Republicans agreed to "pre-conference" a large corporate tax package in the 109th Congress — assuring Senate Democrats, for example, that the measure would be revenue-neutral, among other things. Once they secured those promises, Democrats finally allowed the measure to be sent to conference with the House. Before that, Senate Democrats had blocked three votes to end debate on the motion to appoint conferees, the aide said.

This time, Grassley is hoping for a similar outcome for himself. The Senate-passed minimum-wage bill included a much more robust $8.3 billion small-business tax-cut package, but in a Democratic-controlled House-Senate legislative conference, Grassley is concerned that the Senate package could be whittled significantly or eliminated entirely, considering that House Democratic leaders originally balked at coupling their minimum-wage increase bill with small-business tax cuts.

Mindful that Grassley could lead a potential filibuster of one of the Democrats' top legislative priorities, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has not ruled out the idea of pre-conferencing the minimum-wage-hike bill, and he has been talking actively with Republicans on how to proceed to conference, said Reid spokesman Jim Manley. Reid has said he does not believe a minimum-wage bill could receive Senate approval without a package of small-business tax breaks.

It remains unclear where Senate Finance Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) stands on the question of reaching a deal with Grassley on the scope of the bill before a formal House-Senate conference is convened. A Baucus spokeswoman would not speak directly to the notion of pre-conferencing the bill but said, "Chairman Baucus is going to work with all his colleagues — Senate and House — to craft final legislation that can move through the Senate and get a minimum wage increase."

House Ways and Means Chairman Charlie Rangel (D-N.Y.) likely will react coolly to Grassley's gambit, given that Rangel generated the smaller House tax package only under pressure from House Democratic leaders after vigorously arguing that majorities in both chambers would support a "clean" minimum-wage increase.

Even after drafting his tax bill, Rangel accused Grassley of "hold[ing] the minimum wage bill hostage unless we passed $8 billion in tax cuts for business. ... If they would remove the threat of filibuster, it would pass both houses without the $8 billion tax cut." Rangel made the comments Feb. 15 on PBS' "NewsHour with Jim Lehrer."

A Rangel spokesman would say only, "He believes that [they] can figure it out in conference."

Senate Republicans are wary of the political and public relations pitfalls of appearing to block completion of a minimum-wage bill, if they back Grassley in any floor fight.

GOP Senators are still feeling the sting of being blamed for the impasse over that chamber's Iraq debate, several Republican sources said.

"For Republicans to hold together ... there also has to be some political pressure to counter what the press is writing," said one Senate tax aide. "The merits of what [Republicans] are fighting for just aren't getting reported."

The aide added, that "Republican Senators need a sense of how it's going to play out" if they vote to block conferees.

In addition, lobbyists for small businesses and restaurants need to "step up and keep the heat on Republicans and Democrats to pass tax cuts. ... They could be a very powerful grass-roots force," the aide said.

Given the gamesmanship over the bill, "Republicans need to sit down and figure out where their guys are on the House [tax] bill," said one source who closely follows the House and Senate tax-writing committees.

Because Republican intransigence on the minimum-wage issue was used successfully against many GOP incumbents in the 2006 elections, politically vulnerable Republicans may feel pressure to accept the smaller House tax package just to get the issue off the front pages, the source noted.

However, the source doubted enough GOP Senators would be susceptible to splitting with the party to reach the filibuster-breaking 60-vote threshold.

The Republican "leadership assumes that maybe five or six would be for the House bill, but not 10," the source said.

Fed Chief Warned On Inflation Target (FT)

By Krishna Guha In Washington
Financial Times, February 20, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0133858

It would be a "terrible mistake" for the Federal Reserve to adopt any form of inflation target to guide its interest rate decisions, Barney Frank, the Democratic chairman of the House financial services committee, has told the Financial Times.

Mr Frank, whose committee is one of two in Congress charged with oversight of the US central bank, said such a target "would come at the expense of equal consideration of the other main goal, that is employment".

His comments come as Fed policymakers enter the later stages of a far-reaching strategy review that has included detailed debate over the merits of adopting an inflation target.

Ben Bernanke, chairman of the Fed, believes that the bank would be better off with a relatively flexible inflation target – one that would be achieved on average, rather than within a specific time, giving maximum latitude to respond to output shocks.

However, Fed watchers say that, in order to make any such change, Mr Bernanke would need at least the tacit consent of key figures in Congress. Mr Frank's unequivocal statements suggest this consent will still be difficult to secure even after generally favourable congressional hearings last week.

In an interview, Mr Frank told the FT that Mr Bernanke "has a statutory mandate for stable prices and low unemployment. If you target one of them, and not the other, it seems to me that will inevitably be favoured."

Mr Frank noted that Alan Greenspan, the former Fed chairman, always resisted an inflation target on the grounds that it would reduce his operational flexibility.

"I think Alan Greenspan was right not to do that in the 1990s," Mr Frank said. The lack of a formal inflation target helped Mr Greenspan probe how low unemployment could fall without generating inflation.

Advocates of an inflation target at the Fed say it is important to distinguish between the relatively rigid form of target used, for instance, by the Bank of England, and the relatively flexible form favoured by Mr Bernanke.

Mr Frank, though, said he would not support even a flexible target "without equal attention to unemployment also". He agreed that Mr Bernanke and his colleagues probably had an implicit inflation target in mind already, but said it would be dangerous to make it explicit.

"I think when you make it more transparent you enhance its importance," Mr Frank said. "No question he has something in his head. But when you make it public you lose flexibility."

Mr Frank said he would listen to the Fed chairman's arguments, but suggested he was quite firm in his views. "I am always willing to talk to him," he said. "But he is as likely to change my mind as I am to change his."

Women Post Job Gains, Data Show (WSJ)

By Dean Treftz

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Women took on slightly more than half of U.S. jobs created in the first part of the decade and made gains in securing the most lucrative openings.

Women posted a net increase of 1.7 million jobs paying above the median salary, while men gained a net increase of just over 220,000 of such positions, according to a Bureau of Labor Statistics report for the years 2000-2005.

Overall, men gained 1,804,000 jobs and women 1,996,000, or 52.5% of the total increase, for the period studied.

Women outpaced men in obtaining work that pays in the top quarter of all jobs, primarily positions in the health-care, financial and managerial fields, according to the report. At the end of 2005, 1.1 million more of those jobs were held by women, while 200,000 fewer men held such jobs as widespread layoffs cut manufacturing employment. But the wage gap persists: In 2005, the median weekly pay for women was $486, or 73% of that for men -- $663.

The BLS report3 by economist Randy Ilg found that from 2000 through 2005, service jobs accounted for the largest portion of the net 3.8 million increase in wage and salary positions. Most of the 2.3 million service positions were in food preparation and service, health-care support, and personal care and service, with four of five of those jobs paying below the 2005 overall median of $577 a week.

During the study period, 1.9 million above-the-median manufacturing jobs were lost, the bulk of which -- 1.4 million -- had been held by men. Meantime, the number of construction jobs grew by nearly one million. Though construction is often thought of as providing higher-earning jobs, the report showed construction work accounted for many of the new, lower-paying jobs filled by men.

Jared Bernstein, an economist at the Economic Policy Institute, said an increase in unskilled, immigrant labor might explain the downward trend in construction wages.

Many lower-end office jobs disappeared with new technology and employer belt-tightening, Mr. Bernstein said.

In trying to figure out whether the economy primarily has been adding low-paying jobs, many economists looked only at what industries provided job growth, and from that they estimated how good those jobs were based on the previous median pay within a specific industry, Mr. Ilg said. That approach, he said, could be problematic, explaining that "the amount of information you can glean from that [data] is limited because you are looking at one figure for an industry."

Building Slump? Not On The Commercial Side. (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, February 20, 2007

NEW YORK

The residential housing market may be hibernating this winter, but hard hats around the country are increasingly busy setting I-beams and rivets on new towers, warehouses, industrial parks, and retail space.

Residential construction fell 2 percent last year, but private commercial construction rose 16 percent, and public construction was up 10 percent, according to the US Census Bureau. The last time the business was this strong was seven years ago, says Kenneth Simonson, chief economist for the Associated General Contractors.

Behind the commercial-construction push is a combination of powerful economic forces: For one, gigantic investment pools – some from overseas – are looking for places to invest. Also, an enormous growth of imports into the United States is spurring a rush to build new warehouse space. Moreover, developers are building new communities that offer environmentally friendly spaces to work and require less commuting time. These complexes also offer nightlife and restaurant options.

In some areas, commercial rents are rising, reflecting the growing demand for first-class office space. "There is a shortage of space in various markets around the country," says Alan Beaudette, chairman of the National Association of Industrial and Office Properties in Herndon, Va. "A growing economy justifies new industrial and retail projects."

Indeed, some construction specialties were soaring last year. Construction for new hotels was up 52 percent compared with 2005, according to preliminary figures by the US Commerce Department. Likewise, factory building rose 20 percent, and office building 18 percent.

The pickup is so strong that it has absorbed many workers who had been involved in residential construction. Last month, for example, while 80,000 jobs were lost in residential construction, commercial contractors hired 180,000 workers.

That's no surprise to Brian O'Neill, chairman of O'Neill Properties Group in King of Prussia, Pa. "We're targeting workers who have been building houses. We're happy to have them," he says.

Mr. O'Neill expects to do $1.6 billion in business this year – double his best year ever. Some of his projects are typical of the vibrant construction economy: He's building offices for technology companies, healthcare providers, and consultants. In Malvern, Pa., which used to have a steel mill, his company is erecting a mixed-use community that will total 1.6 million square feet.

The business is now so good that some construction executives are worried. "We are always concerned when there is so much money out there, it entices people to build what should not have been built in the first place," says Mr. Beaudette, who is also senior vice president of Lowe Enterprises Real Estate Group in Irvine, Calif. "[Five to 10 years ago], it was easier to find high teen returns on your investment, and that is now more difficult."

In fact, the commercial construction market is driving up the price of essential building materials such as cement, steel, and gypsum. And it goes beyond commodities: There may even be shortages of contractors who can handle complex projects, says Bill Scott, executive vice president at Linbeck Construction in Houston.

"Clients want more individual control, more capability, and flexibility, which adds complexity to how buildings are planned," he says. "There is going to be a shortage of good contractors for highly complex projects."

For example, his company, which normally does not build warehouses, is erecting a large warehouse in the Port of Houston for a long-term client. "It's being planned so the client has great flexibility to rent to a wide variety of people – and that means complex lighting and fire protection," he says.

The Houston project is just part of a huge explosion of warehouse construction. In the Port of Houston alone, some 3 million square feet of new space is being added, Mr. Scott says. "It's all part of the drive to get goods unloaded from ships and moved across the country."

Even some parts of the country where construction has lagged in the past are experiencing a boom. That's the case in Denver, says Michael Brendle, a design principal at the architectural firm RNL. A 22-story tower and five-story building – both being built to "green" standards – are going up in the downtown area. The developer is building them on "spec" – that is, without major tenants signed up in advance. "It shows a lot of confidence in the market," says Mr. Brendle.

One of the hottest building concepts is mixed-use development. Cheri Morris, CEO of Hedgewood Commercial Properties, is involved in a $50 million restoration of Woodstock, Ga., outside of Atlanta.

DOJ_NMG_0133860

Like many new projects today, Woodstock is trying to use "sustainable" principles. For example, Ms. Morris says, "We feel every resident should be able to get into the village in a five-minute walk." In addition, homes are placed on smaller lots, leaving more room for common space. The completely remodeled village is scheduled to open by December of this year.

For Investors, Strong Enough Is Good Enough (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

It is the kind of surprise investors love to get: The economy seems to be just a little stronger than most people expected. Not enough to worry anyone; just enough to push stocks higher.

Data on items such as fourth-quarter economic growth and consumer spending have come in a tad better than markets expected late last year.

As a result, the Dow Jones Industrial Average has continued its steady rise, and stocks that do better in a strong economy have been among the leaders.

The Dow Jones Transportation Average, which sagged late last year amid worries about an economic slowdown, has become a leader again. Smaller stocks, which depend more than big ones on the ups and downs of the economy, are back on the rise, with middle-size stocks among the big gainers.

The mood is downright bullish.

"The economy is operating in a very sweet spot," says David Kotok, president of money-management firm Cumberland Advisors in Vineland, N.J., which manages $850 million in stocks and bonds.

Amid solid growth with minimal inflation world-wide, the world's stock markets are feeding on one another's success. "With a little bit of good news, the surprise could be that they could work their way a lot higher," Mr. Kotok says.

That kind of optimism has powered stocks higher since July. Skeptics, who have been wrong so far, point out that things look so good that it would be hard for them to get better. Few money managers see signs of any serious trouble, and that is a disquieting sign of complacency to some of the most skeptical investors. Some predict small gains, some predict big gains, some predict small declines -- but almost no one sees a big decline on the horizon.

Investors have heard such warnings for months now and, by and large, they have ignored them -- to their profit. Some see the sweet spot continuing for months or even years, with the economy resilient and the inflation rate moderate. If the skeptics are right, it would be time for a pullback.

Neither the Dow industrials nor the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index has seen as much as a 2% pullback from a high since July 14 -- the longest period without such a pullback since 1954. The markets are getting "positively giddy," says Russ Koesterich, senior portfolio manager at Barclays Global Investors in San Francisco. He sees a pullback coming.

"You have to question whether for the short term this is a good time to be putting money to work," he says.

He worries that, because of the economy's strength, inflation could pick up. That could force the Federal Reserve to raise interest rates. Higher rates hurt corporate profits by raising costs for businesses and consumers, and a Fed rate increase could send major indexes down 10% or more, he says.

So he likes "defensive" stocks, such as those of health-care and household-products companies, whose steady businesses keep them stable in most economic and market conditions. He likes European stocks. He worries that smaller U.S. stocks, among the big gainers, could fall harder than large ones on any bad news, because they are more volatile and more dependent on good economic news.

Janna Sampson, director of portfolio management at OakBrook Investments in Lisle, Ill., adds that inflation has remained tame in part because oil prices fell back last fall from summer highs. If they stay down, inflation probably will remain under control, and the Fed probably can avoid raising interest rates, she says. She thinks that is likely. The risk is that no one, including the experts, is very good at predicting the price of oil.

"I don't think the Fed has a much better handle than I do on oil prices," Ms. Sampson says.

She is focusing her investments on companies that will be able to pass on higher prices in case inflation stays high, such as Waste Management Inc. and Automatic Data Processing Inc. She says she doesn't think the market will stay tranquil.

"I think we are going to have a lot of volatility based on what people think the Fed will do and how fast the economy is growing, and what oil prices are doing," she says, although she says she thinks broad indexes will finish the year higher.

There are some investors who think the economy may be less robust than it appears. They point to the most recent data, late last week, showing consumer confidence, housing starts, retail sales and industrial production all a bit weaker than expected.

They think a less-robust economy would be good news because it could induce the Fed to cut interest rates later this year to give the economy a lift. Interest-rate futures markets show investors once again pushing up the odds that the Fed will cut rates later this year. Lower rates would help stocks, just as higher rates would hurt.

That kind of scenario supports "this kind of placid, low-volatility, upward-drifting market," says Jeffrey Kleintop, chief investment strategist at PNC Wealth Management, the investment-advisory arm of PNC Bank in Pittsburgh.

So he isn't buying into the recent gains in stocks of companies that would benefit from a strong economy. He prefers some areas that didn't rise as much last year, such as health-care and technology stocks, which he thinks could catch up.

Some managers add that, if U.S. growth turns out to be softer than it has appeared, foreign stocks could continue to do better than U.S. stocks, especially some of the foreign markets that haven't soared of late.

"We like places like Hong Kong and Japan that have lagged behind," as well as some markets in continental Europe, suggests Max Darnell, chief investment officer at First Quadrant in Pasadena, Calif., which oversees $35 billion in investments.

Stocks Usually Thrive As Presidential Election Nears (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, February 20, 2007

NEW YORK — The relationship between politics and stock market profitability tends to be most cordial in the year prior to a presidential election.

It is that historical statistical quirk that should provide some solace to investors concerned about another calendar-related anomaly on Wall Street: the fact that stocks have not had a 2% pullback since July 14, a span of 149 trading sessions. That uninterrupted uptrend, says Ned Davis Research, lags behind only a correctionless stretch that ended in 1954.

It's hard to ignore just how well stocks have fared in the third year of the four-year presidential cycle. The last time the Dow Jones industrial average posted a negative return in a pre-presidential election year was 1939, when it fell 2.9% amid brewing World War II clouds, says the Stock Trader's Almanac.

"The only severe loss … occurred in 1931 during the Depression," when the Dow fell 52.7%, writes Almanac editor Jeffrey Hirsch.

The gains are usually of the double-digit variety. Jeffrey Kleintop, investment strategist at PNC Wealth Management, says the Standard & Poor's 500 index has posted average gains of 22% in year three of the four-year cycle. "And," he adds, "never experienced a loss."

That's a key reason Kleintop listed the bullish presidential cycle as the No. 1 thing that "could go right" in his 2007 investment forecast. He notes that the pattern of stellar returns has less to do with the election and more with the tendency of the political party in power to do what is necessary to keep the economy humming.

It often is profitable for investors to be more aggressive in years three and four of a presidential cycle, a 2004 study by Pepperdine University economics professor Marshall Nickles found.

The study, citing data going back to 1952, found that investors who invested $1,000 in the S&P 500 on Oct. 1 of the second year of the four-year cycle — a period in which stocks tend to bottom — and sold on Dec. 31 of the election year would have made money in all 13 election cycles. The initial $1,000 investment would have grown to $72,701 by 2000 had the investor executed the strategy in all 13 cycles. But a person who invested $1,000 on Jan. 1 of the inaugural year and sold on Sept. 30 of year two of the presidential term would have suffered losses in seven of 13 cycles and lost $357.

While Nickles warns that it is risky to "anticipate specific turns in the market," he concludes that "investing for the 27 months before a U.S. presidential election certainly seems to be more profitable than investing during the 21 months after the election."

Job Corps Plans Makeover For A Changed Economy (NYT)

By Erik Eckholm

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

LAUREL, Md. — Over the last four decades, even as failed experiments and partisan disputes took the luster off the war on poverty, the Job Corps, the government's main effort to give poorly educated youths a second chance at a diploma and a trade, was widely seen as one of the few success stories.

But now, as the economy has turned against those with low skills and researchers have questioned the long-term impact of the Job Corps on the lives of its graduates, this remnant of the Great Society is facing an urgent need to reinvent itself.

"Once you could go into the Job Corps and get a G.E.D. and go out and make a living," said Esther R. Johnson, a career executive in the Labor Department with a doctorate in education who took over the corps last March. "You can't do that anymore."

Dr. Johnson wants the Job Corps to aim higher, helping graduates into careers with a bigger paycheck.

To do that she plans to lengthen the average stay for many graduates beyond the current 11.4 months, improving their reading, math and vocational skills. She also wants trade courses to connect more closely with college programs and emerging industries, and she thinks the corps must double the number of graduates, now just 10 percent, who go on to higher education. All this can be done, Dr. Johnson said in an interview, within a budget flat-lined at $1.5 billion in recent years, mainly by increasing the rigor of courses while cutting other costs.

Bridgette Hunter, 18, illustrates the potential benefits of a program that, if it can fulfill its goals, is needed more than ever. She dropped out of school in Baltimore last March, in 12th grade but many credits short of a diploma. "I was with the wrong people," Ms. Hunter explained.

She quickly realized that her ambitions and behavior were out of sync. By October she had entered the Woodland Job Corps Center here, brushing up on reading and math as she took courses in health care while sharing a dorm room and rising at 6:30 a.m. with a 10 p.m. curfew.

"I want to be wealthy," Ms. Hunter said. "My ambition is to become an R.N.," she added, admitting with a shrug that her notion of wealth was a relative one. "And I knew that sitting around doing nothing wouldn't get me there."

At the center, where 300 students live and work in a sprawl of brick dormitories, classrooms and workshops, Ms. Hunter has already earned her G.E.D. and will soon be certified as a nursing assistant. In newly added services, she has the help of a volunteer mentor, a scientist from Washington who is helping her scout colleges, while outside tutors are helping her prepare for the SATs. Grant money is available for nursing, and she could qualify as a registered nurse after two years in a community college.

Since President Lyndon B. Johnson created the Job Corps as part of his "unconditional war on poverty," two million Americans have passed through its residential centers, which number 122 nationwide, with three more planned.

Despite the corps's high cost to the government — now $26,000 an entrant — evidence suggests it has paid off, increasing earnings and reducing crime.

With prospects for the less-educated getting worse and millions of young people, especially black men, unemployed or stuck in dead-end minimum-wage jobs, salvaging "disconnected youth" has become a prime antipoverty target.

In 2005, 4.4 million youths ages 16 to 24 were neither in school nor working, according to an analysis by Andrew Sum, director of the Center for Labor Market Studies at Northeastern University, who calls this an ominous portent. "How much time you're out of school and out of work in the late teens and early 20s is a strong predictor of future joblessness, poverty and dependence in your late 20s," Dr. Sum said.

Both the government and private groups are looking for answers.

"What to do for very disadvantaged youth is the most perplexing social problem we face, in part because so few of the things we have tried have worked," said Gordon L. Berlin, president of M.D.R.C., a group in New York that evaluates antipoverty efforts.

Along with the Job Corps, the federal government supports a program run by the National Guard for about 10,000 16- to 18-year-old dropouts per year, combining five months of schooling in a military-style camp with another year of mentoring. The Labor Department also contributes $50 million a year to Youthbuild, which with an additional $130 million in private financing runs 226 nonresidential programs for 8,000 students a year. Participants renovate low-income housing as they study.

With better training, high school diplomas or, better, degrees from community colleges, many graduates of such programs, it is hoped, will become chefs instead of hamburger flippers; plumbers, electricians or carpenters instead of pickup laborers; nurses instead of health aides. A newer course at the Laurel center trains students to install cable and other electronic systems.

A study published in 2001 that surveyed Job Corps graduates and a control group, conducted by Mathematica Policy Research for the Labor Department, found that the program led to significant increases in self-reported earnings over four years and to lower arrest rates.

But a second analysis, released by the Labor Department in 2006, was dismaying: only the older participants, those in their 20s when they entered the centers, showed any gains in earnings, and they were slight.

Debate about the studies continues, but the findings helped drive the new effort to rejuvenate the corps.

Of roughly 60,000 low-income youths who enter the Job Corps each year, all voluntarily, three-fourths have not graduated from high school.

In Laurel, students live in college-style dorms. The days are divided between academic study and hands-on work: carpentry students practice building walls and roofs; electrical students wire a mock house.

Nationally, 30 percent of entrants leave within the first two months, either because they break the rules or they do not like the regimented life. Among the rest, 60 percent leave with a G.E.D., a regular high school diploma, certification in a trade or a combination of these.

DOJ_NMG_0133863

Michael Whitfield of Washington said he had a change of heart after quitting school in the 11th grade.

"I got to thinking, is this all I'm going to do for the rest of my life?" Mr. Whitfield recalled as he prepared to leave the Laurel center after nine months, having earned his high school diploma and completed courses in electrical contracting and carpentry.

Now 19, he has been accepted by a two-year college where he will study criminal justice to become a police or parole officer. He credited the Job Corps with helping him straighten up and discover his goals. "I really can't see people making it these days without a diploma," he said. "I was lucky; I had a second chance."

If we could manage to get past the tedious and the odious — like the empty speculation on whether a woman can win, or whether Barack Obama is black enough — we might be able to engage the essential issue facing the U.S. at this point in our history.

And that is whether, once the Bush administration has finally and mercifully run its course, the country goes back to being a reasonably peaceful, lawful, constructive force in the world, or whether we continue down the bullying, warlike, unilateral, irresponsible, unlawful and profoundly ineffective path laid out by Bush, Cheney & Co.

The question is not so much whether a Republican or a Democrat takes the White House in the next election; it's whether the American people can take back their country.

I don't think most Americans are up for perennial warfare. And whatever the polls might say, it's very hard for me to accept that the men and women who rise from their seats and cover their hearts at the start of sporting events are really in favor of dismantling the system of checks and balances, or holding people in prison for years without charging them, or torturing prisoners in U.S. custody, or giving the president the raw power and unsavory privileges of an emperor.

It was Richard Nixon who said, "When the president does it, that means that it is not illegal."

George W. Bush and Dick Cheney, operating behind the mammoth fig leaf of national security, took this theoretical absurdity to heart and put it into widespread practice.

There are, however, many thoughtful Americans who want to stop this calamitous disregard for the rule of law, two of whom I'll mention today — Frederick A. O. Schwarz Jr. and Senator Chris Dodd.

Mr. Schwarz is one of the most decent men I've known. I covered him when he was the chief lawyer for New York City during the Koch administration. He was then, and still is, the quintessential straight arrow.

In the 1970s Mr. Schwarz was chief counsel for the Church Committee (named after its chairman, Senator Frank Church), which uncovered extraordinary abuses and led to historic changes in the nation's intelligence services. He is now the senior counsel at the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University Law School.

To say that Mr. Schwarz is disturbed by some of the things that have occurred during the presidency of George W. Bush is an understatement. In a book to be published next month by The New Press, "Unchecked and Unbalanced: Presidential Power in a Time of Terror," Mr. Schwarz and a colleague at the Brennan Center, Aziz Z. Huq, write:

"For the first time in American history, the executive branch claims authority under the Constitution to set aside laws permanently — including prohibitions on torture and warrantless eavesdropping on Americans. A frightening idea decisively rejected at America's birth — that a president, like a king, can do no wrong — has reemerged to justify torture and indefinite presidential detention."

Undermining checks and balances here at home and acting unilaterally abroad have made us less safe, said Mr. Schwarz. Some of the actions the U.S. has taken "have so hurt our reputation," he said, "that Abu Ghraib and Guantánamo Bay have become in many eyes more the symbol of America than the Statue of Liberty."

Senator Dodd, a Connecticut Democrat who is running for president, has introduced legislation that would definitively bar the use of evidence obtained by torture or coercion, reinstate full U.S. adherence to the Geneva Conventions and restore rights of habeas corpus for certain terror suspects that were stripped away by the federal government last year.

(Habeas corpus is a legal proceeding that allows suspects to challenge their detention in a court of law. To get a sense of its significance, imagine that you were locked up somewhere and were not permitted to show that a mistake had been made, that you were innocent. Imagine that you, or a loved one, were held under those circumstances for a period of years, or forever.)

Senator Dodd said this corrosion of the rule of law has been tolerated primarily because "people have been frightened." As he put it, in an atmosphere of crisis, "the temptation to succumb to the demagoguery of these things is strong."

The senator and Mr. Schwarz, in their different ways, are among the many quiet patriots who are spreading the word that the very meaning of the United States, the whole point of this fragile experiment in representative democracy, will be lost if the nation's ironclad commitment to the rule of law is allowed to unravel.

Would C-SPAN Count? (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 19, 2007

Once again, Congress is flirting with the idea of censoring violence on TV. Once again, its efforts are misguided.

JUST WHAT, EXACTLY, constitutes a program that's too violent for kids to watch on TV? How about the story of a gun-blasting bounty hunter destroying a neighborhood as he tries to kill or capture his nihilistic offspring? That, after all, is what one sees in Walt Disney's "Lilo & Stitch," a hit movie for … kids, and a perfect illustration of the fundamental problems posed by Congress' flirtation with regulating violent TV programming.

Responding to a request from lawmakers, the Federal Communications Commission has drafted a report outlining what Congress might do to curb excessively violent programs. Objectionably violent shows, it says, could be banned during the hours that children are most likely to be watching TV (6 a.m. to 10 p.m.), just as indecent programming is. Congress could force cable operators to sell channels on an a la carte basis, rather than bundling them into packages that can't be customized. And the difficult task of defining excessive violence could be done by the federal government without violating the 1st Amendment.

There's plenty of evidence that television shows are more graphically violent than ever, both on cable networks and on free over-the-air TV. Simply noting this problem, however, doesn't prove that government censorship can solve it.

Requiring programs such as "24" to be aired after 10 p.m. wouldn't stop kids from watching a recorded version the next afternoon. Nor would it have much effect on the Internet, where networks are posting a growing number of reruns for viewers to watch on demand. And it's hard to imagine Congress barring news programs before 10 p.m., and there's no shortage of violence on the news.

A similar problem underlies the proposal to mandate a la carte cable pricing. It would be a boon to consumers if cable and satellite TV operators did business this way. But even in an a la carte regime, the channels with programming that distresses anti-violence activists are likely to be among the most frequently bought, simply because their programs are in high demand.

What censorship would do is deter networks from airing valuable but bloody shows that don't quite qualify as news, while generating lawsuits over what inevitably will be inconsistent standards for judging violence on TV. Would cartoons be treated the same way as live action? How about realistic historical fare? Would "Saving Private Ryan" get a pass? Then how about "The Passion of the Christ"? What about psychological violence?

The government shouldn't be making these calls; parents should. Online, there's plenty of help for parents trying to identify inappropriate shows for their kids, and there's technology in every TV set, cable converter box and satellite receiver to help screen out violent programming. If they still don't like how much violence their TV is bringing into their home, they should just turn it off.

The 10 Worst Presidents (USNEWS)

By Jay Tolson

U.S. News and World Report, February 19, 2007

Is George W. Bush's presidency shaping up to be one of the worst in U.S. history? You hear the question being asked more and more these days. And more and more, you hear the same answer. With Iraq a shambles and trust in the administration declining, it is probably not surprising that 54 percent of respondents in a recent USA Today/Gallup survey said that history would judge Bush a below-average or poor president, more than twice the number who gave such a rating to any of the five preceding occupants of the White House, including Gerald Ford and Jimmy Carter.

Public opinion is a notoriously fickle beast, of course, which is why historians and other custodians of the long view prefer to reserve judgment until they can speak of their subjects in the past tense. But clearly something about Bush ii has inspired many historians to abandon their usual caution. Meena Bose, a Hofstra University political scientist who has written about presidential ratings, says that the scholars' rush to rank the current president comes out of an acute awareness of the long-term consequences of his policies. "Since it's hard to see how Iraq will work out for the better," Bose says, " it's hard not to pass judgments."

Whatever his reasons, Princeton University historian Sean Wilentz created a minor sensation last year when he published a resounding verdict in Rolling Stone magazine: "Barring a cataclysmic event on the order of the terrorist attacks of September 11, after which the public might rally around the White House once again, there seems to be little the administration can do to avoid being ranked on the lowest tier of U.S. presidents." Bush partisans had a ready explanation for that assessment: liberal bias. But while Wilentz makes no secret of his liberalism, he referred to an informal survey of 415 historians in 2004 in which 81 percent of the respondents stated that the Bush administration would go down as a failure.

Bush's own view of how history will treat him comes across in his frequent allusions to Harry Truman, another famously unpopular sitting president whose reputation rose sharply as scholars began to appreciate his role in laying the foundations for

America's success in the Cold War. And if Iraq turns out to be a beacon of democracy in the Middle East 10 years from now, there will be a lot of scholars eating crow.

Attempts to rate the Bush presidency are at best premature, but they do raise valuable questions. Is there, to begin with, a scholarly consensus on who America's worst chief executives are? If there were a negative Mount Rushmore, which presidents would have their faces carved into it? What qualities seem to distinguish poor presidencies? And finally, do rankings really help us understand presidential leadership and individual presidencies, or do they, in the words of Princeton University political scientist Fred Greenstein, "divert attention from the full range of presidential experience"?

Credit, or blame, for the first scholarly ranking of the presidents usually goes to Harvard historian Arthur Schlesinger Sr., who conducted a poll for Life magazine in 1948. He asked 55 specialists in American history to rate the presidents as great, near great, average, below average, or failure. Claiming the cellar of that list were Warren G. Harding and, in ascending order, Ulysses S. Grant, Franklin Pierce, James Buchanan, Zachary Taylor, Millard Fillmore, Calvin Coolidge, John Tyler, Benjamin Harrison, and Herbert Hoover.

Don't call the new release Amazing Grace just another political thriller. What was once billed as an educational movie is fast becoming the model for bipartisanship. For weeks the hottest flick in the political and religious underground, Amazing Grace debuts at the White House this week, capping President Bush's focus on Black History Month. "We really think this is a wonderful movie that can inspire a new direction in Washington," says a Bushie.

"Our film shows the good that politics can do," says Erik Lokkesmoe, the film's project manager. Amazing Grace charts the effort of British politician William Wilberforce to end the slave trade 200 years ago with the help of an odd team that included former slave ship Capt. John Newton, who wrote Amazing Grace after finding God. Former Rep. Floyd Flake, now the president of Ohio's Wilberforce University, thinks all his former House colleagues should see it. "They could learn a lesson from it," he tells us. Even though it doesn't hit theaters until February 23, Bush is late to the endorsement parade. A crowd from liberal Rep. John Lewis to conservative Sen. Sam Brownback and groups from the Humane Society to Focus on the Family have applauded it, prompting movie makers to almost yawn at the White House invitation. "We find that these kinds of invitations and opportunities are everywhere," says Lokkesmoe.

This Supreme Court Stuff Is Hard Work

He didn't use the word lazy, but that was Sen. Arlen Specter's suggestion when he asked Associate Supreme Court Justice Anthony Kennedy if taking two months off in summer limited the number of cases heard by the high court. "I don't think my colleagues would say we are under-worked," says Kennedy. "We are very proud that we get work done every year on schedule and on time. Our docket is 100 percent finished on July 1st," he explains. "The only way we can do that is by taking two months to read and recover and so forth before we come back."

Shaming Those Wimpy D.C. Drivers

OK, so Washingtonians can't drive in the snow. But do we have to be sneered at by smug snow senators like Vermont's Patrick Leahy? On a day last week when a few inches shut down much of the District, Leahy opened a committee hearing with some Green Mountain State chest-pounding. "A little snow's not going to stop us," he bragged at the sparsely populated hearing. "We had 2 feet of snow overnight," he says of his home state. "I'm told that a number of places opened as much as an hour late. It's a new generation, and they go slowly."

Jackie to Joan: Rein In Your Man

Kennedy buffs rejoice: What's thought to be the biggest-ever cache of JFK and Jackie O memorabilia is heading to auction, including a racy letter from Jackie to Sen. Edward Kennedy's former wife, Joan, urging her to rein in her wandering hubby, a life preserver from JFK's sailboat Victura, and the former first lady's own 8-mm movie camera. We've noted auctions by Alexander Autographs before, but this one, online February 24-25 at alexautographs.com, is really rich. Just consider the Jackie-to-Joan letter, worth an estimated $5,000 to $7,000. In the unsigned letter, Jackie tells Joan to take charge of the family and balk when Teddy spends too much time with his siblings or worse. "This is the 20th century-not the 19th-" she pens, "where little woman stayed home on a pedestal with the kids & her rosary." The best part is how the goods became public. Seems a former helper recovered the items from Joan's Cape Cod home and put them in storage. But she forgot to pay the bill; the stuff was auctioned off, and the top bidder is cashing in.

It's usually thought of as the kinder, gentler arm of immigration, but U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services helps nab an average of five criminals a day, including the occasional murder suspect -- a point that agency Director Emilio Gonzalez underscores when he discusses the USCIS role in the Homeland Security Department.

A little more than a year ago, Mr. Gonzalez took over the agency in charge of granting citizenship, green cards signifying a legal permanent immigrant and visas for work or study. In that year, he has started a pilot program to test a new naturalized citizenship exam, finished off a backlog of millions of benefit applications and created several offices that would put national security first at the agency.

But those who interact most with USCIS say Mr. Gonzalez's tenure will succeed or fail on his latest proposal to increase fees an average of more than 60 percent in order to finish the transformation from a much-maligned 20th-century paper-based bureaucracy into 21st-century streamlined, self-sufficient, services-based enterprise.

"All those people that are out there complaining about long waits, dingy buildings, poorly trained personnel, this is an opportunity for us to take those into account and fix it," Mr. Gonzalez said last week from his office overlooking Massachusetts Avenue and Union Station.

"We have been woefully underfunded, even under the days of [the former Immigration and Naturalization Service] and the Justice Department," he said in defending the proposed new fees. "There's absolutely no way I could in good conscience continue to head an agency that's treading water. We're coasting. And when you're coasting, you're going backwards; nobody ever coasted uphill."

It's a touchy issue that goes straight to the heart of legal immigration and who should pick up the tab for applying.

His proposal is already meeting resistance on Capitol Hill, where some Democrats called on him to rethink how the agency does business.

"Many in the immigrant community see the increase for what it is -- increasing the cost of the American dream, telling those least fortunate among us they probably need not apply," said Rep. John Conyers Jr., Michigan Democrat and chairman of the House Judiciary Committee.

But as a Cuban-born immigrant whose parents brought him to the U.S. as a child, Mr. Gonzalez considers himself an advocate for the immigrant community and says he hopes "to convey that immigration, done properly, works."

And as a former Army officer, he is fond of saying there is a reason that his agency is part of Homeland Security. He takes pride in the fact that his agency turns over an average of five names a day to law-enforcement agencies -- for everything up to and including those being sought on murder charges.

"Those are folks who think they can get away with murder, literally, come in to get a new green card, come in with a wife or girlfriend to help them apply for a benefit. We run a check and find out there's a warrant on these folks," Mr. Gonzalez said.

He has created a special unit to handle difficult national-security cases and also created a benefit revocation unit, which is designed to help officials at the local offices go after those whose green card or citizenship should be taken away.

The balance between security and openness doesn't always strike outsiders as correct, and they let him know it.

"I get hate mail by the hundreds," he said, adding that it comes from both sides of the debate.

Immigrant advocates say they don't see much progress from Mr. Gonzalez's first year.

"I can't say that he's really made his mark yet," said Crystal Williams, deputy director of programs at the American Immigration Lawyers Association. "Certainly, the fees are his first attempt to make a mark, and it's not the kind of mark you like to see."

She said that the "jury is still out" on the citizenship test and that many of the other issues he's trying to tackle are perennial problems that others have failed to solve.

"I'm not seeing an awful lot new here," she said. "Admittedly, he's only the second director of USCIS, but there have been commissioners of INS for many years before him who have tried to address the adjudication side of things before him, and quite honestly, none of them have succeeded."

She also said she's noticed a change that actually seems to have begun after the September 11 terrorist attacks. Before that, she said, adjudicators used to look at applications and see whether the preponderance of the evidence favored approval.

"Now many -- if not most -- of them seem to look at an application and ask themselves, how can I deny this, and if they can't find a way to deny it, only then approve it," she said.

Mr. Gonzalez raised some eyebrows in Miami two weeks ago when he compared the immigration debate in Congress over granting citizenship to illegal aliens to the civil rights movement. In the interview last week, he said he wasn't trying to stir controversy.

DOJ_NMG_0133867

"The comparison is not on the substance but on the scope," he said. "You have legislation that is going to change the lives of millions and millions of people. You have legislation that is going to address individuals that are invisible today yet are standing right in front of us."

'Milestone Of Achievement' On The Hill (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

At 6 feet 2 inches tall, Lorraine C. Miller cuts a striking figure in the polished hallways of the U.S. Capitol. Last week, the woman with regal bearing gained another, more lasting distinction. She was sworn in as clerk of the House of Representatives, the first African American to hold the seat since it was created in 1789.

"This is another milestone of achievement, not just of black people but of all people," said Thomas Tyler, who directs the senior choir at the Shiloh Baptist Church in the District, where Miller sings first alto.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) tapped Miller for the job, citing her work ethic, knowledge of the Hill and ability to make connections across party lines, in addition to her trailblazer status.

"I was the first woman, and I had a responsibility to do other firsts," Pelosi said at a recent reception honoring Miller. "I've done a lot of things since I became speaker, but none have given me more pride and been more thrilling to me than to swear in Lorraine Miller."

Miller had been among Pelosi's senior advisers. After the Democrats won control of Congress in November and it was clear that Pelosi would ascend to the House speaker's job, members of her staff began lobbying for various appointments. All except Miller.

"I sought her out and asked if she wanted the job," Pelosi said. "That speaks to her modesty, that she didn't put her name out, that I had to ask her if she was interested."

She was, of course.

The clerk runs the day-to-day operations of the House of Representatives, handling everything from stationery supplies to the voting process on the House floor to managing the page program. She said she intends to put special focus on the page program, which has been plagued by scandal, with former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) resigning after sending inappropriate computer messages to male former pages.

The nonpartisan office oversees nine divisions that employ 276 people. It pays $163,700 a year and comes with one of the best offices in the Capitol, boasting a commanding view of the Mall and the Washington Monument.

But Miller's rise to become an officer of the House did not begin with great promise.

She started her working life as a high school government teacher in Fort Worth. She was more intrigued by politics than teaching, however, and once a year for 10 years she wrote to then-Rep. Jim Wright (D-Tex.) and inquired about openings on his staff. Each time, she received a standard rejection letter.

Eventually, she moved to Washington, enrolled in a graduate program at American University and campaigned until she landed a job in Wright's office. "She doesn't take no for an answer, so you might as well save time" is how Pelosi described Miller's tenacity.

In her first two weeks in Wright's office, Miller answered telephones until one day a caller asked for the chief of staff. Miller said he was unavailable. "Tell him it's Jim," the caller said. "Jim who?" she asked.

She was reassigned shortly thereafter but quickly memorized the sound of Wright's voice. She developed a habit of memorizing the voices of House members and now can identify most by voice, Republican or Democrat.

Miller worked for Wright for 11 years, including while he was speaker. She also worked for another speaker, Thomas S. Foley (D-Wash.), as well as Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.). She worked for two years in the White House during the Clinton administration as deputy assistant to the president, serving as his liaison to the House, and joined the Federal Trade Commission and later the Federal Communications Commission.

She still owns a house in Forth Worth, where she returns once a month, as well as her family's cattle farm in East Texas. "I love going down there," she said of the farm. "The smell of cow manure and pine needles. It's so relaxed, so different from life here. The only worry is what are you going to bring to the church social."

Though she maintains her Texas roots, and cheers for the Dallas Cowboys, Miller has made connections in the District. Since 2004, she has served as president of the D.C. chapter of the NAACP.

Family, fellow churchgoers and a large contingent of friends from Fort Worth, including two Texas state legislators, toasted Miller at the evening reception. Several wore yellow roses, as in "The Yellow Rose of Texas," pinned to their lapels.

DOJ_NMG_0133868

"She will now have two names -- Madam Clerk and Poopie Pie," said Miller's sister, Marietta. The two women call each other best friend and share a house in LeDroit Park, where Marietta says it is not unusual for Lorraine to return from work at 2:30 a.m.

Miller is so garrulous that she repeatedly interrupted her own remarks at the party to call out to familiar faces in the room. "If a young person could look at my journey and feel inspired to achieve . . . Hi, Ernie," she said. "Hi, Dwight -- I remember Dwight when he attended dental school at Howard. He worked at Church's Fried Chicken. He makes grand theft money now," she told the howling crowd.

NASA Goes Deep (NYT)

By Carolyn Porco

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

AFTER years of spending our nation's space budget building an orbiting space station of questionable utility, serviced by an operationally expensive space shuttle of unsafe design, NASA has set a new direction for the future of human spaceflight. Once again, we have our sights on the Moon ... and beyond. We are finally, bodily, going to make our way into space, this time to stay.

It is an opinion long and widely held within the space-exploration community that the Nixon administration's termination of the program that built the Saturn V Moon rocket was a gargantuan mistake.

One of the biggest challenges in exploring space is propulsion — that is, getting from point A to B efficiently, safely and quickly. And when the cargo is human, the challenges are even greater. One of our crowning technological achievements during the 1960s was the Apollo program and, in particular, the development of the Saturn V rocket. The Saturn V was the largest, most powerful vehicle the United States had ever built. It had a launching capacity more than five times greater, a developmental cost 25 percent lower and a build-and-operate cost less than half of that of today's space shuttle.

In those early days, the possibilities for human space travel were intoxicating. Back then, NASA plans called for an aggressive integrated human flight program that would expand on the developments of Apollo: the establishment of a 50-person lunar base, a 100-person Earth-orbiting space station and human landfall on Mars, all by the mid-1980s. Those plans also included a 50-person semi-permanent Martian base by the end of the 20th century. Instead, we went nowhere.

Why? Because, largely for political reasons, we renounced the Moon, abandoned Apollo and the Saturn V and retreated to low Earth orbit, where we've spent the last 25 years going around in circles.

The cost to the nation of this misstep was enormous. For starters, we lost an investment, adjusted for inflation to 2007 dollars, of $160 billion. That was the cost to get to, land on, walk on, drive on and otherwise explore the Moon. (Of that amount, $29 billion, in inflation-adjusted dollars, was the approximate cost of the Saturn V.)

What's more, the production facilities for the Saturn V and the other lunar exploration components, like the command and lunar modules, were all closed. At that point, we lost both the technological means for human deep space exploration and the collective knowledge of tens of thousands of engineers and scientists trained in human spaceflight.

Equally troubling is what we put in place of Apollo. The $38 billion developmental cost of the shuttle has gotten us nowhere in the solar system fast. And the International Space Station could have been built with only half a dozen Saturn V launchings instead of the more than two dozen shuttle trips that will be required to finish it. The bottom line: a colossal misuse of funds and a disheartening lack of progress and loss of time.

The termination of the Saturn V program also had a stifling effect on the robotic exploration of other planets. In essence, we lost the ability to deliver larger, and in some cases faster, payloads elsewhere in the solar system.

Take, as an example, the 5,600-kilogram Cassini spacecraft, which was launched in 1997 and is now in orbit around Saturn. Its launching was timed so that after spending two years looping around the inner solar system to pick up speed, it could rendezvous with massive Jupiter for an additional boost that would send it to Saturn. All told, its flight time took seven years.

Had the Saturn V, modified with an appropriate fourth upper stage, been used to launch Cassini directly to Jupiter first, its flight time to Saturn could have been cut by more than half. In space, as on Earth, time is money, and the money saved could have been spent elsewhere.

Alternatively, for the same flight time, a vehicle of greater launching capacity can deliver a heavier payload. Take as an example the 480-kilogram New Horizons spacecraft, launched over a year ago to fly by Pluto in 2015 and eventually to explore the Kuiper Belt of icy debris that lies beyond it. Had it been launched on a modified Saturn V rocket, New Horizons could have carried a payload that was 15 times heavier and far more scientifically capable.

In the end, instead of having a ubiquitous presence throughout the solar system, humans haven't set foot on the Moon in 35 years, and even our robotic explorations in that time have been throttled because we deliberately reduced our access to deep space.

Today, however, NASA is again looking up and out. Vigorous efforts are under way to complete the space station in order to fulfill international commitments that would be unwise to violate. When that is done, the plan is to retire the space shuttle in 2010 in favor of a new program to return to the Moon, with a party of humans, by 2020. A mainstay of this program is the Ares launching system, capable of sending 65 metric tons to the Moon — exceeding the capacity of the Saturn V by more than 40 percent.

The official plans call not for flag-planting and grab-a-few-rocks-and-go but, by 2025, a solar-powered, human-tended, continuously inhabited research outpost rising from either the north or south pole of the Moon, where sunlight is persistent and water ice may be present. Sustainability, made possible in part by the use of lunar resources, is one goal. Another is on-site preparations for a push to the next outpost, Mars.

And human spaceflight is not the only enterprise to benefit. Robotic reconnaissance, which by necessity must precede the dispatch of humans, has been ongoing for nearly 50 years. In that time, all the simple things have been done. Future missions to the planets and their moons will be more ambitious than anything yet tried.

As one example, imagine what our future robotic travels around Saturn might be like. The Saturn planetary system includes Titan, a cold Mercury-sized moon with a dense, organic-laden, hazy atmosphere and a strangely Earth-like, variegated surface sculptured by winds and hydrocarbon rains. It also includes Enceladus, a moon one-tenth the size of Titan, whose jets of water vapor and fine icy particles extend thousands of miles into space and may very likely erupt from organic-rich liquid water reservoirs just below its surface — making this satellite arguably the most promising target we have available to us for astrobiological investigation.

A scientifically comprehensive mission to this part of the solar system, using Ares and a Cassini-like trajectory to Saturn, could easily include several exploratory vehicles. One would be a Saturn orbiter far more capable than Cassini. This vehicle, in turn, would be large enough to carry and deliver a fully equipped balloon-borne scientific payload to float through the atmosphere of Titan and study its surface up close, and an Enceladus lander with equipment that could determine the moon's physical properties and ascertain whether or not pre-biotic chemistry, and perhaps life, has arisen there.

In other words, robotic exploration, and the insights that will be gained from it into the character, development and evolution of planetary bodies and even life itself, will be taken to new heights and, in turn, pave the way for the eventual arrival of humans throughout the solar system. Anyone up for an extreme excursion to the Enceladus Interplanetary Geyser Park?

All told, the subtext is invigorating and unmistakable: Humanity's future need not be confined to mere survival on our home planet. Other worlds beckon, we know how to reach them and we will once more be outward bound.

And we will not be alone. China, India and Russia, all eager to be or remain prominent players on the world stage, have independent plans to stride the lunar surface. And Australia, Canada, Japan and the member nations of the European Space Agency will be pooling their resources with us in the return to the Moon — a circumstance that will bring the cost of the effort to any one nation within reason.

THIS won't be a space race so much as a global exodus undertaken by an international community. And peaceful cooperation among nations, as a tangible means to build strong lasting international partnerships and defuse tensions and conflicts in the future, will be a welcome result.

In hindsight, maybe the pace of progress was predictable. Humans first explored Antarctica in the early 20th century. Decades passed before we had the technology that would allow us to establish a permanent presence. History will indicate the same for our interplanetary forays. Our initial "small step for a man" on the Moon took place in 1969. A half-century later, we will be there anew, to live and work.

To reach that future will require two critical ingredients: adequate financing and a long-term cross-administration commitment that supports steady, uninterrupted progress. Our first reach for the Moon took us from President Kennedy's spoken words to the lunar surface in little over eight years under a budget profile that saw peaks in annual NASA budget of more than $30 billion in current dollars — a shocking number by today's standards and a good measure of how important we then considered the endeavor.

While sustained budgets of that magnitude are out of the question today, what is not out of the question is our ability to pay to keep the goal front and center. We are now spending in Iraq, in a single month, $9 billion — more than half the annual budget NASA needs to stay on course.

Forty-five years ago today, John Glenn Jr. became the first American to venture into orbit around the Earth. Just 9 years old, I knew at that moment that the future would be big and wide, and that I might go places no one had ever been before.

There could be no better way today to encourage an equally optimistic belief in the future than to embark on an odyssey that presents tremendous challenges, demands discipline and rigor, requires decades-long focus, inspires international cooperation, promotes lasting peace, improves life for all and paints a stirring vision of an expanded human presence beyond the Earth. There could be no better way to say: the future is boundless, and it belongs to us.

Bipartisan Coalition Pushes For Education Reform (Politico)

By Andrew Glass

Politico, February 20, 2007

Business and civic leaders, worried about the poor preparation U.S. public schools are giving students to compete in the 21st century's global economy, have forged a bipartisan coalition to press for broad education reforms. Some of the first fruits of their new partnership are scheduled to be shown on Feb. 28, when the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the Center for American Progress plan to unveil their joint platform for change. The project has been in the works since last April.

Their common initiative comes in the wake of a nationwide poll the chamber conducted on how the business community assesses the American education system. In response to one key question, 87 percent of the 571 business organizations that answered the online survey said the current No Child Left Behind requirements should extend all the way through high school.

To qualify for federal subsidies, the law, enacted in 2001, requires public schools to annually measure the reading and math skill levels of students in grades three through eight and at least once in high school.

"It absolutely shocked me when I got those results back," said Jacque Johnson, executive director of education and workforce development at the chamber. "They revealed that there's wide support out there for taking action. There's a pre-election window that's open to extend the provisions with a target date for action in May or June, but that window is likely to close next year if nothing is done."

On Feb. 13, a "Commission on No Child Left Behind," sponsored by the Aspen Institute, released its own blueprint for what Congress should do. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings said that report, in laying out needed adjustments, reflects "the broad, bipartisan commitment to improving our nation's schools that was behind" the original legislation.

"It was a good optic," Johnson said of the commission's news conference, which Spellings attended. All four major congressional players were there, which Johnson took to be a positive sign. They are Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., chairman of the Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions; Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee; and their respective ranking members, Sen. Michael B. Enzi, R-Wyo., and Rep. Buck McKeon, R-Calif.

"The key people on the Hill want it (the reauthorization) to be bipartisan," Johnson added.

For next week's launch of the education reform initiative, the chamber and the center are presenting their top guns: Thomas J. Donohue, the chamber's veteran president and CEO, and John D. Podesta, the center's president and CEO who was former President Bill Clinton's chief of staff. In addition to releasing the reform proposals, the two groups plan to grade all 50 state education programs, plus that of the District of Columbia, from kindergarten through 12th grade. The idea is to gauge how well today's students are being prepared for tomorrow's jobs.

"We will not rank them," Johnson said, referring to the analysis, which is called "Leaders and Laggards: A State-by-State Report Card on Educational Effectiveness." Johnson said the "report card" would cover nine specific areas, including "academic achievement, the rigor of its academic standards, post-secondary workforce readiness and, somewhat uniquely, a business-oriented look at 'return on investment.' "

Frederick M. Hess, director of education policy studies at the conservative-leaning American Enterprise Institute, acted as a third partner in preparing the analysis. In 2004, he published "Common Sense School Reform" (Palgrave MacMillan). His book begins: "School reform is the province of utopians, apologists, and well-intended practitioners who inhabit a cloistered world where conviction long ago displaced competence."

"My views haven't changed in the last three years," said Hess, who holds a doctorate in government from Harvard.

He'll be joined in a panel discussion on Feb. 28 by Cynthia G. Brown, director of education policy for the Podesta-led center, and Ulrich Boser, a contributing editor at U.S. News and World Report. Arthur J. Rothkopf, a senior vice president at the chamber who was President George H.W. Bush's deputy secretary of transportation, will moderate the discussion; he recently retired as president of Lafayette College in Easton, Pa.

What Can Schools Do? (USAT)

By Charles C. Haynes And Marvin W. Berkowitz

USA Today, February 20, 2007

After the endless headlines involving corrupt politicians, corporate cheats, doped-up sports stars and Internet predators, you might think that the American people would be demanding more character education in schools.

DOJ_NMG_0133871

Think again.

"Good character," like the weather, gets a lot of talk — but too little action. We bemoan the loss of integrity and lack of responsibility in American public life. We decry the numbing statistics about teenage substance abuse, sexual promiscuity and gang activity. We wring our hands over surveys that report widespread cheating in schools and colleges. And then we move on to more important things.

Test scores, for example.

That's right: Standardized test results seem to trump everything else in education these days. No matter how many warning bells are sounded about the crisis of character in our society and despite the long-standing understanding that education is for the whole child, all we want to hear is how each school did on the exam.

Reading and math are important, but if we care about our kids (and our future) shouldn't we be paying more attention to the kinds of human beings who do the math and read the books?

"To educate a person in mind and not in morals," said Theodore Roosevelt, "is to educate a menace to society."

Fortunately, taking academics and character seriously in schools isn't an either/or proposition. Done well, character development enhances academic performance. Just ask Kristen Pelster, principal of Ridgewood Middle School, a rural/suburban school of about 503 students (42% of them economically disadvantaged) in Arnold, Mo.

When Pelster arrived as assistant principal six years ago, Ridgewood had all the marks of the proverbial "failing school": high absenteeism, low academic achievement and a constant stream of discipline problems. Located in a poor community plagued by inadequate housing and meth labs, the school had graffiti on the walls, profanity echoing in the halls and a rusty chain fence surrounding it. It could have been the movie set for Blackboard Jungle.

Working as a team, Pelster and then-Principal Tim Crutchley, who was also new, made a commitment to transform Ridgewood. First, they diagnosed the problem: Students didn't feel as though anyone cared about them or the school.

Then they articulated a vision for "a school where there is caring, a sense of belonging and academic achievement."

Facing angry parents and a dispirited staff, Crutchley and Pelster knew they had much convincing to do. When they first arrived at Ridgewood, dozens of parents had requested that their children be moved to another school. Step One was to clean up the physical environment (the rusty fence was the first thing to go).

Initially, "caring" was a lot like "tough love." Crutchley and Pelster raised the bar on attendance, often going to truant students' homes to bring them to school. They established a "failure is not an option" program that prohibited the giving of zeros for missing work. Students had to make up missing homework during lunch hour. Teachers were required to integrate character education into academic lessons and behavior management.

By the end of the first year, the two leaders had won over a core team of teachers, critical support that, with the help of parents and members of the community, let the school progress.

The Ridgewood activists learned early on that "character education" is far more than slogans or quick-fix lessons about a word of the week. To be effective, character education must become integral to the daily actions of everyone in the school community.

It starts with the faculty. Early in the process, Crutchley and Pelster drove out teachers who didn't show concern for students and recruited teachers who did.

They allocated resources to provide staff development. This modest investment in teacher training — a few thousand dollars — constituted almost the entire cost to implement their plan.

Effective character education is not an add-on, but instead uses "teachable moments" in every classroom. Seventh-grade teacher Kacie Heiken, for example, has her students write and illustrate fairy tales that have a positive moral lesson. The students go to elementary schools and read their stories to classes before donating the books to a local children's hospital.

In American history classes, students study veterans, war and military service, culminating in a school-wide celebration of Veterans Day that includes breakfast and a patriotic slide show for local veterans and their families.

Science students recently collaborated with a local church group to build a nature trail.

Ridgewood's effort extends beyond the curriculum. For half an hour each day, students meet with an adult mentor in small family-like advisory groups. "The advisory helps form strong relationships between staff and student and among students. It creates a sense of being more of a family than an institution," Crutchley says.

But character education at Ridgewood isn't solely, or even predominantly, a top-down process. Daily class meetings include ethics discussions led by students. A one-semester course in "teen leadership" prepares students to take the lead in implementing an honor code and dealing with problems such as bullying.

Parents also play a key role. After all, they have primary responsibility for the moral development of their kids. While some parents have abdicated this responsibility, most want schools to reinforce and model the moral values taught at home. Many

Ridgewood parents now volunteer at the school, and attendance at parent conferences has risen from 44.5% in 2000 to 75% in 2005.

Today, Crutchley is assistant superintendent of the district and Pelster, now principal, presides over a transformed Ridgewood.

Academic performance is up, disciplinary referrals are down by more than 70%, and the student failure rate has dropped to zero. Attendance has also improved, with the formerly daily home visits for truant students now down to four or five per year.

The rusty fence and graffiti are long gone, replaced by displays of student classwork and high expectations: Ridgewood has been on Missouri's list of Top Ten Most Improved Schools for four of the past five years.

In October, Ridgewood was one of 10 schools and districts in the nation to be recognized as a 2006 National School of Character by the Character Education Partnership.

Ridgewood's turnaround may be unusual, but it is not unique. "Schools of Character," schools that are implementing a comprehensive plan for character education, can be found in school districts across the USA. No study has yet been done on how many schools are providing character education, but the need is clear and the interest is understandably immense.

Ridgewood is a remarkable case study, but the success of character education is well-documented. It works.

Victor Battistich of the University of Missouri-St. Louis, examined all the scientific research of the past 15 years and concluded that "comprehensive, high-quality character education" can prevent a wide range of problems, including "aggressive and antisocial behaviors, drug use, precocious sexual activity, criminal activities, academic underachievement and school failure."

So why aren't all schools doing it? In the early history of public education, developing good character was seen as an essential part of preparing people for citizenship in a democratic society. But in the latter part of the 20th century, many public schools moved away from the traditional emphasis on character and citizenship as American society grew more complex and diverse.

Today, character education is making a comeback. Thirty-one states mandate or encourage character education by statute. While pronouncements by legislatures don't necessarily translate into quality character education programs, it's a start.

Much is at stake in getting this right. At this critical moment in America's history, we need far more than higher math and reading scores. We need citizens who have the strength of character to uphold democratic freedom in the face of unprecedented challenges at home and abroad.

"Only a virtuous people are capable of freedom," is the familiar aphorism from Benjamin Franklin. Less well-known, but worth recalling, is the warning in the sentence that follows: "As nations become corrupt and vicious, they have more need of masters."

Charles C. Haynes is senior scholar at the First Amendment Center in Washington. Marvin W. Berkowitz is the Sanford N. McDonnell Professor of Character Education at the University of Missouri-St. Louis.

McCain: Rumsfeld Was One Of The Worst (AP)

By Bruce Smith, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 20, 2007

Republican presidential candidate John McCain said Monday the war in Iraq has been mismanaged for years and former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld will be remembered as one of the worst in history.

"We are paying a very heavy price for the mismanagement — that's the kindest word I can give you — of Donald Rumsfeld, of this war," the Arizona senator told an overflow crowd of more than 800 at a retirement community near Hilton Head Island, S.C. "The price is very, very heavy and I regret it enormously."

McCain, the ranking Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee, complained that Rumsfeld never put enough troops on the ground to succeed in Iraq.

"I think that Donald Rumsfeld will go down in history as one of the worst secretaries of defense in history," McCain said to applause.

The comments were in sharp contrast to McCain's statement when Rumsfeld resigned in November, and failed to address the reality that President Bush is the commander in chief.

"While Secretary Rumsfeld and I have had our differences, he deserves Americans' respect and gratitude for his many years of public service," McCain said last year when Rumsfeld stepped down.

On a two-day campaign swing in South Carolina, McCain fielded questions from the crowd for more than an hour and said the United States can succeed in Iraq with additional troops and a new strategy. McCain has been a strong proponent of using more troops and favors Bush's increase of some 21,500 U.S. forces in the nearly four-year-old war.

"I have been saying for 3 1/2 years that we would be in this sad situation and this critical situation we are in today," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0133873

McCain's bid for president was sidetracked in South Carolina in 2000 after a victory in New Hampshire. George W. Bush won the primary here and went on to win the nomination and White House.

"In life, one of the worst things you can do is hold a grudge," he said. "I felt the important thing for me to do with my life was to move forward after we lost our race. You have seen other people who have lost who mire themselves in bitterness and self pity. That's not what my life is all about."

Some in the crowd were Bush supporters who have not yet decided on a 2008 candidate.

"It's too early to say," said Paul Baker, a retiree from Niagara Falls, N.Y., who has lived in South Carolina about four years. "I'm just going to wait it out and see what happens."

McCain: Rumsfeld Was One Of The Worst (AP)

By Bruce Smith

AP, February 20, 2007

Republican presidential candidate John McCain said Monday the war in Iraq has been mismanaged for years and former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld will be remembered as one of the worst in history.

"We are paying a very heavy price for the mismanagement — that's the kindest word I can give you — of Donald Rumsfeld, of this war," the Arizona senator told an overflow crowd of more than 800 at a retirement community near Hilton Head Island, S.C. "The price is very, very heavy and I regret it enormously."

McCain, the ranking Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee, complained that Rumsfeld never put enough troops on the ground to succeed in Iraq.

"I think that Donald Rumsfeld will go down in history as one of the worst secretaries of defense in history," McCain said to applause.

The comments were in sharp contrast to McCain's statement when Rumsfeld resigned in November, and failed to address the reality that President Bush is the commander in chief.

"While Secretary Rumsfeld and I have had our differences, he deserves Americans' respect and gratitude for his many years of public service," McCain said last year when Rumsfeld stepped down.

On a two-day campaign swing in South Carolina, McCain fielded questions from the crowd for more than an hour and said the United States can succeed in Iraq with additional troops and a new strategy. McCain has been a strong proponent of using more troops and favors Bush's increase of some 21,500 U.S. forces in the nearly four-year-old war.

"I have been saying for 3 1/2 years that we would be in this sad situation and this critical situation we are in today," he said.

McCain's bid for president was sidetracked in South Carolina in 2000 after a victory in New Hampshire. George W. Bush won the primary here and went on to win the nomination and White House.

"In life, one of the worst things you can do is hold a grudge," he said. "I felt the important thing for me to do with my life was to move forward after we lost our race. You have seen other people who have lost who mire themselves in bitterness and self pity. That's not what my life is all about."

Some in the crowd were Bush supporters who have not yet decided on a 2008 candidate.

"It's too early to say," said Paul Baker, a retiree from Niagara Falls, N.Y., who has lived in South Carolina about four years. "I'm just going to wait it out and see what happens."

Why John McCain (WSJ)

By Phil Gramm

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

Four years ago I decided to quit while I was ahead and concluded my 24-year political career. When I left the Senate, I also left the public policy debate and talking-head role to those actually in the arena. However, because I believe that the 2008 presidential election will be the most important election since 1980, I have decided to rejoin the national debate and exercise my right as a private citizen to express a strongly held opinion about who should be elected, and why.

When the poet Edwin Markham wrote "Lincoln, the Man of the People," he spoke of the gathering crisis and the man sent to "meet the mortal need." For Markham, the gathering crisis was the great Civil War, and the man sent to meet the mortal need was Abraham Lincoln.

Today's mortal need is for a leader who trusts our people enough to tell them the truth about the festering domestic problems that have been swept under the rug for a quarter-century. We need a president who can face up to these problems even as he leads an increasingly reluctant country in a war against a dangerous enemy that will follow us home from any battlefield on which we are defeated.

Where is such a leader to be found? American history gives us a clue where to look: When the times have required great leaders in the past, they seem to have been there all the while, just waiting to be called. John Adams wrote in his diary in 1774 that "We have not Men, fit for the Times. We are deficient in Genius, in Education, in Travel, in Fortune -- in every Thing. I feel unutterable Anxiety."

Yet, at that very moment, the greatest assemblage of leadership the world has ever known was emerging all around him. We seem, for some reason, to be able to see greatness only in the rearview mirror.

I believe the man we need to meet the mortal need today is here. He is experienced, but has not lost his common sense or his ability to be outraged. His conservatism is not the result of a studied philosophy, but of common sense and personal observation. His name is John McCain. He might not be the right president for all times, but he is the right president for these times.

Today we have an unnecessary budget deficit, the result of wanton waste and dishonesty. John McCain has been a lonely but clarion voice on this issue: "Bills that perpetuate wasteful spending should be vetoed," he says. "Not some of them, all of them. The numbers should shock us; indifference to them should shame us."

This is not a concern he discovered when he decided to run for president. I first heard him say these things when we served together in the House many years ago. To ask if he would really take on the spending establishment that runs Congress is to ask if water will wet, if fire will burn. If you want to end the spending spree in Washington, he is your man.

John McCain understands instinctively that just as "in war, there is no substitute for victory, in peace, there is no substitute for growth." He believes that "the strength of our economy promotes freedom not just at home but in every distant corner of our planet. End growth in America and the lights start to go out all over the world."

The success of the Reagan program taught Sen. McCain that growth requires responsible, limited government and ever-expanding freedom. As he has said, "The answer to deficits is not to raise taxes or repeal the [Bush] tax cuts but to restrain our spending habit. If the federal government can not be funded by current revenues then we must reduce its size."

Others tell us that pigs have wings and we can have it all: more spending, more government, lower taxes and more freedom. John McCain's says that "tax cuts work best when accompanied by lower spending." Yes, he understands that cutting taxes creates the incentive to work, save and invest; and that sometimes you have to cut taxes first to get the economy going and then control spending. But in his common-sense view, as in the immutable laws that govern our world, you can't let government spend it and let the taxpayer keep it for very long. Nothing endangers the Bush tax cuts today as much as the spending orgy that the very proponents of those tax cuts allowed to occur.

Sen. McCain stands tall, and often alone, in his support for free trade against special interests and against the politicians who would risk destroying our economy to win an election. His view is straightforward and ratified by all our national experience: "Free trade is the key to economic growth, and a key to U.S. economic success. We need to stand up for free trade with no ifs, ands or buts about it. We let free trade and globalization be politicized at our own peril."

But he is not blind or callous to the real costs imposed on the few as trade and globalization create prosperity for the many. In his view, "We must remain committed to education, retraining and help for displaced workers, all the while reminding ourselves that our ability to change is a great strength of our nation." But, he adds, "We cannot let fear and the appeals of protectionism lead us backwards."

John McCain is one of the few politicians in America who consistently levels with us about the mounting insolvency of Social Security and Medicare. "We have made promises that we cannot keep. Some day the government will be forced to make dramatic cuts in these programs, or crippling increases in taxes on workers or both." For Sen. McCain, salvaging the social safety net and saving the economy means making the hard choices now to right the current system for those already in it, and building a new system for future workers based on real investments, not empty promises.

Being honest about Social Security and Medicare is a necessary but not sufficient condition for fixing a broken system. Think for a moment about all the possible candidates running for president next year, and then ask yourself this question: Who else has shown any ability to reach across the party divide and build a bipartisan consensus? Who else could lead worried Americans and shame a reluctant Congress into action? Who else would stay on course with political flak exploding all around him, and his political life hanging in the balance? The easy answer is -- no one but John McCain.

Which candidate is best equipped to lead an America at war, with battle lines raging in far away places and on Main Street, where you live? It is in meeting this mortal need more than any other that John McCain stands head and shoulders above the alternatives. Only he has the life experience to know what is really entailed in sending young men and women into combat. With a son at Annapolis and a son in the Marine Corps, he still has plenty of "skin in the game." His life experience and intimate knowledge of defense and foreign policy give Sen. McCain moral authority.

In a democracy, power is useless unless you can use it; what candidate would have more credibility in using power and rallying public support for a long and difficult struggle? Who would be more effective than John McCain in using American military power in its highest and best use -- the deterrence of adversaries? A president -- who knows war and has the authority to unite our people to make war when we must -- can thwart enemies, unite friends and win peace. John McCain would be that president.

Greatness seems to visit those who know themselves, what they believe in and why. Abraham Lincoln knew those things. The savior of the union was a protectionist and a proponent of big government projects -- and in the 1850s or 1870s he might have made an average or poor president. But in 1860, Lincoln was the right man for that moment. He was on a mission to save the union, and he did.

The great leader of my lifetime was Ronald Reagan. He knew what he believed in and what he needed to do in 1980, and he meant to do it. He didn't run for the glory of being president; he ran to change America and the world. He didn't just want to hold the office; he wanted to use it.

Over the years there have been issues where I have differed with Sen. McCain. But as I look at the gathering storm that will challenge the next president and imperil our country, not one of those issues is relevant to the task ahead. The presidency is a terrible thing to waste. I believe that if the American people make him president, John McCain won't waste it.

In Limbo In Washington, McCain Comes Alive In Iowa (WP)

By Dan Balz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 19, 2007

Campaigning for Conservatives, He Plays Up Fiscal Discipline

DAVENPORT, Iowa, Feb. 18 -- Former Texas senator Phil Gramm was wrapping up his introduction in Des Moines on Saturday morning when a white-haired man wearing gray slacks and a big, brown leather jacket ambled up the aisle and stopped at the side of the stage, the curl of a smile on his lips.

It was Sen. John McCain.

Back in Washington, McCain has shown little of the exuberance of the Republican outsider who challenged George W. Bush for the GOP presidential nomination in 2000. Now virtually hostage to the success of Bush's Iraq war policy, which he has defended and criticized, McCain has appeared subdued, even dour.

In interviews, the Arizona Republican has spoken almost in monotone, defending his support for sending more troops into battle in Iraq. On NBC's "Meet the Press" recently, his body language conveyed distinct discomfort with the constant attention he receives about the war's potential impact on his presidential aspirations.

But as he campaigned across Iowa this weekend, there were flashes of the old McCain. During town hall meetings in Des Moines, Cedar Rapids and Davenport, he staunchly defended his position on the war, decried a Republican Party that he said has lost its way and punctuated question-and-answer sessions with his particular brand of humor.

"I had my glass of ethanol this morning, and I'm feeling good," he said to ripples of laughter as he delivered his opening remarks to a jampacked audience in a Des Moines hotel ballroom. "I hope you did, too. Tastes good."

When a man said he was serving in the Marines in Vietnam around the time McCain was being held in a North Vietnamese prison camp, the senator interjected, "Why didn't you come get me?"

As the audience broke into laughter, the man responded, "Marines always love to rescue the Navy when they get the chance."

"That's what you get for being a smart [expletive]," McCain said of being turned into the butt of the joke.

A young man in Davenport said pointedly: "You ditched Iowa in 2000. Why should we support you?" The candidate responded, to peals of laughter: "You know, we should never let these young punks in. No respect. You remind me of my own kids."

The ethanol joke was not lost on anyone, either. When he ran for president eight years ago, McCain skipped the Iowa caucuses, saying he did not have the resources to compete both there and in New Hampshire. But many Republicans suspected that his opposition to ethanol subsidies, vital to the Iowa economy, influenced his decision to stay out of the state.

McCain lost that first race for president after a bitter fight with Bush, who proved more adept at appealing to the Republican base. Now back for a second try for the GOP nomination, support for ethanol -- he says it is economically justifiable now that oil prices have risen -- is just one of a number of things he has been willing to swallow to try to win.

The McCain team is focused on building an infrastructure of financial and political support second to none in the GOP field. The candidate himself, whose formal announcement will come next month, is determined to make himself acceptable to Republicans who spurned him the last time around.

McCain's path to the nomination is made less difficult by the absence of a top-tier candidate with the ability to consolidate the conservative base of the party. Former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani is far more liberal on social issues than McCain is, and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney is struggling to explain his conversion from a social moderate in the 1990s to an ardent conservative now that he is running for president.

McCain advisers believe he can change attitudes among many culturally conservative voters and win the nomination as the favorite of the GOP establishment. On what was McCain's first campaign swing through Iowa since setting up his presidential campaign committee, the differences between 2000 and today were evident.

Seeking the 2000 nomination, McCain ran as a maverick and a reformer, an appeal that played especially well with independent voters. This time he presents himself as the candidate who can restore core principles to the Republican Party, which he says became intoxicated by power before losing its congressional majorities in the 2006 midterm elections.

His message this time is more overtly conservative, and his campaign identifies more openly with the socially conservative wing of the party. McCain and his advisers stress his quarter-century record of support for antiabortion legislation, and when it came time for an opening prayer on Saturday morning, McCain's Iowa chairman, David Roederer, made sure the audience knew that the campaign's Maxine Sieleman, who hosts a daily Christian radio show that airs throughout the state, is "one of Iowa's leading social conservatives."

McCain still has issues with conservative Republicans over immigration and a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage, and he supports stem cell research. Some conservatives will have to be convinced that the man who trashed Jerry Falwell and Pat Robertson eight years ago is truly one of them now, although he has patched up with Falwell.

A longtime scourge of pork-barrel spending and a proponent of fiscal discipline, McCain is well positioned on an issue that has gained more currency among conservative Republicans because of the mushrooming spending during Bush's presidency. "I'll veto every pork-barrel bill that comes across my desk, and I'll make the people famous who put it in," he said in Cedar Rapids. "I promise you."

Across Iowa on Saturday, Gramm, who unsuccessfully sought the GOP nomination in 1996 but remains a symbol of fiscal conservatism within the party, helped reinforce that message. "We need a president who will stop the spending spree, balance the budget and make the Bush tax cuts permanent -- and that's what John McCain will do," he said.

McCain's hopes for winning the White House may be tied directly to Iraq. A majority of Republicans agree with Bush's plan to add combat troops there, and neither Giuliani nor Romney has staked out a position different from McCain's or the president's on the preeminent issue facing the country. But as the Senate's leading proponent of the Bush plan, McCain has put himself at odds with a majority of the American people.

"The one thing I'm sure of is, next January when the Iowa caucuses take place, it will be a very different scenario in Iraq than now," he told reporters aboard his chartered plane as he flew between Cedar Rapids and Davenport on Saturday. "So if we're starting to show success, then obviously the fact that I supported this is good. If it continues to deteriorate . . . ." He trailed off. No one needed him to finish the sentence.

When a reporter suggested that his fate ultimately may not be in his hands, McCain replied: "Yep. That's why I can't worry about it and I don't worry about it. There's nothing I can do about it."

McCain Runs A Different Race (POL)

By Jonathan Martin

The Politico, February 19, 2007

DAVENPORT, Iowa -- The jokes were familiar. So was the casual banter with voters who showed up at town hall meetings to meet the candidate. But the contrast this weekend was unmistakable: Sen. John McCain is a different man running in a vastly different moment than the last time he sought the presidency.

In 2000, McCain lost the Republican presidential nomination but established himself as perhaps the most arresting politician of his generation with a rollicking campaign style that mingled startling candor with towel-snapping humor and nearly inexhaustible high spirits.

This weekend in Iowa, McCain's old ebullience was replaced by a mood that seemed to fluctuate between sober and downright morose as he and the voters he met kept returning to a single topic: Iraq.

Nor was the weekend an exception. In recent interviews, McCain has similarly projected a grim and sometimes ashen aura while grappling with a war debate that for now is permeating his candidacy.

McCain made three stops across the Hawkeye State on Saturday while most of his colleagues were back in Washington taking up an unsuccessful motion to continue debate on the resolution on the Iraq troop "surge."

In a jam-packed conference room at the Hotel Fort Des Moines, McCain was met with nine consecutive questions that were a steady barrage of opinions, observations and pleas for action on Iraq and the wider threat of terrorism. McCain expected to discuss a wider range of issues. He said he was skipping glancingly over the Republican hot-button of immigration because he expected it to come up during the questioning. It didn't.

When it comes to the war, the same candor that energized supporters in 2000 is now virtually assured to leave them depressed. Picking up the mantra from his 2000 campaign, the Arizonan said he'd offer "a little straight talk" about Iraq.

"If we fail, I don't know what the other options are," he acknowledged. "I can give you lots of other options, but I'm not sure they would have the support of the American people."

Pressed by one veteran of the conflict why the success stories in Iraq were not being told back home, McCain acknowledged that there had been progress in some parts of the country. "Having said that," McCain was quick to add, "if Baghdad is on the verge of chaos, Anbar Province doesn't matter."

When Marty Baddeloo of West Des Moines demanded to know the "cost of being successful in Iraq ... rounded out to the nearest $25 billion," McCain replied with the obvious: "You reflect the frustrations many Americans feel," he said.

"In a few months," McCain predicted, "we'll know if the Iraqi government is doing the things we want them to do." But, he admitted, "I don't know how soon we're going to know militarily" if the surge is working.

Another man pressed McCain on what his "Plan B" was in case the additional U.S. troops into Iraq failed to stem the violence. "I promise," McCain responded, "I think about it every day."

It showed. Dressed casually in a brown leather bomber jacket, sweater and gray slacks, McCain deployed his usual mix of corny cracks and jocular repartee with audience members. But the levity was no match for the deeply serious questions that McCain found himself on the receiving end of at his first stop of the day in Des Moines.

Invoking the name of a local National Guardswoman who recently perished in a helicopter crash in Iraq, one Vietnam veteran in the audience put it plainly: "Iowans are dying, too."

Even a man who complained about the high price of his drug prescription prefaced his remarks by noting that he'd lost a grandson in Iraq. At this, McCain lowered his head and closed his eyes tightly.

As Sen. Phil Gramm, the former Texas senator and one-time presidential aspirant reminded each stop along the way in his introduction, McCain has "a son at Annapolis and a son in the Marine Corps."

For the McCain family, in other words, the war is no distant thing. So when the veteran, son of a veteran and father of a veteran to be (Jimmy, the Marine, is slated to deploy to Anbar Province this summer) said that "presidents don't lose wars, political parties don't lose wars, nations lose wars," he was trying to elevate the discussion above politics. But it's difficult to see how McCain's presidential aspirations won't be tied to a conflict that he's linked so closely within the public mind.

For a Republican base that still supports their commander in chief, McCain's outspoken and unyielding support for an aggressive posture in Iraq, the cardinal issue of the day, has the potential to heal old wounds left from his 2000 primary battle against George W. Bush and his conservative allies. But the same views could also torpedo his hopes to win the support of a larger electorate fed up with the continued loss of blood and treasure abroad.

Asked at a news conference following the Des Moines event about whether his support for Bush's plan would help alleviate suspicion from the conservatives who dominate his party's nominating process, McCain wouldn't talk about the politics of the war. "I've said all along that I won't be concerned if it helps me or hurts me with anyone." Iraq, McCain said, "transcends any political ambition I may have."

The next two stops following Des Moines, at equally full banquet rooms in Cedar Rapids and then here along the Mississippi River, brought a broader range of questions, including many about domestic issues. Still, the reality of a war time election continued to loom.

"We're in a very difficult time, a very difficult time in our nation's history and difficult time in other parts of the world, too," McCain intoned.

Trying to add an optimistic note, however, McCain promised that "there is not a single problem that this great nation can't overcome."

And, McCain offered, he could lead the way in such a challenging year. Indeed it took the question of a 7-year-old to bring the candidate closest to talking about the impact of Iraq on his campaign.

"I want to know why you want to be our president," asked Colin, a first-grader doing a serviceable impersonation of Roger Mudd.

Because, McCain replied in the same sober tones he'd sounded all day, "I believe my life has prepared me with the experience and knowledge and vision to lead this country in very difficult times."

Romney Supports 'Don't Ask, Don't Tell' (WP)

By John Solomon, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 19, 2007

Former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney (R), who once advocated allowing gays to serve openly in the military, said yesterday that he does not think the Pentagon should change its "don't ask, don't tell" policy in the midst of the Iraq war.

DOJ_NMG_0133878

" 'Don't ask, don't tell' has worked well. We're in the middle of a conflict. Now is not the time for a change in that regard, and I don't have a policy posture as to allowing gays in the military to serve there openly," Romney, a presidential candidate, said on ABC's "This Week."

Romney also addressed his revised positions over the years on subjects key to social conservatives and discussed his Mormon faith. Both are issues that have emerged early in his presidential bid.

"I'm not running for pastor in chief. I'm running for commander in chief," he said, dismissing concerns that his faith might affect his policies by saying all religions share common values as "one family of humanity."

On other key issues, Romney said:

Â· He opposes discrimination against gays and lesbians but supports a federal amendment defining marriage as limited to a man and a woman. "Marriage is primarily an institution to help develop children. And children's development, I believe, is greatly enhanced by access to a mom and a dad," he said.

Â· President Bush's decision to increase the number of troops in Iraq is "the right thing to do."

Â· He believes that "abortion is taking human life." Although Romney ran for the Senate in 1994 as a pro-choice candidate, he said yesterday that the decision on whether abortions should be legal should be left to the states. "There are lots of things that are morally very difficult, and in some cases repugnant, that we let states decide," he said.

Romney's wife, Ann, joined him for the interview. She said she and her husband discussed, before he decided to run, whether the stress of a campaign might aggravate her multiple sclerosis.

"I clearly don't have enormous reserves of energy and I really do hit 'Empty' pretty quickly, and I've got to learn how to manage that," she said.

Romney Defends Position On Stem Cells (AP)

By Henry C. Jackson

AP, February 20, 2007

Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney on Monday defended his opposition to most embryonic stem cell research despite its scientific promise to cure diseases like multiple sclerosis that afflicts his wife, Ann.

In an interview with The Associated Press, the former Massachusetts governor said he was confident that research on adult stem cells and the existing embryonic stem cell lines could eventually provide the medical answers.

"I believe that science is able to receive the stem cells necessary for research through means that don't represent a serious, moral problem," Romney said.

Scientists say embryonic stem cells hold the most promise and the research may eventually lead to treatment and perhaps cures for diseases such as Parkinson's and juvenile diabetes. Stem cells are created in the first days after conception, but some people such as social conservatives and President Bush oppose the research because days-old embryos — usually left over from fertility treatments — are destroyed in the effort to isolate the cells.

In August 2001, Bush restricted government funding to research using only the embryonic stem cell lines then in existence, groups of stem cells kept alive and propagating in lab dishes. Only about 21 of those lines are available for study, most created in ways that preclude use in humans.

Romney favors work on those lines and said if elected, he would increase funds for research of adult stem cells.

"It avoids all of the moral concerns and therefore presents scientific opportunity without moral dilemma," he said. "And I found no one to dispute the potential of such avenues of exploration that was able to convince me that these did not have merit."

Romney said his wife would play a prominent role in his campaign for president.

"Were she not healthy I would not have run ... " he told the AP. "She is able to manage her disease such that she does not overdo or cause herself physical problem. Were that not the case, we'd have made a different decision. We'd be in the sun somewhere."

Romney ran as a moderate in his unsuccessful bid for Senate in 1994, when he expressed support for abortion rights. He now opposes abortion, a shift that has caused consternation among some conservatives. During a campaign stop in Iowa, Romney said he did not know if the state's voters would support his recent switch on abortion.

"I respond to the questions as they arise. President Reagan was pro-choice as governor and became convinced he was wrong," he told the AP

Romney defended his recent decision to join the National Rifle Association, saying that he has always supported the 2nd Amendment and dismissing criticism that his membership amounts to political opportunism.

"I'm happy to support the NRA. They supported my campaign for governor and I clearly hope they support my campaign for president," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0133879

Romney also defended his decision to vote for Democrat Paul Tsongas in the 1992 Massachusetts Democratic presidential primary.

"We have an open primary where we can vote for people other than Bill Clinton and I voted against Bill Clinton," he said.

Romney has been criticized for voting in the primary, and for giving multiple justifications for his vote. Romney scoffed at the notion that he was giving rivaling justifications for his vote.

"I pulled a Democratic primary ballot, and voted for Paul Tsongas as opposed to Bill Clinton. There was no Republican contest of significance at that time, as I recall," he said.

During his campaign appearance, Romney chided national Democrats for suggesting diplomatic negotiations with Iran, calling it a country with "jihadist leadership" more bent on destruction than the Soviet Union.

"We think of the Soviet Union as being a nuclear superpower that we negotiated with but the Soviet Union was not suicidal, it was not genocidal," Romney told reporters in Sioux City on Monday. "They wanted to maintain their integrity and not ever suffer a nuclear attack. Iran has a different orientation. We have to recognize it as a jihadist leadership with (Iranian Pres. Mahmoud) Ahmadinejad."

The Talented Mr. Romney (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

I have been following the zigs and zags of Mitt Romney, the former Massachusetts governor and now Republican presidential candidate, watching him grow progressively less progressive, sort of making himself up as he goes along. As a result, I surf the Web with trepidation, bracing myself for the story that I fear might be coming: "Romney Says He Is Not Really a Mormon."

I joke, of course. But the way things are going, I would not be surprised if the possibility of a Romney religious conversion has gone from inconceivable to a focus group for, as they say, further study. After all, the same bloc of voters -- conservative Christians -- that once found Romney suspiciously liberal on abortion and gay rights does not much like his Mormonism, either. This nice touch of intolerance has got to worry Romney. In recent polls, something like one-third of all voters have said they would be less likely to vote for a Mormon candidate -- and the figure is a bit higher (39 percent) among Republicans. Iowa, where conservative Christians comprise about 37 percent of the GOP electorate, could be trouble.

What's an ambitious, square-jawed opportunist to do? He might do as he has done in the past and change his position. He once was nicely supportive of gay issues -- not marriage, but civil unions -- and of repealing the odious "don't ask, don't tell" provisions relating to military service. Romney once felt so strongly about gay rights that he even went to the left of Ted Kennedy in their 1994 senatorial battle. "The gay community needs more support from the Republican Party," Romney said in an interview that year. And in a letter written in 1994 to the Log Cabin Republicans, he looked forward to the day when gays and lesbians could serve "openly and honestly in our nation's military." That day will not come should he become president, he has said recently. Peering into the homophobic heart of GOP primary voters, Romney now thinks gays ought to stay in the closet. He has changed his mind.

Something similar happened on abortion. Where once Romney wanted it safe and legal, he now clearly just wants it illegal. This metamorphosis came as he studied the issue of embryonic stem cell research and had nothing to do, mind you, with his race for the Republican nomination. Okay, I too have evolved on certain aspects of the abortion issue -- late-term abortion, for instance -- but a total flip from always legal to always illegal (the clear message he's sending abortion foes) can have only one explanation: Potomac fever.

Romney is not the only Republican candidate to mothball principles for the campaign. Rudy Giuliani is now not as pro-choice as he used to be, and John McCain has hired the very mudslingers he once wanted to garrote. But Romney is in a class of his own. He used to have fairly reasonable positions on gun control. Within the past year, though, he joined the National Rifle Association -- an admission made under some duress Sunday to George Stephanopoulos on ABC's "This Week." In fact, to watch Romney on the show was to see a thoroughly counterfeit man. If he were a coin, a vending machine would spit him out.

Of course, I do not really expect Romney to renounce his religion since, among other things, it would cost him more votes than it would gain him. But I do suggest that his craven crawl toward the White House shows a man of obvious talents and experience who illustrates how broken our system is. Why should anyone have to tailor his beliefs to get past ideological bottlenecks in the early primary states? For Republicans, it's the religious right; for Democrats, it's economic pressure groups such as teachers unions. The rest of us can only stand by, helpless, waiting for extremists to pick a man or woman on the basis of issues that mean less to us -- not the war in Iraq, for instance, but gay civil unions.

If there is one thing to say for the system, though, it is that it subjects presidential candidates to a kind of torture. We learn early on which of them have principles, backbone and pride in themselves -- the sort of integrity we want in a president. Since all politicians, like lovers and mattress salesmen, lie a bit, we do not expect purity. But Romney has taken things too far. I don't know whether he has any respect for himself, but he sure as hell has none for us.

Obama Tests His Strength In The South (POLITICO)

By Mike Allen

The Politico, February 20, 2007

RICHMOND, Va. – At the annual Jefferson-Jackson Dinner of the Democratic Party of Virginia on Saturday, the Hillary Clinton signs and bumper stickers were free, as were "I'm in to Win" buttons featuring the New York senator. But "Obama '08 Gear" was for sale – T-shirt, $20; button, $10; sign, $5. And he had a lot more takers than she did, suggesting he might be making early inroads in a tough region that once was Confederate soil.

Party officials say their previous record for the dinner was 1,400 seats. But after Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois was announced as the keynote speaker, sales ballooned and the party kept expanding the dinner until it had space for 3,200 at the Greater Richmond Convention Center.

A few hours before the dinner, Obama and Gov. Tim Kaine met reporters on the front porch of the Executive Mansion, which is tucked behind the Virginia Capitol and is the oldest continuously occupied governor's residence in the United States. Obama had campaigned for Kaine, who was now returning the favor by becoming the first governor outside of Obama's home state of Illinois to endorse his presidential candidacy.

Obama had just flown up from a rapturous reception in South Carolina, where the largest newspaper, The State, had made him the banner headline on the Saturday paper: " 'Let's get busy,' Obama urges Columbia crowd." South Carolina's primary is Jan. 29, 2008, putting it toward the front of the pack, just after caucuses in Iowa and Nevada and the primary in New Hampshire.

Virginia's primary is Feb. 12 and with big states like California contemplating moving theirs up to Feb. 5, the nominee could be decided before the Old Dominion chimes in. But Virginia, the 12th largest state, has been getting more Democratic with hordes of newcomers to Northern Virginia and Hampton Roads, although George W. Bush won the state by 8 points in 2000 and 9 points in 2004.

For the endorsement news conference, Kaine and Obama were accompanied by their wives, Anne Holton and Michelle Obama. All four graduated from Harvard Law School.

Suddenly standing next to the coolest kid in the class, Kaine said the next president will "have to reconnect our nation to the nations of the world in a very profound way," and he said Obama "has a very, very unique ability to do that" and would be "a president who will help us get into a politics … that's a lot more about results and about people" than about partisan advantage.

Then it was Obama's turn to speak to the 10 television cameras, from all parts of the commonwealth. "People have been noticing we've been attracting big crowds," he said. "I'd like to say it's just me. But I think I have come to represent, in the minds of some, turning a new page and getting beyond the slash-and-burn, very tactical politics that we've become accustomed to in Washington."

It was overcast and chilly. A few birds chirped. Bob Lewis of the Associated Press, wearing a big hat, asked the first question, noting this "historical moment" in a city that once was the capital of the Confederacy. Lewis asked what the endorsement means about Obama's viability in the South and about how things have changed.

"I have to confess that you may be more eloquent than I am on this point," Obama began. "I think you make a powerful point. Here we are in the heart of what was the Confederacy. For me to be able to stand here as an African-American reflects the enormous progress that this country has made and to some degree represents not the perfection of the Union, but a whole lot of progress in perfecting this Union – one more step that we have taken to live up to the essential creed that Virginia's first citizen, Thomas Jefferson, wrote about in the Declaration of Independence. It's humbling because, as I've said before, I'm standing on the shoulders of an awful lot of people who have done an awful lot of work."

Obama repeated a point he made on CBS's "60 Minutes" – that he won't blame skin color if he loses. "I'm also mindful," he said with Kaine at his side, "that ultimately the decision that voters across America make with respect to who will lead them in these difficult times is not going to be based on symbolism. It's going to be based on who can make sure that America's safe, who can make sure that health care is affordable and accessible, who can ensure that our children are being educated to compete in the world economy – issues that span region, and span race."

Two experts on Southern politics were quite bullish on Barack. Hastings Wyman, founder of the Southern Political Report, said that while Clinton retains her hold on the African-American establishment, which is crucial in Southern primaries, Obama has the most appeal among younger African-Americans. "If public opinion in the black community swings sharply toward him, the establishment will follow," Wyman said. "He has not done that so far, however."

Larry J. Sabato, director of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia, says his students “are nuts about” Obama and that among Democratic students, “He’s the only one they’re interested in. He’s like Reagan or Kennedy, with an ability to connect with people individually in a large group. Hillary? Get real. She doesn’t have that. Whatever ‘it’ is, he has it.”

So can we expect to see “Rebels for Obama” bumper stickers on pickup trucks? Don’t count on it, but Obama told the press gathered not far from Monument Avenue, which is lined with tributes to Confederate generals: “Part of my campaign, I hope, is to remind people of the capacity for this nation to change, and to evolve.”

Obama Memoir Left Out Credits For Activism, Critics Say (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, February 19, 2007

The drama began with a tiny ad in a local newspaper — a notice that asbestos was about to be removed from the management office at Altgeld Gardens, the all-black public housing complex where young Barack Obama worked as a community organizer.

"You think it's in our apartments?" a worried mother asked.

"I don't know," Obama replied. "But we can find out."

What followed, Obama says in a memoir, was a life-altering experience, an early taste of his ability to motivate the powerless and work the levers of government. As the 24-year-old mentor to public housing residents, Obama says he initiated and led efforts that thrust Altgeld's asbestos problem into the headlines, pushing city officials to call hearings and a reluctant housing authority to start a cleanup.

But others tell the story much differently.

They say Obama did not play the singular role in the asbestos episode that he portrays in the best-selling memoir, "Dreams From My Father: A Story of Race and Inheritance." Credit for pushing officials to deal with the cancer-causing substance, according to interviews and news accounts from that period, also goes to a well-known, pre-existing group at Altgeld Gardens and to a local newspaper called the Chicago Reporter. Obama does not mention either one in his book.

"Just because someone writes it doesn't make it true," said Hazel Johnson, a longtime Altgeld resident who worked with Obama on the asbestos campaign, and who began pushing for a variety of environmental cleanups years before he arrived.

U.S. Rep. Bobby L. Rush (D-Ill.) said it was Johnson's work, as well as asbestos testing conducted by the Chicago Reporter, that sparked the interest of Chicago officials and prompted Rush, who at the time was a City Council member, to launch an inquiry. While he has not read Obama's memoir, Rush, who has been a political rival of Obama's in recent years, said Johnson's role was so prominent that he was "offended" by anyone telling the Altgeld story without including her.

"Was [Obama] involved in stuff? Absolutely," said Robert Ginsburg, an activist who worked in Altgeld with Johnson and Obama. "But there was stuff happening before him, and after him."

No one disputes that Obama was active in organizing Altgeld residents. Several who worked directly with him say that he was the most effective organizer they had seen — a surprise, given his youth. "He was our motivator" said Callie Smith, now 50, who was active in Obama's group. "We did all the work, but he was our inspiration."

The varying accounts of what occurred 20 years ago are noteworthy because Obama, now a freshman U.S. senator, has begun a campaign for the White House after three years on the national stage.

Beyond Illinois, where Obama was a state legislator, much of what the public knows about the Chicago Democrat comes from his two best-selling books. On the campaign trail, he has said that through the books he has revealed more of himself to the public than has any other candidate. They provide "insights into how I think and how I feel about the issues facing America," he told reporters this month, according to an account in the Wall Street Journal. Many people coming to his rallies bring copies.

But "Dreams From My Father," the first of Obama's books, is not a historical account. In it, Obama uses literary techniques that are rarely found in political memoirs.

Dialogue in the memoir is an "approximation of what was actually said or relayed to me," Obama wrote in its introduction. For the sake of compression, he wrote, some characters are "composites of people I've known, and some events appear out of precise chronology." Most names in the book were changed for the sake of privacy, he wrote.

And while most memoirs place their authors at the center of events, critics of "Dreams From My Father" say it is unfair in omitting the others who were responsible for the successes of the asbestos campaign, an event that Obama portrays as central to his maturation as a political leader. For example, Johnson is not mentioned, and no character in the book appears to resemble her, even though she was already a prominent Altgeld activist and her presence in the anti-asbestos effort is confirmed by interviews and news accounts at the time.

An Obama spokesman said that the memoir was never intended to be a complete account of Altgeld or an attempt to portray Obama as a hero, but merely the recollections of one activist. Published in 1994 and re-released in 2004, the book primarily tracks Obama's journey to racial identity as the child of a black, Kenyan father and a white mother from Kansas.

"This is making a mountain out of flat land," said Robert Gibbs, the Obama spokesman, referring to inquiries from The Times. "The book isn't a history of social efforts to help the area. It was about what he was involved in."

Built in the 1940s to house black industrial workers, Altgeld Gardens has long been called a "toxic doughnut." The community is surrounded by a massive landfill, a paint factory, an odor-emitting sewage plant and the polluted Calumet River.

Obama arrived at Altgeld soon after graduating from Columbia University in 1983. He had taken a job with a small group called the Developing Communities Project, which aimed to help people in the wake of plant closures and other economic troubles.

Obama and his group helped persuade the city to open a job center. Working with parents at a local school, he tried to improve basic services at the housing project: repairing the toilets, the windows, the heating system.

Then, he writes, the asbestos threat appeared.

As detailed in the memoir, Obama's group was tipped off to the problem when a woman named "Sadie" noticed a classified ad that solicited bids to remove asbestos from the Altgeld management office.

"I don't know if it means anything," says "Sadie" in the book, "but I wanted to see what you thought."

Obama encouraged the group to ask the on-site manager about the asbestos. But they were fearful of confronting authority, Obama wrote, and unsure how to respond when their first inquiry produced no answers.

"What do we do now?" Obama quoted one parent as asking.

"We go downtown," Obama answered. "If they won't come to us, we'll go to them."

Obama then guided the group — which he said one person dubbed "Obama's Army" — through two dramatic, confrontational meetings with housing officials in 1986. The meetings drew news coverage and produced results, his memoir says.

In the first meeting, at Chicago Housing Authority headquarters downtown, Obama's group secured a promise of immediate asbestos testing at Altgeld and prompted aldermen to call hearings.

The second meeting was a chaotic event in which 500 Altgeld residents ran Chicago's top housing official off the grounds. But it produced "a victory of sorts," Obama wrote, as workers in "moon-suits" soon appeared and started sealing asbestos.

In the book, Obama wrote that his success in motivating the residents still inspires him. "I changed as a result of that bus trip, in a fundamental way," he wrote of confronting the housing officials downtown.

"That bus ride kept me going, I think. Maybe it still does."

Even as he campaigns for the White House, Obama speaks about his time in Altgeld. His first television interview after announcing his candidacy this month, on CBS's "60 Minutes," featured Obama leading a driving tour through the housing project.

But other forces — unacknowledged in Obama's book, but receiving public attention at the time — were at work in the asbestos story.

At the same time Altgeld tenants were asking their questions, the respected Chicago Reporter newspaper published an exposé of asbestos problems in a different housing project. It also asserted that heating pipes at other Chicago projects had similar asbestos insulation.

The Reporter's investigation was cited repeatedly on television and in local newspapers, and the Chicago Sun-Times credited it with bringing the asbestos problem to light.

"That article stirred me, and it stirred many others," said Rush, the former alderman, who said he initiated a City Council inquiry into asbestos because of the Chicago Reporter story. A long-serving congressman, Rush faced a primary election challenge from Obama in 2000, but he has since endorsed Obama's presidential campaign.

Obama's Altgeld Gardens account also omits the work of Johnson.

She was already widely known for her pioneering work in pushing officials to investigate environmental hazards at local industrial sites. Spurred by her husband's premature death from lung cancer, Johnson had begun documenting the health complaints of Altgeld residents in the late 1970s. Johnson formed a group called People for Community Recovery and tried to cajole scientists to study possible links between the ailments that residents reported to her and the harmful substances around their community.

One of those scientists, Regnal Jones, visited Johnson in the early 1980s and recalls sitting in her kitchen as she laid out hundreds of index cards listing the illnesses throughout Altgeld. He said he was "blown away" by Johnson's survey.

During that visit, Jones said, he inspected Johnson's apartment and concluded that her heating pipes were insulated with asbestos. From that point on, Johnson says, she included asbestos in her complaints to government officials.

As Obama became involved in the asbestos issue, Johnson was among those who worked with him.

DOJ_NMG_0133883

In interviews, she said she helped plan the Altgeld tenants' confrontational trip to the Chicago Housing Authority, meeting occasionally with Obama in her living room. Press accounts show that she was part of the protest.

Today, Johnson, now 72, is particularly disturbed that Obama's memoir portrayed the tenants as meek and confused, highlighting one parent who was illiterate. Johnson had been quoted on many occasions in the press by the time she met Obama. She had persuaded city officials to request the tests that found hazardous materials in local drinking water.

"Why would he paint us as so pathetic?" asked Cheryl Johnson, Hazel's daughter, who now runs the Altgeld group her mother founded. "Isn't a memoir supposed to be accurate?"

"There's no way that you could have done anything out there without knowing that this little old lady had been in Altgeld forever," said Jones, who was working for the city health department at the time.

Another Chicago community organizer said he had no quarrel with the license that Obama took in his memoir. "If you were writing your movie, I'm sure you'd be the star," said Salim Al Nurridin. "It's his movie."

The Hot Ticket In Hollywood: An Evening With Obama (NYT)

By David M. Halbfinger

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif., Feb. 19 — Tom Hanks has bought a $2,300 ticket. So have Jennifer Aniston, Eddie Murphy and Denzel Washington. The studio bosses from Universal, Paramount, Disney and 20th Century Fox have all sent checks or faxed their credit card numbers, too.

Given the A-list stars, movie and music moguls, and top Hollywood dealmakers who have sent their R.S.V.P.'s, one would think the man of honor at Tuesday night's benefit at the Beverly Hilton would be getting a lifetime achievement award. But the toast of the evening is Barack Obama, the 45-year-old first-term Democratic senator from Illinois, in his first foray to Los Angeles as a declared presidential candidate.

It is hard to say whether the unusual heat behind the evening owes more to interest in Mr. Obama or to the three men who spearheaded the fund-raiser: the DreamWorks co-founders David Geffen, Jeffrey Katzenberg and Steven Spielberg.

The haul is expected to be at least $1 million, making it the first major event here of the presidential campaign. (Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, will get a chance to flex her own Hollywood fund-raising muscles on March 24 at the estate of Ronald Burkle, the supermarket tycoon.) Originally set for a restaurant with room for 400 people, the Obama event was moved over the weekend to a hotel ballroom with a capacity of 600, and payments were still filtering in by fax.

Of chief concern to a much smaller group of fund-raisers was that they be credited for any attendees they invited; those with at least 20 tickets to their name have been asked to dine with Mr. Obama at Mr. Geffen's Beverly Hills mansion after the reception.

One movie producer who raised enough money to attend the dinner said he had done so merely because many of his friends wanted to meet the senator but would have had no other way of buying a ticket — though he confessed that he also wanted to "kick the tires" on Mr. Obama himself. Yet he insisted on anonymity, saying he was also a supporter of Mrs. Clinton, and "I just don't want to hurt her feelings."

Neither the reception nor the dinner is limited to Hollywood people; Alan C. Fox, a shopping mall owner and manager in Studio City, Calif., said he had raised about $150,000 from friends in real estate and finance, some already Obama enthusiasts, others skeptical but curious.

The ticket price of $2,300 reflects the maximum individual donation to a federal campaign, and, unlike those behind so many other Hollywood galas, organizers of this one vowed to bar the door to freeloaders, no matter how famous.

"We've turned down people who asked to bring a guest," said Andy Spahn, a political adviser to Mr. Spielberg and Mr. Katzenberg, among other industry people. "There will be no comps. Celebs are writing checks. Everybody's writing."

Among the industry players who have contributed are Peter A. Chernin, chairman and chief executive of News Corporation's Fox Group; Ron Meyer, the president of Universal Studios; Richard Cook, chairman of Walt Disney Studios; and Brad Grey, chairman of Paramount Pictures.

The scale of the event amounts to a coup, political operatives in Los Angeles said, since even veteran senators seldom take more than $50,000 to $100,000 from fund-raisers this early in the campaign cycle. Former Senator John Edwards, a frequent Los Angeles visitor, raised about $100,000 at a much smaller reception on Wednesday, for example — and the entertainment-industry contingent did not go much beyond the creator of the TNT show "The Closer," James Duff, and the actor Gary Cole, who played a vice president on "The West Wing."

Despite that, aides to Mr. Obama, loath to let the spotlight on their candidate drift to his wealthy donors or newfound Hollywood ties, declined to discuss the event except to say it would be closed to the news media.

DOJ_NMG_0133884

What is known is that there will be no red carpet or V.I.P. room, no sit-down dinner and scant opportunity for one-on-one conversation with Mr. Obama, except for those who make it to Mr. Geffen's home. "It's going to be very democratic, with a small D," Mr. Spahn said.

Can This System Be Saved? (WP)

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

THE PRESIDENTIAL public financing system is probably dead for the 2008 campaign. Certainly, the notion that candidates would limit their spending during the primary season in return for receiving federal matching funds has become quaint; the limits are so outdated and the amount of funds that can be raised so great that no serious candidate will take that bargain. And, for the first time, it looks as if the second part of the post-Watergate financing reform -- providing each major-party nominee with full financing for the general election campaign -- is about to become extinct as well.

Top-tier candidates of both parties, including Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.) and former senator John Edwards, have already started raising money for a general election race. (They'll have to give it back if they don't win the nomination.) So has Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), but with a twist: Mr. Obama has asked the Federal Election Commission to rule on whether he could legally collect money for the general election campaign but ultimately decide to take public funding were he to win the nomination and his GOP opponent followed suit.

As Mr. Obama put it in his letter to the FEC, "Should both major parties' nominees elect to receive public funding, this would preserve the public financing system, now in danger of collapse, and facilitate the conduct of campaigns freed from any dependence on private fundraising." The FEC has said it is speeding up its review of Mr. Obama's intriguing proposal, which turns, as a legal matter, on the question of whether the candidate would be deemed to have "accepted" money he is raising for the general election campaign if he keeps it separate and unused. If the money has been raised but not "accepted," Mr. Obama argues, he could still choose to return it and take public financing instead.

Linguistically, this might be a stretch that only a former Harvard Law Review president could love. But as a matter of policy, it could salvage a failing system to promote the aims underlying the law. As Mr. Obama put it, "Congress concluded some thirty years ago that the public funding alternative . . . would serve core purposes in the public interest: limiting the escalation of campaign spending and the associated pressures on candidates to raise, at the expense of time devoted to public dialogue, ever vaster sums of money."

Interpreting the law in a way that would allow the nominees the chance to call off the fundraising arms race would further the purpose of the campaign finance law and avoid the first fully privately financed presidential campaign since Watergate. The FEC should allow that, and Mr. Obama's rivals in both parties should pledge, if they win the nomination, to help save the system, not destroy it.

Richardson Wants No Attacks Among Dems (USAT)

USA Today, February 19, 2007

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson said he and all other Democratic presidential candidates should sign a pledge not to attack one another. Such a pact would mean "we will go into a general election stronger," Richardson said Sunday on CNN's Late Edition.

Richardson also said that as "the only Westerner in the race," he will have to do well in Nevada's early presidential caucuses next year. "It's a neighbor state. It's a state of diversity," said Richardson, whose mother was Mexican. Richardson acknowledged that he's behind in the polls, but he added, "It's a year away."

The Iowa caucuses are first on the Democratic political calendar for 2008, then Nevada, followed by New Hampshire's primary and South Carolina's.

Bush has two benign moles removed

Two moles removed from President Bush's left temple were non-cancerous, White House spokesman Alex Conant said.

The skin growths were removed Friday during a brief procedure at the White House.

Bush has had lesions removed before: a precancerous lesion on his left arm in August, a non-cancerous skin growth on his neck in July 2005, small lesions from his left shoulder and face in 2004, and others from his face in December 2001. None was cancerous.

Senate leader's son joins Clinton camp

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., has not endorsed a Democratic presidential candidate, but his son, Rory, has signed on as Nevada chairman for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential bid.

DOJ_NMG_0133885

Rory Reid, 44, is chairman of the Clark County, Nev., Commission and a former chairman of the Nevada State Democratic Party. He will be senior adviser on Western issues, including public lands, resources and conservation, transportation, growth and affordable housing, the New York senator's campaign said in a statement Sunday.

As Clinton Runs, Some Old Foes Stay On Sideline (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, February 19, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 16 — Back when Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton was first lady, no one better embodied what she once called the "vast right-wing conspiracy" than Richard Mellon Scaife.

Mr. Scaife, reclusive heir to the Mellon banking fortune, spent more than $2 million investigating and publicizing accusations about the supposed involvement of Mrs. Clinton and former President Bill Clinton in corrupt land deals, sexual affairs, drug running and murder.

But now, as Mrs. Clinton is running for the Democratic presidential nomination, Mr. Scaife's checkbook is staying in his pocket.

Christopher Ruddy, who once worked full-time for Mr. Scaife investigating the Clintons and now runs a conservative online publication he co-owns with Mr. Scaife, said, "Both of us have had a rethinking."

"Clinton wasn't such a bad president," Mr. Ruddy said. "In fact, he was a pretty good president in a lot of ways, and Dick feels that way today."

As for the conservative response to Mrs. Clinton's campaign, Mr. Ruddy said, "The level of intensity and anger toward Hillary is not getting to the level that it was toward Bill Clinton when he was president." He added, "She has moderated and developed a separate image."

H. Yale Gutnick, a longtime lawyer for Mr. Scaife, said his client was unavailable for comment.

To judge by conservative talk radio, Mrs. Clinton appears to be the most reviled politician in the country. But others in the conservative movement say it is easy to be deceived by what is on the airwaves and by the marketing of anti-Clinton paraphernalia, books and movies. (Among items on sale at conservative Web sites: "No Way in Hellary" barbecue aprons; "Hillary Scares Me" baby onesies; and buttons that say simply "Hillary Hater.")

For every conservative who says Mrs. Clinton will feel the wrath of the movement's grass-roots organizers later in the campaign, particularly if she becomes her party's nominee, another expresses doubt that Clinton foes can ever be revved up as they once were.

Some of her former antagonists say that terrorism and war have made the political battles of her husband's administration — gay men and lesbians in the military, the White House travel office, Monica Lewinsky — seem remote, if not trivial.

"I think the country is burned out on it," said Cliff Jackson, a lawyer in Little Rock, Ark., who helped set in motion several scandals involving accusations of philandering by Mr. Clinton. Mr. Jackson said he had no plans to oppose Mrs. Clinton's candidacy, and in a personal blog he recently praised her husband's post-presidential efforts to fight AIDS in Africa.

The level of animosity that a Clinton candidacy could arouse is a pivotal question in the 2008 campaign.

Mrs. Clinton has made the anticipated attacks against her a staple of her fund-raising appeals, saying she will need money to fight back. But that expected onslaught is also a linchpin of other Democrats' arguments that she is too polarizing to win.

Many Republicans, meanwhile, say her candidacy is the best hope to reunify their party at a time when many conservatives are unhappy with the ideological credentials of the front-runners for the Republican nomination.

And for conservative organizers, publishers and merchandise-makers, her nomination would be an opportunity to revive what once seemed like the anti-Clinton industry.

"She is the designated devil," said David A. Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union, whose Conservative Political Action Conference next month in Washington will showcase assorted anti-Clinton T-shirts and gear.

But Mr. Keene and many other conservative fund-raisers and organizers acknowledge that the grass-roots hatred for Mrs. Clinton and her husband has subsided substantially since they left the White House.

National efforts to raise money to stop Mrs. Clinton's Senate campaigns in New York in 2000 and 2006 never got off the ground. Nor did plans to raise money for a "counter-Clinton" library in Little Rock. And conservatives note to their consternation that at the moment the woman they treat as the incarnation of 1960s liberalism appears to be campaigning as the least liberal of the Democratic front-runners.

Still, Mr. Keene said, "Her image as the wicked witch of the left was burned in the minds of conservatives and the larger public before she tried to moderate her image." He noted that polls consistently give her the highest unfavorable ratings among the front-runners, typically more than a third of the public. (Her favorable ratings are also unusually high.)

Howard Wolfson, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton, said any nominee would face a barrage from the right. "I think that history demonstrates that whoever the nominee is is going to engender opposition from the right, and we will certainly be prepared," Mr. Wolfson said.

Mrs. Clinton's campaign has attracted some new enemies. John LeBoutillier, a former Republican congressman from New York and conservative commentator, said he started a Stop Hillary political action committee in part because he thought her opponents "gave her a free pass" in her two Senate races.

"I started by trying to figure out what it is about her that bugs the heck out of people," Mr. LeBoutillier said, mainly by looking at public polls. He said his organization recently spent $20,000 to run television commercials in Iowa featuring footage of a handful of potential Democratic caucus-goers saying that they distrusted Mrs. Clinton as a power-hungry opportunist.

Still, he acknowledged that his group had struggled for money.

Richard H. Collins, a Dallas investor, has taken over an unrelated group that was conceived by the Republican consultant Arthur J. Finkelstein to oppose Mrs. Clinton. Mr. Collins, who redirected the group toward the presidential race, said he had put in about $200,000 in "seed money" to start a Web site, www.stophernow.com. It plays cartoons of Mrs. Clinton as the host of a late-night talk show who is in the habit of batting guests over the head with a hammer.

"The idea is to present Hillary Clinton as she is and not as the person she is pretending to be," using humor, Mr. Collins said.

David N. Bossie, the president of the conservative group Citizens United who played a pivotal role in publicizing accusations about the Clintons during their White House years, has announced plans to collaborate on a documentary film attacking Mrs. Clinton with Dick Morris, the Clintons' estranged political adviser. Mr. Morris has made a career out of criticizing the Clintons in books and a syndicated column. Mr. Bossie has moved on to write books criticizing the last two Democratic presidential nominees and to produce four conservative political films.

Many conservatives still consider Mrs. Clinton the Helen of Troy of direct mail, the face who can launch a thousand donations. Richard Viguerie, a direct mail pioneer who worked on former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani's short-lived Senate campaign against Mrs. Clinton in 1999, said he had not had such success in four decades of fund-raising.

"We couldn't mail enough," Mr. Viguerie said. "The money was just coming in in bucketloads from all over the country."

But by the time the Clintons had left the White House in 2000, Morton Blackwell, another veteran conservative, found mailings for his Emergency Committee to Stop Hillary Rodham Clinton had little success. "The experience with the initial solicitation persuaded me not to do any more," Mr. Blackwell said.

As a senator from New York, Mrs. Clinton has built an alliance with some former critics like Rupert Murdoch, chairman of News Corporation. He has raised money for her, and his New York Post has grown respectful in its coverage.

Still Mr. Viguerie, speaking by phone from a meeting at the office of a founding father of the conservative movement, Paul Weyrich, said they would attack Mrs. Clinton with everything they had. "The vast right-wing conspiracy lives," he said.

Wrong Is Right (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

Many people are perplexed by the uproar over Senator Hillary Clinton's refusal to say, as former Senator John Edwards has, that she was wrong to vote for the Iraq war resolution. Why is it so important to admit past error? And yes, it was an error — she may not have intended to cast a vote for war, but the fact is the resolution did lead to war; she may not have believed that President Bush would abuse the power he was granted, but the fact is he did.

The answer can be summed up in two words: heckuva job. Or, if you want a longer version: Medals of Freedom to George Tenet, who said Saddam had W.M.D., Tommy Franks, who failed to secure Iraq, and Paul Bremer, who botched the occupation.

For the last six years we have been ruled by men who are pathologically incapable of owning up to mistakes. And this pathology has had real, disastrous consequences. The situation in Iraq might not be quite so dire — and we might even have succeeded in stabilizing Afghanistan — if Mr. Bush or Vice President Dick Cheney had been willing to admit early on that things weren't going well or that their handpicked appointees weren't the right people for the job.

The experience of Bush-style governance, together with revulsion at the way Karl Rove turned refusal to admit error into a political principle, is the main reason those now-famous three words from Mr. Edwards — "I was wrong" — matter so much to the Democratic base.

The base is remarkably forgiving toward Democrats who supported the war. But the base and, I believe, the country want someone in the White House who doesn't sound like another George Bush. That is, they want someone who doesn't suffer from an infallibility complex, who can admit mistakes and learn from them.

And there's another reason the admission by Mr. Edwards that he was wrong is important. If we want to avoid future quagmires, we need a president who is willing to fight the inside-the-Beltway conventional wisdom on foreign policy, which still — in spite of all that has happened — equates hawkishness with seriousness about national security, and treats those who got Iraq right as somehow unsound. By admitting his own error, Mr. Edwards makes it more credible that he would listen to a wider range of views.

In truth, it's the second issue, not the first, that worries me about Mrs. Clinton. Although she's smart and sensible, she's very much the candidate of the Beltway establishment — an establishment that has yet to come to terms with its own failure of nerve and judgment over Iraq. Still, she's at worst a triangulator, not a megalomaniac; she's not another Dick Cheney.

I wish we could say the same about all the major presidential aspirants.

Senator John McCain, whose reputation for straight talk is quickly getting bent out of shape, appears to share the Bush administration's habit of rewriting history to preserve an appearance of infallibility.

Last month Senator McCain asserted that he knew full well what we were getting into by invading Iraq: "When I voted to support this war," Mr. McCain said on MSNBC, "I knew it was probably going to be long and hard and tough, and those that voted for it and thought that somehow it was going to be some kind of an easy task, then I'm sorry they were mistaken."

But back in September 2002, he told Larry King, "I believe that the operation will be relatively short," and "I believe that the success will be fairly easy."

And as for Rudy Giuliani, there are so many examples of his inability to accept criticism that it's hard to choose.

Here's an incident from 1997. When New York magazine placed ads on city buses declaring that the publication was "possibly the only good thing in New York Rudy hasn't taken credit for," the then-mayor ordered the ads removed — and when a judge ordered the ads placed back on, he appealed the decision all the way up to the United States Supreme Court.

Now imagine how Mr. Giuliani would react on being told, say, that his choice to head Homeland Security is actually a crook. Oh, wait.

But back to Mrs. Clinton's problem. For some reason she and her advisers failed to grasp just how fed up the country is with arrogant politicians who can do no wrong. I don't think she falls in that category; but her campaign somehow thought it was still a good idea to follow Karl Rove's playbook, which says that you should never, ever admit to a mistake. And that playbook has led them into a political trap.

After A Delicately Worded Pitch, Clinton Draws Cheers (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

COLUMBIA, S.C., Feb. 19 — Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton told an audience of black voters on Monday that they would be "breaking barriers" if they supported her for president in 2008 — deliberately signaling that they could still take pride in making history if they chose a woman over one of their own, Senator Barack Obama of Illinois.

It was a delicately worded pitch — Mrs. Clinton did not mention Mr. Obama by name — and it drew applause. Another remark, that "anyone can be president," set off an ecstatic standing ovation.

Afterward, several black voters said they would support Mrs. Clinton, a New York Democrat, on the merits, and postpone a vote for Mr. Obama until a future presidential election, once he had more experience.

The two Democrats, rivals for their party's presidential nomination, were both in South Carolina this holiday weekend competing for the support of blacks, who cast almost half of the votes in the Democratic primary here in 2004. South Carolina is scheduled to be fourth in the string of nominating primaries and caucuses for the 2008 race.

Mrs. Clinton's task here became more complicated last week when one of her prominent black supporters, State Senator Robert Ford of South Carolina, said that nominating Mr. Obama would be a disaster.

"Every Democrat running on that ticket next year would lose because he's black and he's top of the ticket," said Mr. Ford, who is black.

The remark caused a sensation. Mr. Ford apologized.

Mr. Obama said Saturday that history was full of examples of people telling blacks, "We can't." He then said that, with black support, he could say to voters, "Yes, we can."

The Clinton campaign criticized the Ford jab, but Mrs. Clinton said nothing herself, advisers said.

In an interview with The Associated Press in South Carolina on Monday, Mrs. Clinton was pressed on hot-button issues in the state. She said she would like to see the Confederate battle flag removed from the Statehouse grounds in Columbia, and she denied that there was anything untoward about a consulting contract that her campaign executed recently with the firm of an influential black state senator here who agreed to endorse her around the same time.

DOJ_NMG_0133888

Mrs. Clinton put her own gentle spin on Mr. Ford's remark at a forum here at Allen University, a historically black institution, by arguing that a candidate could make history by winning in 2008 — and that she should be that candidate.

"I believe this presidential election is about breaking barriers — and this is the campaign, and I am the candidate with the experience to break the barriers," Mrs. Clinton said.

A little later, hundreds of audience members, many of them black women, stood and cheered when Mrs. Clinton asked, "Can a woman be president?" Many stood and cheered again, seconds later, when she added, "I believe one of the great things about America is, anyone can be president, and what it depends upon is the individual."

Mrs. Clinton also referred several times to her husband, former President Bill Clinton, who is widely popular with black Democrats.

After the forum, several black audience members said they would support Mrs. Clinton over Mr. Obama, and added that race was not a factor for them.

"All in all, I feel she's the better candidate — her experience as a senator, in the White House," said Angel Matta Jr., a freshman at Allen. "After more time, Obama will be a great president, too."

Mrs. Clinton also appeared at a tribute Monday in Charleston for the state's most powerful black Democrat, Representative James E. Clyburn, majority whip of the United States House, who also met with Mr. Obama over the weekend. While Mr. Clyburn is holding off on an endorsement, he urged Mrs. Clinton to try to make history.

"No one has ever won who did not run," he said. "Run, Hillary, run!"

In S.C., Sen. Clinton Targets Black Vote (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

COLUMBIA, S.C., Feb. 19 -- Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York courted black voters, considered crucial to securing the Democratic presidential nomination, in a series of campaign stops in South Carolina on Monday in which she cast the 2008 election as a chance to make history.

"I believe this presidential campaign is about breaking barriers," Clinton said at a town hall meeting in the state's capital. "This is the campaign, and I am the candidate."

Each of Clinton's appearances was aimed at projecting her as the candidate best equipped to deal with the hopes and hardships of black voters. She called on state leaders to remove the Confederate flag from the grounds of the State House here, as have several other Democratic candidates. Then, after her town hall event at Allen University -- a historically black institution in Columbia -- she headed south to a gathering in Florence in honor of Mayor Frank Willis.

Clinton closed the day in Charleston, speaking at a gala honoring Rep. James E. Clyburn (D-S.C.), who is widely regarded as the most influential black politician in the state. Clinton praised Clyburn -- the third-ranking Democrat in the House -- for his efforts "to find common ground and then stand his ground."

She also noted that the Book of James is one of her favorites in the New Testament -- a religious reference that was greeted with calls of approval and clapping by the overflow crowd packed into a union hall.

Clyburn returned the favor moments later, touting Clinton's "tremendous record of public service and a tremendous campaign that she is running."

Clinton's visit came less than 48 hours after Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) campaigned here, and even during Clinton's speech in Columbia word was circulating that Obama had secured the endorsement of Dick Harpootlian, a former state party chairman.

Obama's attempt to step on Clinton's day in South Carolina underscored the behind-the-scenes back-and-forth between the two top Democratic candidates for the support of black voters, who are expected to make up about half of the electorate in the state's presidential primary Jan. 29.

Clinton scored something of a coup last week by securing the endorsement of state Sen. Darrell Jackson, an influential leader in South Carolina's black community. But the momentum was compromised by allegations that she secured Jackson's support by offering him a lucrative consulting contract.

Jackson, the emcee at the Columbia event, has insisted that several campaigns had made offers to hire his consulting firm. On Monday, Clinton, too, denied any quid pro quo.

These events were far from the minds of the hundreds of people who packed halls across the state to catch a glimpse of Clinton.

Chris Lykes, a black man from Swansea who attended the Columbia meeting, reflected the ambivalence of voters torn between their strong loyalties to Clinton and their attraction to a new face in Obama.

Lykes said that Clinton had "answered all the tough questions" and that he supports the former first lady.

DOJ_NMG_0133889

Asked his feelings about Obama, though, Lykes said the senator's being black "matters a whole lot" in his decision, and he acknowledged he had yet to choose between the two candidates.

Although Obama is widely seen as the first black candidate with a serious shot at winning the presidency, national polling shows Clinton with a wide lead among black voters.

In a recent Washington Post-ABC News survey, Clinton led Obama by 60 percent to 20 percent among black voters -- a wider margin than the 41 percent to 17 percent lead she held over the freshman senator among the broader Democratic primary electorate.

Much of Clinton's strong support in the black community is due to the affection that many African Americans hold for her husband, former president Bill Clinton.

Those warm feelings were on display Monday, as the very mention of his name brought a roar from the crowd. "I was always a big fan of your husband," said one man who stood to pose a question in Columbia. "I thought he did a great job."

Asked why she is qualified to lead the nation in a time of peril at home and abroad, Clinton referred to the time she spent by her husband's side in Washington.

"During the eight years of Bill's presidency, I had a front row seat on history [and saw] the difficult decisions any commander in chief has to make," she said. "I learned both what works and what doesn't work."

Clinton Emphasizes Her Gender As Strategy (POL)

By Ben Smith

The Politico, February 20, 2007

COLUMBIA, S.C. -- Roberta Stokes said she cried Monday morning when she heard Hillary Rodham Clinton ask whether America is ready for a woman to be president. "That was emotional to me," said Stokes, 69, a retired teacher. "A lot of people don't understand that a woman is strong enough to do that." But Stokes said she'd also been moved when Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., came to Columbia last week, carrying the promise that he could become the first black president. "I couldn't make a choice right now on them," she said.

Clinton spent Monday morning before a mostly black, mostly female crowd in the South Carolina capital, and she seemed to grasp Stokes' choice clearly. Her pitch was equally clear: One pioneer at a time.

"I believe this presidential election is about breaking barriers," Clinton said. "This is the campaign and I am the candidate with the experience to break those barriers."

Clinton's tailored case to a black audience reflected her new directness in talking about herself as a woman and a mother. Former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher reportedly took voice lessons to sound more like a man; Clinton has gone in the other direction since announcing her bid for the presidency, speaking more explicitly about her sex than ever before in her political career. And while the shift has the lofty aim of trying to change national attitudes toward women, it also reflects a cold, strategic reality.

"I like numbers. I like politics because it is about the bottom line," said Ann Lewis, a former White House communications director who has long been, among other roles, Clinton's liaison to women's groups. "Fifty-four percent of the electorate in November 2004 was women."

Clinton is the only woman among the 10 or so Democrats seeking the presidency, and despite a persistent storyline of discomfort among many women about her candidacy, she has a history of drawing women's support. In New York last year, she won re-election to the Senate with 73 percent of women voting for her and 61 percent of men, according to exit polls. The first major national group to endorse her presidential campaign was the powerhouse EMILY's List, which backs female candidates. And Clinton, alone among candidates for the presidency in a world of mostly male political junkies, draws mostly female crowds.

The new emphasis on gender by a candidate who once famously disparaged baking cookies and having teas -- enraging many women who enjoyed both those activities -- takes many forms, explicit and implicit. Clinton's new stump speech raises, before she can be asked, the question of whether Americans will elect a female president, and she speaks at times specifically as a woman and as a mother.

Clinton describes her campaign in what is a traditionally feminine vocabulary: She launched her bid for the White House in a video expressing her desire to "chat" with the electorate. She pledges to be a president who will "listen." Her campaign events are described as "conversations."

In a telephone interview last week, Lewis resisted the notion that the campaign is speaking primarily to women, and suggested that it differs from other campaigns merely in speaking as directly to women as to men. "What is unusual is that this is a campaign in which women are not sort of an afterthought," Lewis said. "The traditional Democratic campaign would go along saying, 'Of course we're talking to everybody,' and then would look at their numbers around Labor Day and say, 'We've got to do a better job talking to women.' "

Clinton's explicit embrace of her gender was a choice, and it represents a gamble of sorts. Though most polling shows a gender gap between parties and candidates, other factors -- such as race and income -- are typically stronger determinants of voters' preference. And according to a Siena College poll released Monday, 12 percent of Americans still say they wouldn't vote for a woman for president. Other polling has suggested that Americans are more comfortable with female legislators than executives. But it's a gamble that appears, so far, to be paying off. In particular, Clinton appears to have managed to avoid a mass defection of African-American supporters to Obama.

In interviews with black women of her own, baby boomer generation, it appeared clear that for voters affected by the notion of electing a pioneer, Clinton is able to compete with Obama. "We need a woman," said Joy Silver, 60, an African-American nurse attending the Columbia event. "I think she's going to make it."

Clinton drew roars from the Columbia crowd when she told them, "I am proud to be a woman." But while Clinton connects with women, she faces a challenge of not alienating another, only slightly less important demographic group that has, perhaps, grown accustomed to being the center of candidates' attention: men.

"It's not a zero-sum game," insisted Lewis. "This is not about throwing men over the side."

To accuse Hillary of lack of substance and not understanding the issues is in itself an ill-informed comment. She has spent her life studing the issues even her republican opponents in the Senate admit that she always does her homework and is usually the smartest person in the room.What does a comment like tnproud2b's add to the conversation, how stupid.

by tnproud2b on 02.19.2007 at 10:56 PM

Since Hillary Clinton is so adamant about being a woman - I'm inclined to believe she's not. Seriously. Doesn anybody really know Hillary's gender?

by Macabee on 02.19.2007 at 09:23 PM

Sedona has a pretty good point. Gender has nothing to do with Hillary Clinton's qualifications (as race has nothing to do with Obama's bid). Playing the gender card seems to evidenc a lack of substance and understanding of the issues facing the country. Hillary's biggest challenge isn't her gender, but the fact that she's part of the status quo... part of a political system which has run amok and is out of touch with America. The great majority of this country is sick and tired of these self-serving, self-applauding Washington insiders who are obsessed with power for power's sake and have nothing at all in common with the rest of the country. Get real, Hillary. No one cares if you wear a skirt. What people care about is how you intend to fix a country which is falling into Third-Worldom!

by Sedona on 02.19.2007 at 08:26 PM

Hillary Clinton's 'gender' doesn't have anything to do with being President, after all, there are more than a few excellent female Chief Executives of major corporations and a few really good women Governors in America, what Hillary Clinton doesn't have is one minute of executive or chief executive experience in either the public or private sector, nor has she made one political decision in her life in which the responsibility for the results have been hers and hers alone. Something a Governor, President, and Chief Executive of a company does on a routine basis.

Clinton Defends S.C. Campaign Hire (AP)

By Jim Davenport

AP, February 20, 2007

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton on Monday denied that her campaign traded money for an endorsement from one of South Carolina's most influential black politicians.

In an interview with The Associated Press, Clinton responded to questions about the consulting contract her campaign negotiated with state Sen. Darrell Jackson, who last week endorsed her candidacy rather than of top rivals John Edwards or Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill.

"Senator Jackson was someone who was involved in my husband's campaigns. He was someone we turned to for political advice and counsel and I'm proud to have him on my team," Clinton told the AP.

Soon after the endorsement, Jackson acknowledged that his media consulting firm had negotiated a $10,000 per month contract with Clinton's campaign. Jackson has said he turned down more lucrative contracts from other candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0133891

Although he backed Edwards, the former North Carolina senator, in the 2004 Democratic presidential primary, Jackson said he now supports Clinton because she has the best shot of winning the White House.

Mo Elleithee, a Clinton spokesman, said Friday that Jackson's firm will advise the campaign on "political matters in South Carolina, outreach, organizing issues" and purchasing advertising.

Jackson introduced Clinton when she spoke to more than 1,500 people gathered at Allen University, a historically black college in Columbia, where she lashed out at President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq, saying that Iraq needs to know "the blank check days are over."

On Monday evening, Clinton attended a tribute in Charleston to Majority Whip Jim Clyburn, a leading black member of Congress as No. 3 in the House leadership. African-Americans account for 49 percent of the state's Democratic primary vote.

Clinton, who spoke to the AP during her first trip to this early voting state since announcing her White House bid, also said South Carolina should remove the Confederate flag from its Statehouse grounds, in part because the nation should unite under one banner while at war.

"I think about how many South Carolinians have served in our military and who are serving today under our flag and I believe that we should have one flag that we all pay honor to, as I know that most people in South Carolina do every single day," the New York senator said.

"I personally would like to see it removed from the Statehouse grounds."

Other Democratic hopefuls, including Sens. Joe Biden of Delaware and Chris Dodd of Connecticut, have said the flag should come down. The banner, which once flew over the Statehouse dome and now flies nearby, is the subject of an ongoing NAACP boycott.

Clinton is one of several Democrats to draw huge crowds during campaign stops in the state, but she said during the interview that her party will have a tough time winning in GOP-heavy South Carolina.

"I think it's going to be hard for any Democrat to carry the state," she said. "The Republican Party is very strong here."

Clinton's visit comes close on the heels of Obama's two-day trip to the state in which he drew crowds of about 2,000 people.

Authentic Obama (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

ORANGEBURG, S.C. -- Is Barack Obama "authentically" black? Come on, be real. Is the pope Catholic?

Obama made his first campaign trip to this early-primary state over the weekend, drawing about 3,000 people to a rally in Columbia, the state capital, and 2,000 to a "town hall meeting" here in the city where I was born and raised. If those who rose early Saturday morning to attend the Orangeburg event constitute a representative focus group, black voters will want to weigh Obama's policy positions against those of the other candidates before deciding whom to support. But they won't spend a lot of time pondering his identity.

Among the dignitaries with front-row seats in the auditorium at Claflin University (where my mother used to be head librarian) was state legislator Gilda Cobb-Hunter, an African American, who had no patience for the "blackness" question that reporters kept asking.

"People talk as if this is, like, some kind of option for him," Cobb-Hunter said. "When Obama looks in the mirror in the morning, what do you think he sees? There is no way that he has any confusion about being a man of color. I think this issue is being manufactured by people who want to get us off focus. I don't hear the national media questioning Hillary Clinton about being a woman."

But what about the argument, posed by a couple of contrarian black columnists, that since Obama is not the descendant of slaves (white mother from America, black father from Kenya), he's a different kind of African American? "As time passes, very few people are going be able to say they marched in the civil rights movement," Cobb-Hunter said. "Are the people asking this question saying that if you didn't live through the Civil War, you can't understand slavery?"

Most of those in Obama's audience here had some past or present association with Claflin or nearby South Carolina State University, both of which are historically black colleges. Making my way through the crowd of old friends and neighbors, I wasn't able to find anyone willing to qualify Obama's blackness with an asterisk.

Henry N. Tisdale, Claflin's dynamic president -- the institution was failing when he took over in 1994 and now is firmly established in U.S. News & World Report's annual list of America's best colleges -- was less blunt than Cobb-Hunter, but no less dismissive of the question: "I think that in today's global and multicultural society, we will find persons such as Barack Obama becoming not the exception but the rule, and giving hope to all who want to live the American dream."

House Majority Whip James E. Clyburn, whose district includes Orangeburg, rearranged his schedule so he could be here to introduce Obama. "I thank him for giving new hope and inspiration to a new generation," Clyburn said. "Obama is able to run today because Rosa Parks sat down. . . . He is able to run today to give hopes and dreams to all of us."

I should make clear that none of these kind words added up to a formal endorsement. Almost a year remains before the South Carolina Democratic primary, scheduled for Jan. 29, in which African Americans will cast about half of all votes. Both Hillary Clinton and John Edwards hope to win significant black support in this state; I would advise them, and others, that trying to convince people that Obama somehow isn't black enough would be a poor use of precious time and resources.

Obama was comfortable in the town hall format, pacing like a talk-show host without notes or a lectern. His first big applause line was a call to fix "a health-care system that's broken." Someone in the audience yelled, "We want you to fix it!" and Obama yelled back, "We're going to fix it."

There were more cheers when he reiterated his opposition to the Iraq war, but he really got the crowd going when he talked about the national hunger for "a new kind of politics." People "want something new," he said, and the crowd enthusiastically agreed.

One woman, asking a question, mangled his name into "Barama." The candidate picked up on it immediately, saying that "they call me 'Alabama,' they call me 'yo' mama,' " but all that matters is that "I have your vote."

One of his biggest applause lines -- perhaps predictably, in a college town -- was a call for black Americans to "get over this anti-intellectualism we see in our community sometimes." And when he ended with a rousing "Yes, we can!" set piece, he exited the way every candidate wants to leave any room: with people on their feet, cheering for more.

Could Bill Clinton Take Over His Wife's Senate Seat If He Becomes The First First Husband? Some Think So. (WASHEX)

By Bill Sammon, The Examiner

Washington Examiner, February 20, 2007

WASHINGTON - If Hillary Rodham Clinton wins the presidency, some top Democrats would like to see her husband, former President Bill Clinton, appointed to serve out Hillary's unexpired Senate term.

"As a senator, he'd be a knockout," said Harold Ickes, who was once a top White House aide to Bill Clinton and now gives behind-the-scenes advice to Hillary. "He knows issues, he loves public policy and he's a good politician."

Some Democrats and political analysts say Bill Clinton would thrive in the world's greatest deliberative body, much like Lyndon Johnson did before he became president.

"President Clinton would excel in the Senate," said Paul Begala, who helped Bill Clinton get elected and served in the White House as a top aide.

"Why not?" Begala added. "He excelled as attorney general and governor of Arkansas, he excelled as president and he's been a model of the modern Senate spouse."

Larry Sabato, director of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia, agreed.

"Clinton is a natural for the Senate," Sabato said. "He loves to talk and schmooze. He could be a great vote-organizer. Majority Leader Clinton?"

Such a scenario is not beyond the realm of possibility now that the governor's mansion in New York is occupied by a Democrat, Eliot Spitzer, who succeeded Republican Gov. George Pataki last month. If Hillary Clinton wins the White House, Spitzer would likely appoint a fellow Democrat to take over her Senate seat.

So far, speculation about potential successors has focused on New York Attorney General Andrew Cuomo and environmental lawyer Robert F. Kennedy Jr., whose father once held the same Senate seat.

But Spitzer could just as easily appoint Bill Clinton, who, under New York law, would fill his wife's Senate seat through 2010. A special election would then be held, and the winner would serve the final two years of her term, which expires in 2012.

Although Ickes would love to see Bill Clinton in the Senate, he considers the scenario a long shot.

"I think there'd be a real call on [Spitzer] to appoint a black senator," Ickes said. "I think there'd be a real call on him to appoint a Hispanic senator."

Bill Clinton, who was once dubbed America's "first black president" by author Toni Morrison, would not be the first former president to serve in Congress. John Quincy Adams had a long career in the House after his presidency, and Andrew Johnson served briefly in the Senate after a stint in the White House. Johnson and Clinton are the only two presidents in history to have been impeached by the House. Both were acquitted by the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0133893

Political analysts say a Senate seat for Bill would go a long way toward solving a potentially nettlesome problem for Hillary — what to do with her husband if they return to the White House. The former president currently maintains an office in Harlem and a home with his wife in Chappaqua, N.Y.

"Nothing will solve the Bill problem entirely," Sabato said. "He will be restless and underfoot for Hillary, in part because he is the more talented pol."

There would also be financial ramifications.

"It would certainly lower the family income because there are restrictions on how much a senator can bring in on speeches and so forth," said presidential scholar Stephen Hess of George Washington University. "Of course he'd have housing, because she'd put him up in the Lincoln Bedroom or something."

Bush, Like Clinton, Presiding Over The Decline Of His Party (RC)

By Louis Jacobson

Roll Call, February 20, 2007

With the National Governors Association winter meeting set to begin later this week and the 2008 presidential race continuing to simmer, it seems an appropriate time to look at how both former President Bill Clinton and President Bush presided over a significant decline in their own parties' downballot fortunes.

Granted, the parallels aren't exact. For Clinton, the biggest drop in gubernatorial, legislative and Congressional seats came in 1994, two years after he was elected, whereas for Bush, it came after six years in office. And generally speaking, the declines in Democratic downballot strength under Clinton were steeper than those the Republicans have suffered under Bush (though if the trends from 2006 continue, the GOP could cumulatively be looking at Clinton-scale losses two years from now).

Still, despite the shadings of difference, it's hard to ignore the similarities.

After six years of Clinton, the Democratic Party claimed 13 fewer governorships than it had at the start of his presidency, seven fewer state Houses and five fewer state Senates — not to mention 47 fewer Democrats in the House and 12 fewer Democrats in the Senate.

Republicans now hold seven fewer governorships, five fewer state Senates and two fewer state Houses than they did when Bush took office, as well as 19 fewer House seats and one less Senate seat.

Six-year totals are the only appropriate way to measure Bush against Clinton. However, every metric discussed here also declined under Clinton during his full, eight-year run, and for some offices, the declines actually accelerated (see chart).

Of course, this unraveling of party fortunes is not entirely the fault of the men at the top of the ticket. Sooner or later, ancestrally Democratic rural conservatives, particularly those in the South, were going to become Republicans, whether that shift came in 1994 or later. Similarly, moderate suburbanites in Northeastern states seem destined to abandon their long-standing GOP habits.

In addition, downballot erosion during two-term presidencies is a well-established feature where Congress is concerned. For instance, former President Ronald Reagan lost eight Senate seats and 15 House seats in his first six years in office. If their consecutive terms are taken as one, former Presidents Richard Nixon and Gerald Ford lost five Senate seats and 48 House seats. Former Presidents John Kennedy and Lyndon Johnson, measured the same way, held steady in the Senate but lost 14 House seats in six years. And former President Dwight Eisenhower lost 14 Senate seats and 68 House seats over his first six years.

The number of GOP governors serving alongside Nixon after his first inauguration in 1969 was 31. By 1975 — the year after what would have been his second midterm election, had he not resigned — the number of Republican governors had plummeted to 13.

Even Reagan saw the number of GOP governors drop by seven on the eve of his second midterm election in 1986; he avoided the same fate as other presidents only because Republicans surged in gubernatorial elections in 1986, gaining a net of eight seats.

"Governors and legislators fall victim to diminished base turnout in nonpresidential years," said Republican strategist Patrick Davis. "I think you could surmise that the president's popularity, or lack of it, impacts his ability to motivate voters beyond the party activists to vote for 'his' candidates."

History aside, the larger-than-life personas of both Clinton and Bush — and their polarizing effect on the electorate — almost certainly contributed to their party's downballot decline.

The big Democratic losses of 1994 are widely attributed to frustration over the shortcomings of Clinton's first two years in office, from the controversy over gays in the military to his failure to enact health care reform. Later, the Monica Lewinsky scandal made Clinton an imperfect role model for his party. Clinton's push to stave off impeachment, while ultimately doing his

DOJ_NMG_0133894

GOP pursuers significant damage, likely prevented the White House from undertaking the kinds of efforts that could have aided Democrats running for lower office.

Bush-era Republicans, for their part, survived the 2002 and 2004 elections in better shape than the Clinton-era Democrats did in 1994 and 1996, but the chickens came home to roost in 2006. Much like the Lewinsky scandal for Clinton, the Iraq War sucked the air out of Bush's second term. As was the case with Democrats after 1994, Republicans chose to run away from their leader last year.

Both Clinton and Bush also benefited from, and were burdened by, having unified control of Congress and the executive branch — Clinton for two years and Bush for the better part of six. Unified control tends to raise expectations — and makes it easier to pin blame when the public mood sours.

In recent years, said George Mason University political scientist Michael McDonald, political polarization has meant a heightened nationalization of downballot elections. That means that downballot offices are more vulnerable to national swings.

"I don't think it is a coincidence that these two large swings were against the president's party, since centrist voters tend to like divided government," he said.

"These two-term presidents are often caught in some scandal which becomes a distraction," added Donna Brazile, a Democratic strategist and Roll Call contributing writer. "In Clinton's case, it was a steady drumbeat of scandals brewing, and then came Monica. With Bush, it's the war," as well as the scandals surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) and imprisoned ex-lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

In other words, Clinton and Bush had to face extended periods in office when they needed to focus on their own political survival, rather than on aiding their party. And that had to hurt further down the ballot.

"Presidential campaigning in 1992 for Clinton and in 2000 for Bush was largely driven by a 'clean, new message,' and it followed that downballot candidates benefited," said one Republican strategist. "In subsequent years, the agenda of the national party dominated discussion, and like it or not, Members of Congress, governors and legislators were seen as somewhat beholden to those national agendas."

Some political experts, however, caution against drawing overly broad conclusions from the data.

Bernadette Budde, senior vice president of the Business Industry Political Action Committee, evokes the old Buffalo Springfield song that goes, "There's somethin' happenin' here/What it is ain't exactly clear."

"I wouldn't try too hard to quantify or figure out the 'what,'" Budde said. "We know that 'churning' at one level affects all other levels of the ballot, even if there is some lag. Voter dissatisfaction takes a while to rumble through the system."

For this reason, she said, BIPAC prefers to use the metaphor of an earthquake rather than a wave for changes like those that took hold in the 2006 election cycle.

"The evolution of what voters want continues, even if the electorate can't quite define the solutions to problems vexing their lives," she said. "Everyone elected in 2006 still sits atop an active fault line. Shifting tectonic plates have altered the political map, and when the earth stops moving, nothing will ever look the same."

Joe Biden And The Mouth That Soars (POL)

By Roger Simon

The Politico, February 20, 2007

AMES, Iowa -- Joe Biden is in the 27th minute of his five-minute presentation, but nobody in the church basement has slipped away, nobody is nodding off, nobody is doing anything but following his every word.

"It was a mistake," he says in reply to a question about his vote to authorize the Iraq war. "I regret my vote."

Joe Biden's mouth can get him in trouble, but when it is working right, the words drop from his lips like pearls, and nodding heads now spread through the audience like ripples on a pond.

Biden's full reply to the attendees of the Story County Annual Soup Supper takes 4 minutes and 45 seconds -- it can take him 4 minutes and 45 seconds to say "hello" -- but here is the short version:

"It was a mistake," Biden says. "I regret my vote. I regret not realizing how incompetent (the Bush administration) would be. The president did not level with us. And if I had known it, I would never have voted to give him that authority in the first place."

The applause washes over him. It threatens to go on and on until he cuts it off by saying: "I want to do yes-or-no answers from now on."

Everybody laughs.

"But that was an important question," Biden says.

How important? Well, imagine that question being asked at a Democratic debate -- as surely it will be -- with all the Democratic candidates on stage.

Biden will say his vote was a mistake. As will Chris Dodd. As will John Edwards.

DOJ_NMG_0133895

Hillary Clinton?

She will say, I guess, what she said in Dover, N.H., the other day: "If the most important thing to any of you is choosing someone who did not cast that vote or has said his vote was a mistake, then there are others to choose from."

And Joe Biden wants to make sure he is one of the others they choose.

Most politicians love to serve but hate to run, and you can hardly blame them: Running is when you get the least respect. Running is when the voters remind you that you are a job applicant and they are doing the hiring.

But Biden, a senator from Delaware, seems to live for campaigning, live for the give and take, live for switching audiences from rapt attention to raucous laughter and back again.

Joe Biden is a glad-hander in the best sense of the word: He looks glad to be grasping each person's hand, looking the person in the eye, answering some question or exchanging some pleasantry -- "You're going to a wedding in Delaware? What hotel? You're kidding! I live four miles from that hotel!" -- and then, spying the next person down the row, saying, "I'm coming for you! I'm coming!"

At the soup supper, he kneels down on one knee on the tile floor next to an elderly woman and, gripping her hand, says in a loud whisper: "Let the press know I'm not a phony."

Does it really matter? Voters appreciate this much effort even if the candidate is faking sincerity.

The church basement is redolent of soup and succotash. People sit at long tables covered by oilcloths. Power strips have been supplied, not for laptops, but for the 18 crockpots in which the soups and stews bubble and simmer. A mild snowstorm (fewer than 5 inches) has been going on outside, but every seat is filled and some people are standing against the walls.

Retail politics like this has been derided. And while it is true that candidates even in retail states like Iowa and New Hampshire will end up reaching more people by TV than in person, the tradition is a powerful one and best not dismissed.

Real retail events are not grip-and-grins, where the candidate stands in a receiving line, spending only a few seconds with each voter. Real retail demands time, and Biden is spending the time.

He walks up and down between the tables. His long white hair is combed straight back. He is wearing a light blue shirt and dark blue tie, a navy blue blazer and gray slacks that break exquisitely over his tasseled black loafers.

Tasseled black loafers? Well, you can take the boy out of Delaware, but …

Actually, even though Biden is the only man in the room wearing a tie, let alone tasseled loafers, it works. Iowans don't want candidates showing up in work shirts and overalls pretending to be one of them. They just want somebody who understands them.

But why all this effort for Iowa? Why are so many candidates coming so early? Because they all fear the race for the nomination is going to be over very quickly and there will be no time to recover if they stumble and fall.

So they all have the same strategy: Win early, win often.

And it all starts here, in places like this, in church basements in Iowa.

I caught up with Biden by phone Monday and he told me a story -- it took him about 4 minutes and 45 seconds -- about how he was campaigning in Delaware as a young man and he met a guy at a gas station who was wearing a John Deere cap and was slouching on a chair around a potbelly stove.

"Why should I vote for you?" the man asked.

"Because I'm just like you," Biden replied.

The man sat up straight. "Boy, if you ain't different than me," he said, "I ain't voting for you!"

Biden and I both laughed.

"I guess I am a street politician," Biden said. "My whole career, whenever I wanted to get a sense of what people were thinking, the only way I trust it is to go out and listen to people. It sounds corny, but it is true."

I mentioned his tasseled loafers, and we both laughed again.

"Iowa is authentic, and they are looking for authenticity," he said. "I don't wear funny hats. But the major thing about Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina, is that they want to look you in the eye and poke you."

Poke you?

"What they want to do," Biden said, "is kick the tires before they buy the car."

I have been a fan of Biden for some years - he was always the guy who spoke his mind and sometimes did it too freely, as was evidenced by his early Obama gaffe. At least when he spoke he said intelligent things (most of the time) and kept you on your toes.

I agree that a candidate is likely to emerge from the many second tier hopefuls. It will be interesting to see how Biden carries himself during the debates. Obama is the most gifted orator, and Biden is a distant second, but I think that is where is best shot is going to come. He ought to at least be able to talk circles around Edwards and Clinton. It's going to be a fun season for politico's!

Maybe all the jockeying up front between the Democrat's Big 3 will cause all three heavy hitters to punch themselves out. Maybe a dark horse-like glad handing Joe Biden-can take the nomination. If he stays close, it'll at least keep the race interesting.

Will '08 Democrats Follow Murtha, Vote To Cut Troop Funds? (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, February 20, 2007

As dangerous as President Bush's record on Iraq may be to Republican presidential candidates in 2008, Democrats also are risking revival of fears that their party is weak on foreign policy.

If Democratic candidates embrace the strategy of Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) to cut off funds for U.S. troops in Iraq, they deserve to be compared to the losers of the past — George McGovern, Jimmy Carter, Walter Mondale, Michael Dukakis and Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.).

All lost presidential elections — often by landslides — mainly because voters perceived them as being unreliable in protecting the country from foreign adversaries.

This year, as in the past, the force-averse liberal base of the party is demanding ever-stronger statements and actions in opposition to the Iraq War and party leaders are obliging, with Murtha, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and presidential candidates either obliging or leading the process.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) is being massively pressured to apologize for her 2002 vote authorizing the war, as former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.) did. Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), who opposed the war from the beginning, has set a deadline for withdrawal of U.S. forces, as has Edwards. Clinton hasn't, but she says she would end the war if it's still going in 2009.

It's true that Bush's misguided and deeply unpopular policies in Iraq probably put an even greater political burden on Republicans.

The leading GOP presidential candidates, Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, all feel obligated to defend the war and Bush's current "surge."

But they also are trying to distance themselves from the tactics and strategies — largely the work of former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld — that have led the U.S. to the brink of disaster in Iraq.

This is not likely to work for the GOP candidates if Bush's surge policy fails. If the Iraq War ends the way the Vietnam War did in 1975, with a U.S. defeat, the next president is likely to be a Democrat, much as Carter won for the Democrats in 1976.

But it's worth remembering that Carter pretended to be a hawkish Democrat when running against then-incumbent President Gerald Ford — an Annapolis graduate and former nuclear submariner — and, at that, Ford almost beat him.

Democrats, to their credit, are not repeating all the errors of the Vietnam era. They do not disparage U.S. soldiers — quite the contrary, they claim to favor withdrawal as a means of protecting the troops.

Also, in the main, they profess to understand that the U.S. is involved in a long-term war on terror and favor a larger military, a better intelligence service and more forces in Afghanistan.

Still, there are reasons to doubt that, when it comes to new challenges, Democrats actually will be strong enough to protect the country and sustain the public's trust.

The Murtha proposal for de-funding the surge is cleverly drawn as a troop-protection measure, barring funds for deployment of units to Iraq that don't meet training, equipment or time-at-home standards.

But Republicans already are setting the stage to rightly characterize Murtha's plan as a denial of reinforcements for troops already in the field. And it's an attempt by Congress to micromanage a war, telling the commander in chief how to deploy his forces.

Moreover, Murtha announced his plans on an Internet program hosted by MoveOn.org, one of the most liberal elements of the Democratic coalition, evidence the McGovernite wing of the party is now in control of its foreign policy.

DOJ_NMG_0133897

Will candidates Clinton, Obama, Edwards and others follow the Murtha line? Indeed, will moderate House Members like Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) and Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.)?

They'll be tempted, for sure, if polls continue to show — as last week's Fox News poll did — that a majority of voters (54 percent) oppose a funding increase for U.S. operations in Iraq.

But according to the Congressional Research Service, this would represent the first time ever that Congress has voted to cut funding during actual war operations. In the cases of Vietnam and Somalia, cuts were voted after U.S. forces had already returned home, designed to keep them from going back.

Chances are strong that the Murtha ploy won't really affect Bush's actions because the surge already is under way and can be paid for out of already appropriated funds.

But will the next step of Iraq doves be stronger measures to deny funds for future operations, perhaps imposing a deadline for U.S. involvement? And will the '08 candidates be herded into this posture, too?

There's a precedent for Democrats heading like lemmings off a left-wing cliff. It was in the 1984 campaign, when Democrats vied with each other to claim first authorship of the "nuclear freeze" idea, which would have left the Soviet Union with a monopoly of intermediate-range missiles pointed at Europe.

The freeze idea was utterly discredited when then-President Ronald Reagan succeeded in winning a Soviet stand-down by getting Germany to agree to deploy U.S. Pershing missiles on its soil.

It's unfortunately clear that the Democratic Party lacks any candidate representing the foreign-policy toughness of Presidents Franklin Roosevelt, Harry Truman, John Kennedy or Lyndon Johnson. But do its candidates want to follow in the footsteps of Carter and Kerry?

States Race To Set Earlier Primaries (CSM)

By Daniel B. Wood

The Christian Science Monitor, February 20, 2007

LOS ANGELES

California is poised to play the first card in what experts say will be a national game of "reschedule your state's primary." The stakes: which state can gain significant influence over the presidential nominating process.

California's bid to move its 2008 primary from June to Feb. 5 – already approved by the state Senate and expected to clear the Assembly this week – is intended to force presidential candidates to stump in the Golden State, addressing issues dear to voters here before the contest is all but decided by others. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) has said he will sign the bill.

But already, nine states have tentatively scheduled primaries or caucuses for Feb. 5, and more may pile on as states jockey to meet notification deadlines: May for Democrats, September for Republicans. Among the delegate-rich states considering that date: Illinois, New Jersey, and Texas. Florida has a bill pending that would leapfrog them by moving its primary to Jan. 29.

The irony in all the jockeying is that, with so much change afoot, no state may achieve its aim, analysts say. The probable outcome of a front-loaded primary schedule is an early winnowing of the candidate field, with Feb. 5 becoming a do-or-die date, and a clipped-back period of time in which voters can assess presidential hopefuls at town halls and in their living rooms.

"California and other states that are trying to play calendar games are apt to find out that their plans backfire," says Larry Sabato, a political scientist at the University of Virginia. "We are courting disaster."

Feb. 5 could become a de facto national primary, political analysts say, because candidates who underperform in that vote would have trouble attracting donations that allow them to continue campaigning. And the party nominations could easily be sewn up in the three weeks between the Iowa caucuses on Jan. 14 and the Feb. 5 sweepstakes – giving the public insufficient time to watch and test the candidates, they say.

"With that many states front-loading their primary dates, the presidential campaign may get closure sooner, but people in each party may end up regretting the choice," says Jack Pitney, a political scientist at Claremont McKenna College in California. He cites the meteoric rise in 2004 of Howard Dean, the early Democratic front-runner, who later flamed out when voters watched him more closely over months of campaigning.

"They may find out things about the anointed nominees that they don't like, but find them out too late," says Dr. Pitney.

If states such as Florida, Michigan, and Illinois follow California's lead, he and others say, presidential nominations for both parties could be sewn up 10 months before the general election in November.

"We are about to have the most extended presidential campaign in American history, and that is the last thing the public wants," says Mr. Sabato.

These assessments do not cancel out the rationale for California and other states that want more clout in who picks presidential nominees, analysts say.

DOJ_NMG_0133898

"A Feb. 5 primary for California means California issues are finally going to be addressed by the candidates, rather than just farm or New England issues," says Robert Stern, president of the Center for Governmental Studies. "It means California voters – not just California donors like big Hollywood celebrities – [would] have a bigger say in the presidential primary."

If candidates are forced to consider California voters, concerns such as offshore oil drilling, illegal immigration, national security, and the environment might move up the issue agenda of candidates, say Mr. Stern and others.

Campaign styles and strategies may also be affected if more states move their primaries to Feb. 5. Campaigns in the early-voting states of Iowa, New Hampshire, and South Carolina have been characterized by up-close-and-personal meetings in coffee shops, meeting halls, and restaurants. If states with big populations and large terrain – like California – are added to the early-primary mix, candidates will no doubt adjust their money-raising and money-spending strategies.

"You won't see Hillary [Rodham] Clinton coming out to shake hands with voters in a small restaurant in L.A.," says Stern. "The state is simply too big. She'll need to spend her money more on television ads, radio, organizing staffs and logistics."

A candidate would also need more money earlier, to even consider a presidential race. That would represent a big change, some say. The day would be over when a candidate could plan to build a viable candidacy by attracting enough voters in a small state, and hope momentum and funds snowball from there.

The only way to end the primary chaos is to pass a constitutional amendment that would create a more uniform primary voting structure, says Sabato. One idea, he says, is to create four regional primaries – one each in April, May, June, and July, with national party conventions in August. The order of the regional primary votes would change with each presidential election cycle, decided by lottery Jan. 1.

"This would kill the permanent campaign because no [candidate] would know where to start and would eliminate the slingshot effect of winning just a couple of early primaries and vaulting to national prominence," says Sabato. "It makes so much sense it will never happen."

Two Democrats Refuse Party Cash (POL)

By Josh Kraushaar

The Politico, February 20, 2007

Despite Democratic successes in last November's midterm, two rookie Democratic congresswomen already are rejecting financial assistance from their leadership, a striking move aimed at cultivating an independent image for voters back home.

Reps. Nancy Boyda of Kansas and Carol Shea-Porter of New Hampshire have declined to participate in the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee's "Frontline" program, which helps vulnerable members raise money early and receive logistical support for their re-election bids.

Twenty-nine members, including 24 freshmen, qualified for the program in mid-February. DCCC officials were not immediately available for comment. The DCCC official blog noted, however, that the campaign committee was not "writing off" Boyda and Shea-Porter and left open the possibility of helping both if they were subjected to GOP attacks.

Boyda would have been a prime candidate for assistance. She represents a solidly Republican district where President Bush received 59 percent of the vote against Sen. John F. Kerry, D-Mass., in the 2004 presidential election.

Boyda spokeswoman Shanan Guinn said the congresswoman wants to position herself as an independent heading into 2008.

"She's making her own decisions based on what people want her to focus on," Guinn said. "She ran an independent campaign in 2006, and her constituents want to see her run an independent campaign again."

When Boyda ran against Rep. Jim Ryun in 2004, she embraced the trappings of a modern-day campaign. She raised nearly as much money as Ryun, hired big-name Democratic consultants and spent plentifully on television ads.

Chastened by a 15-point defeat, Boyda in 2006 scaled back her operations and ran what one Democratic operative called a "Kansas-centric campaign." Her husband, Steve, served as her campaign manager. Instead of running expensive ads on television, she bought informational inserts in the local newspaper. She didn't receive support from the DCCC until the final weeks of her campaign.

While Boyda's ability to prevail against long odds worked in 2006, it will be difficult for her to run an under-the-radar campaign for a second time. Republicans have identified her as one of their top targets in 2008. And she's even drawn fire from Democrats after commenting she was planning to vote for President Bush's troop increase because her district voted for the president twice. (Instead, on Friday she voted for the Democratic resolution opposing the president's troop increase.)

Ryun is now seeking a rematch. He may face a primary challenge from state Treasurer Lynn Jenkins, who has been elected twice in landslides.

Shea-Porter's decision to bypass the DCCC program is less surprising. In 2006 the committee backed her primary opponent, Jim Craig, and didn't provide any money for her upset victory over Republican Rep. Jeb Bradley.

DOJ_NMG_0133899

Shea-Porter shunned consultants throughout the whole bare-bones campaign, relying on a group of dedicated party activists. Her home's oven served as a repository for campaign literature. Her 82-year-old mother was the star of one of her campaign's two commercials. She spent $253,000 on her successful bid -- the lowest amount among winning challengers.

"I appreciated the offer," Shea-Porter said of the DCCC incumbent retention program. "I decided to run the campaign the way that I did before -- retail politics.

"I am happy to follow a grassroots campaign," she said. "But I am asking the Republican opponent to carry the same kind of campaign."

Shea-Porter added that she reserves the right to change her mind if her Republican opponent engages in negative campaigning.

She ended the year with about $68,000 in the bank, and has raised $7,380 since the election.

State Democratic Chairman Kathy Sullivan said Shea-Porter will soon be holding small fundraisers in New Hampshire and understands she will have to raise more money than in 2006. But Sullivan thinks her strategy to bypass the DCCC will benefit her politically in New Hampshire, where retail, grassroots politics rules.

"Will she drive the DCCC a little bit crazy because she's not the traditional D.C. candidate? Sure," Sullivan said. "But people like that here in New Hampshire."

Shea-Porter's low-budget, quirky campaign style will make her an inviting GOP target for 2008. With presidential and Senate races driving up turnout, Republicans believe that they'll be in better position to challenge her. Bradley has already declared he's running again in 2008, though he may face a primary challenge from the right.

But if dismay over the Iraq war remains a central issue, Shea-Porter could again be propelled by what proved to be a winning issue last year.

"She knows her district, she knows how she won," said Sullivan. "People like the fact she's independent. She likes telling the party bosses that they can't tell her what to do."

For Republican strategists, the decisions by Shea-Porter and Boyda to reject party help raise their political vulnerabilities in 2008.

"This confirms what we already know -- that these are going to be top pickup opportunities for us," said Julie Shutley, spokeswoman for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Slamming Tax Cuts Seen As A Risky Move (WT)

By Donald Lambro, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 19, 2007

Virtually all the Democratic presidential contenders have denounced President Bush's tax cuts and called for raising the rates on wealthier Americans, but Republican strategists say their plan will backfire in the 2008 election.

Bashing the Bush tax cuts as "tax cuts for the wealthy" has become the favorite Democratic mantra ever since he enacted his across-the-board tax-reduction plan in 2001 -- which included increased tax credits for families with children and lower tax rates for every income bracket.

Every Democrat seeking the presidential nomination who was in Congress at the time voted against the Bush tax cuts and has called for repealing some of the income-tax rate reductions if they are elected president. Most say their tax increases would hit only the very wealthiest Americans earning more than $200,000 a year.

Republican tax-cut advocates say: "Don't believe it."

If the Democrats campaign on raising taxes just for people at the top tax rate, "it will backfire on them for two reasons," said economic strategist Cesar Conda, a former chief domestic policy adviser to Vice President Dick Cheney.

"Number one: A lot of small businesses, small proprietorships, pay the top individual tax rate, so they will be raising taxes on small businesses and entrepreneurs. Number two: A lot of the polls I've seen suggest that the American people don't believe that the Democratic tax increases will stop at just the rich, that eventually it will hit the middle class," Mr. Conda said.

"The Democrats are falling into the trap of becoming the tax-and-spend party again," said Mr. Conda, now a private consultant and economic adviser to former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a 2008 Republican presidential candidate.

Some Democrats are also cautioning their party's presidential aspirants to be careful how they present their tax proposals to the voters next year.

DOJ_NMG_0133900

"Democrats have to define themselves as proponents in the battle for the middle class, so that any tax increases they espouse, like rolling back part of the Bush tax cuts for the wealthy, should be used primarily for middle class tax cuts," said James Kessler, issues director for the Third Way, a centrist Democratic advocacy group.

"Each party comes into the political races with preconceptions. The preconceptions about the Democrats is that they are more likely to raise taxes than the Republicans, so you do have to be careful. Democrats need to have a series of middle class tax cuts that are real," Mr. Kessler said.

But with few exceptions, the Democratic contenders have railed against all of the Bush tax cuts without making distinctions in its provisions, blaming the tax cuts for everything from the budget deficits to fighting the war on terrorism.

"If we hadn't passed the big tax cuts last spring that undermined our fiscal responsibility and our ability to deal with this new threat of terrorism, we wouldn't be in the fix we're in today," Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York said in the fall of 2001 after the September 11 attacks.

Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, also a tax-cut critic, wrote in his best-selling book "The Audacity of Hope" that Mr. Bush's tax cuts worsened perceived wage stagnation and income inequality. Although he was not in the Senate when the tax cuts were passed, he voted last year against extending the capital-gains tax cut and for repealing it.

More recently, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina proposed increasing the tax rate for the top 35 percent in order to raise up to $120 billion to pay for his universal health care plan.

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson may be the only exception among the Democratic candidates. In his first term as governor, Mr. Richardson reduced income-tax rates across the spectrum, as Mr. Bush did, cutting the state's top income-tax rate from 8.2 percent to 4.9 percent over five years.

Matching Free Trade With Taxes (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, February 19, 2007

The last time a Democrat controlled the White House, he defended globalization. He understood that trade creates losers, and he sought to assist them with progressive tax and spending policies. But today's leading Democrats are flirting with the opposite approach. They are forthright in their complaints about trade. But, with the notable exception of John Edwards, they are surprisingly reluctant to propose tax hikes.

You can see why Democratic sentiment has shifted. Globalization is no longer what it was when Bill Clinton shepherded the North American Free Trade Agreement and the Uruguay Round through Congress. China's economy has quadrupled in size; India has emerged as a competitor; the sense of insecurity has spread from a handful of vulnerable industries to much of the economy. And yet if they reverse the Clinton formula, the Democrats will be doubly wrong. They will be swallowing left-wing propaganda about trade and right-wing propaganda about tax cuts.

Paradoxically, the changes that have made globalization less popular have rendered resistance to it less fruitful. Back in the 1980s, trade put pressure on big, vertically integrated industries: cars, electronics. In the new world of outsourcing and global supply chains, vertically integrated enterprises have been sliced into discreet processes; trade now puts pressure on tasks rather than on industries. Back-office administration and phone-based customer support may shift to India, and this shift may affect industries from banking to medical services. The manufacturing and assembly of components may be outsourced to Mexico or Asia, and this change may affect everything from toys to telephones.

So trade now threatens workers in more industries. Even if it still causes less dislocation than technological change, we shouldn't be surprised that anti-globalization sentiment has sharpened. But the advent of competition in tasks also renders protectionist remedies less sensible than ever.

In the era of vertically integrated industries, there was a superficial plausibility in the economic-nationalist case for trade barriers. Big American corporations that did nearly all of their production at home were up against Japanese and German rivals that were equally rooted in their own countries: "If they win, we lose" was an understandable attitude. But now this picture has been scrambled. America Inc. had become Global Inc.: It's hard to erect trade barriers without disrupting corporate America's supply chains. The world's fastest-rising trader illustrates the point. More than half of Chinese exports are made by subsidiaries of foreign companies.

Advocates of trade barriers want to protect workers as well as corporations, but this rationale is also fraying. The old case for tariffs was based on the fact that trade-affected workers were often geographically clustered: If cheap Asian steel hammered a Midwestern steel town, protectionists argued that steelworkers could not be expected to adapt and find new jobs because steel was the sole prop of their communities. But the new competition in tasks rather than industries renders the tragedy of the company town increasingly rare. If a data-entry clerk loses her job in Omaha, she can probably find other work without having to move.

So trade protectionism, which always damaged economic growth, has now lost the few arguments that supported it. Globalization has caused understandable anxieties, but tariffs are a useless therapy. The alternative of helping globalization's losers with tax-financed spending programs is more promising by far. For, contrary to what conservatives routinely assert, tax-and-spend programs need not be bad for the economy.

Consider the work of Peter Lindert of the University of California at Davis. In a magisterial work published three years ago, Lindert analyzed tax-financed transfers across rich economies and found no correlation with the rate of growth or with gross domestic product per person. This, Lindert continued, should not be surprising. What matters for growth is less the quantity of tax and spending programs than their quality.

Lindert is no party-line liberal. He argues that high taxes in Europe don't damage growth because they hit consumption and labor rather than savings and capital: This is an uncomfortable point for those who want the tax system to be progressive. But Lindert also argues that high taxes are compatible with growth if the revenue is spent well. Investments in education and public infrastructure boost a country's growth rate. Programs that break the link between employment and health insurance enhance the flexibility of workers. Subsidized child care keeps women in the workforce, encouraging employers to invest in training them.

None of this suggests that high taxes are risk-free, especially if they finance programs with no growth payoff -- such as entitlements for the elderly. But knee-jerk opposition to raising taxes is misguided. The government could and should spend more on making health care portable and retraining displaced workers. That is a much better bet than protectionism.

In Iowa, The Living Room Has Fallen Out Of Favor (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, February 19, 2007

DUBUQUE, Iowa, Feb. 18 — Iowa, with its first-in-the-nation presidential caucuses, has been celebrated for 30 years for its intimate campaigns where future presidents would perch on living room couches or sit at kitchen tables and take questions from 20 or 30 people late into the night.

But it was standing room only on Sunday afternoon at the Grand River Center here, where hundreds of people showed up for a forum with John Edwards, a Democratic candidate for president. When Mr. Edwards asked for questions, dozens of hands shot up. Many were still up when he called an end to the meeting.

Mr. Edwards's experience has been shared by most of the major candidates on recent visits to Iowa, almost a year before the caucuses. It is evidence of what appears to be the demise of the living room campaign, signaling a potentially profound change in the way presidential campaigns are conducted here, and to a lesser extent in New Hampshire.

A chapter in American political history that began in 1976 when Jimmy Carter rose from obscurity by working the living rooms and kitchens of Iowa may be drawing to a end. It is, at least for this election cycle, the victim of an era of celebrity candidates tracked by busloads of reporters, and of intense interest in the 2008 race among voters, who are turning out in numbers that would fill many, many living rooms.

"Perhaps it's time to write the obit to the living room," David Yepsen, the state's premier political columnist, wrote in The Des Moines Register after Senator Barack Obama drew thousands of people to a gym in Ames. "They are now relics of past campaigns, as ancient as the torchlight parade. Rock-star candidates need room for their fans and the gawkers."

Chuck Larson, a former chairman of the Iowa Republican Party and a senior adviser to the campaign of Senator John McCain, said that when Mr. McCain planned his campaign stops here for this weekend, he did not even try to set up the kind of small gatherings that were once Iowa's signature political events. "For any candidate of significance, I think those days are in all honesty gone," Mr. Larson said Sunday.

To a certain extent — and with all due respect to veteran chroniclers of the American political system given to nostalgia and perhaps idealized memories of past Iowa journeys — this may not be an entirely bad thing.

The events for Mr. Obama, the Democratic senator from Illinois, were bustling with young faces that were not familiar to many Iowa political activists. The crowds turning out for the candidates suggest that this extraordinarily competitive and wide-open campaign, taking place amid a nationwide debate on the war in Iraq and on the heels of the Democrats' recapturing of Congress, has engaged Americans in a way they have not been engaged in a long time. While the sites may be bigger and less intimate, candidates like Mr. Edwards and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton are still inviting question after question.

Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton have also at least tried to have some smaller gatherings, but there is no getting around the fact that living rooms have given way to hotel ballrooms, coliseums and gymnasiums.

Some Iowans have noticed the change. They wonder if, or perhaps hope, this is a passing phase.

Theresa Grutz, a special education teacher from Dubuque, lamented the change as she took her place at Mr. Edwards's forum here. "You get to ask questions," she said of the more intimate gatherings. "You keep asking them and you keep asking them until you get an answer, and not a sound bite."

DOJ_NMG_0133902

Mr. Larson argued that there were some advantages to the new style. Mr. McCain saw 1,200 potential caucusgoers in three events on Saturday, compared with perhaps 100 he could have met in private homes. Mr. Larson said smaller meetings were less crucial because of the advent of Internet video streaming.

On the other hand, candidates have lost the laboratories that gave them a chance to learn about issues and formulate responses to tough questions, and make beginner mistakes, out of sight of rival campaigns and reporters.

Jennifer O'Malley, the Iowa director of Mr. Edwards's campaign, said the more personal campaigning, with candidates spending time with voters, was critical for caucuses, in which people need to be particularly motivated to turn out for two hours on a Monday night.

"A conversation with voters is much more important than a television ad," she said.

Some campaign officials said they expected voters' attendance to die down and news media interest to fade as the candidates continued an exhausting trudge across the state, before exploding again in the final weeks, as has historically been the case. Of course, that might just mean that a crowd of 800 would drop to 400.

Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama have gamely tried to replicate the living room experience, but it has not worked particularly well.

A Clinton event in Cedar Rapids was, unusually though understandably, invitation-only. Even so, the house became so crowded that people had to peer around corners and over shoulders to catch a glimpse of Mrs. Clinton. To deal with the crush of national reporters — a big part of the problem — her campaign assigned one to act as pool correspondent and share the information; inevitably, however, others sneaked in.

Last week, Mr. Obama's campaign aides scheduled one session in the home of Tom and Patti Friend of Iowa Falls. But after the Friends put a notice of the event in the newspaper, 200 people showed up, spilling out of the living room. When Mr. Obama walked through the door, the booming applause made it clear that the gathering was not so intimate after all; he had to climb up the stairs to find a speck of floor to speak from.

One day after Mr. Obama appeared there, he bounded onto the stage at the Field House at the University of New Hampshire in Durham. Christine Sohl, who arrived early to get a seat about 20 rows back, recalled meeting a little-known governor named Bill Clinton in a group of no more than 20 people.

Four campaigns later, she strained to see Mr. Obama. "This is as close as we'll get," she said.

Campaigns Find New Homes In Iowa (USAT)

By Judy Keen, Usa Today

USA Today, February 19, 2007

Downtown Des Moines rents getting too pricey

Development in downtown Des Moines is forcing some presidential campaigns to locate their offices in the suburbs, ending an era when cheap, temporary headquarters were clustered in the city center.

For years, it's been easy to walk between many candidates' offices, downtown hotels for news conferences and favorite eateries such as 801 Steak & Chop House, frequented by reporters and political operatives with expense accounts.

Hanging out downtown was part of the charm of the presidential primary season, when everyone working the campaigns camped out in Des Moines for weeks. Now, many campaign headquarters are 7 or 8 miles away.

"Candidates want inexpensive space. They're going to have to move out of town to get that right now," says Dennis Connolly, a commercial real estate agent in Des Moines since 1977. "There's a lot of tearing down and putting up new structures downtown."

Iowa hosts the nation's first presidential voting in its caucuses, and Des Moines is the political and geographic center of the state.

Parts of "candidate row" on Locust Street have been replaced by a new park, Western Gateway, and new buildings around it. Other downtown buildings were demolished or converted to apartments and condos.

In 2003, the headquarters of Democratic Sen. John Kerry and Vermont Gov. Howard Dean were a block apart on Locust. The building Kerry's campaign occupied now displays antique cars. Dean's former headquarters is in a building about to be renovated.

Democratic Sen. John Edwards' office was four blocks away on Grand Avenue. That space, a former auto dealership, is vacant. Edwards' office this year is east of downtown.

"There were wonderful opportunities four years ago for campaigns with vacant buildings downtown that landlords couldn't rent," says Susan Ramsey, spokeswoman for the Greater Des Moines Partnership, which helps businesses locate or expand. "Those opportunities don't exist any longer."

Instead, campaign offices are scattered elsewhere:

DOJ_NMG_0133903

·The national headquarters for Tom Vilsack, a former Iowa governor seeking the Democratic nomination, is on the city's western edge. "We're closer to the airport, closer to the freeway and there's plenty of growth space," spokesman Josh Earnest says.

·Sen. John McCain's campaign didn't even consider locating downtown, says Dave Roederer, state chairman of the Arizona Republican's campaign. The suburban Urbandale office is cheaper, "especially when you factor in the parking," he says.

·Former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee's staff will soon move to Urbandale, about 8 miles from downtown.

"People don't want to drive all the way downtown at night to volunteer," says Eric Woolson, a spokesman for the Republican's Iowa campaign.

·The headquarters of former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney's Republican campaign also will be in Urbandale.

"It just makes a lot more sense in terms of finding volunteers" who live there and in nearby West Des Moines and Clive, says Tim Albrecht, a Romney spokesman. "At the end of the day, it's all about location."

Sunshine For Hoods (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

Following the example of Eliot Spitzer, state attorneys general have had a field day using their power to accuse all and sundry of wrong-doing. So it's only fair that a little sun is now beginning to shine on the cozy business relationships between these AGs and their trial lawyer buddies.

The sight won't be pretty, judging from a recent Associated Press report that former California AG Bill Lockyer's office concealed tens of millions of dollars in contracts with lobbyists and legal firms. California has an open-records law so the public can see how officials spend their money. Yet Mr. Lockyer's office incorrectly labeled dozens of contracts "confidential" and thus kept them out of public sight.

Now state treasurer, Mr. Lockyer says this was just a simple mistake. But the records sure are revealing. The law firm of Cotkin, Collins and Ginsberg received a $2 million contract to work on an insurance case. That same firm has donated to Mr. Lockyer's political committees. Two other no-bid contracts, worth as much as $489,000, went to the Ferguson Group, a Washington lobbying outfit. Ferguson's president was the legislative director for former California Congressman Vic Fazio, a Lockyer pal.

Going back to 2003, Mr. Lockyer's office labeled as "confidential" more than 1,700 contracts valued at more than $100 million. The AP asked California's Department of Justice -- now run by Attorney General Jerry Brown -- to inspect a sample of 131 contracts. That review found that only 12 deserved to be confidential. One test of Mr. Brown's desire for honest government will be whether he now allows a review of all contracts.

This episode also has Californians calling for legislation to require its AG both to publicly disclose contracts and subject them to competitive bidding. A movement -- led by the American Legislative Exchange Council and the Institute for Legal Reform -- is also spreading for model legislation known as the "Private Attorney Retention Sunshine Act." So far, seven states have adopted some variant of legislation, and West Virginia and Mississippi are debating whether to follow suit.

Mississippi is a fitting place for this fight, as it may well be the birthplace of AG-tort bar collusion. In the 1990s, then-Attorney General Mike Moore hired several tort lawyer friends to take the lead in his mammoth tobacco suit. Trial lawyer Dickie Scruggs later acknowledged making hundreds of millions of dollars in contingency fees; not bad for government work.

Current AG Jim Hood struck an equally suspicious deal as part of his $100 million settlement in 2005 with MCI/WorldCom over back taxes. Mr. Hood hired attorney Joey Langston as outside counsel to represent Mississippi in negotiations with MCI. Mr. Langston's firm shared half of $14 million in legal fees as a result of the settlement. You won't be shocked to learn Mr. Langston was Mr. Hood's largest individual campaign contributor.

As a reaction to this mutual back-scratching, the Mississippi senate earlier this month passed a sunshine act to require the AG to solicit proposals from at least three law firms for contracts larger than $1 million; it would also set up a review board to inspect proposals. Mr. Hood went bananas, claiming it was a "politically motivated" bill designed to "prevent the state from catching" corporations that defraud consumers. He's rallying Democrats to oppose the bill. The office of West Virginia AG Darrell McGraw has been similarly dismissive of legislators' desire to spotlight his trial-bar contracts.

You have to smile at their nerve. These are the same AGs who deplore the mere appearance of a "conflict of interest" in business, and who justify their lawsuits as protecting state consumers. Yet they don't seem to think it's a conflict if their offices sign contracts with law firms that return a cut of their profits back to the AGs as campaign contributions.

Even worse, these contracts often include contingency fee deals that guarantee outside lawyers a slice of any settlement. This means the AGs can initiate legal proceedings against an industry with little risk to the state, while the outside attorneys have every incentive to push for the highest dollar settlement. Doing justice takes a backseat to the big-dollar payout. This AG-tort bar alliance confronts companies with a double whammy that makes it far more risky to fight a lawsuit. Even companies that are unfairly sued are inclined to settle, and the AGs can thus impose new rules and regulations via lawsuit rather than having to pass legislation.

State attorney generals have become an unchecked source of government abuse in recent years, combining political ambition with the awesome power to prosecute. They need to be reined in, and a good place to start is by exposing their sweetheart contracts with their trial lawyer friends and campaign contributors.

New York's Bully Governor (NYT)

The New York Times, February 19, 2007

Almost everybody who voted for Gov. Eliot Spitzer last year realized that he would not tread lightly. In fact, Governor Spitzer's pugilistic tendency was probably a main reason for his landslide victory. It is also why 60 percent of New Yorkers recently agreed with Mr. Spitzer that he is just the "steamroller" that is needed for one of the worst legislatures in the country.

Nevertheless, those lawmakers seemed stunned when Mr. Spitzer came out slugging after they exhibited some of their lesser instincts. When the governor began openly criticizing individual legislators in their home districts, the Albany crowd went into culture shock. They talked about how Mr. Spitzer was not playing by the rules. They talked about how he was upsetting the political etiquette. Joseph Bruno, the Senate leader, whined to reporters last week that the governor was a "bully." Maybe so. But a bully is just what New York needs right now — a governor strong, smart and articulate enough to break up the Albany cartel.

The downturn in Mr. Spitzer's relations with the legislative establishment came earlier this month when legislators, particularly Mr. Spitzer's fellow Democrats in the Assembly, reneged on a deal to pick a new state comptroller. Instead of choosing one of three finalists picked by former comptrollers, they decided on Assemblyman Thomas DiNapoli, who is far less qualified. Legislators who celebrated this big, in-your-face victory over the governor should by now be worrying about their jobs.

Minutes after that vote, the governor went on the attack. As he traveled around the state to promote his budget, he added criticism for two fellow Democrats who had voted for Mr. DiNapoli — Assemblymen George Latimer of Westchester and William Magnarelli of Syracuse. That sent a loud signal that individual lawmakers can no longer hide behind their leaders and coast to re-election.

Mr. Spitzer and his staff are also taking other detours around the ultrapowerful legislative leaders — Mr. Bruno and Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver. If Mr. Spitzer can break these two leaders' stranglehold on public policy, more power to him.

Other governors are undoubtedly watching to see if Mr. Spitzer's high-intensity strategy will work over the long term. Both California's Arnold Schwarzenegger and New Jersey's Jon Corzine have been forced to make peace with wayward legislatures to get anything done. Mr. Spitzer will also have to negotiate with lawmakers to get a budget, begin reforms and pass the progressive laws the state has needed for some time. But unlike other governors who spend too much time wooing and not enough time challenging, Mr. Spitzer can now negotiate his reform agenda from a position of strength.

Blair Backs Tougher Gun Laws For Youths (WP)

By Mary Jordan, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, February 19, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 18 -- Prime Minister Tony Blair announced Sunday that he wanted to lower to 17 the age at which a mandatory five-year sentence could be imposed for illegally possessing a gun. The announcement followed the shooting deaths of three teenagers.

Britain has strict gun laws, and even most of its police officers do not carry guns. But a recent spurt in shootings and youth gang violence has alarmed many Britons and led to armed police patrols in areas of south London.

Currently, defendants older than 21 must serve a minimum five-year prison sentence if convicted of illegally possessing a firearm. But Blair, in an interview with the BBC, said, "We've got to lower that age . . . down to the age of 17."

Speaking ahead of an emergency summit on gun crime this week, Blair said his government is seeking to overhaul violent crime laws, including adding penalties for gang membership and measures to protect people who testify against gangs.

Police said gun crime fell last year, but 2007 has started with several shooting deaths.

In the past two weeks, James Smartt-Ford, 16, was gunned down at a south London ice rink and Michael Dosunmu, 15, was shot and killed by a gunman in his bedroom. Eight days later, Billy Cox, 15, was shot dead at his home, also in south London. Another man was shot and killed Saturday in London, and three people were injured in two weekend shootings in Manchester, in northwest England.

The killings, particularly those involving young people, have underscored the menacing culture of youth gangs, armed with knives, hammers and, increasingly, guns.

Although gun crime is still relatively uncommon here -- there were 50 firearm-related killings last year in England and Wales -- many Britons are concerned that young people see them as a cool accessory.

DOJ_NMG_0133905

"We have got to analyze what is going wrong here," Blair said. "Is it a general state of British society, British young people? And I think it isn't. It is about a specific problem within a specific criminal culture to do with guns and gangs."

Some say the shootings are a symptom of troubled British youths and families.

"The issue here is the circumstances they grow up in, the broken families -- and that's not confined to any one sector of society -- and the massively rife drug culture," David Davis, a leading member of the opposition Conservative Party, said Sunday. "The problems have been growing for a decade."

Will Deal Give N. Korea Millions In Cash? (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball And Richard Wolffe

Newsweek, February 19, 2007

Hard-liners already loathe the new deal in which Kim Jong Il's regime has agreed to halt activity at its main nuclear plant in return for emergency oil supplies. John Bolton, who recently departed as U.S. envoy to the United Nations, told NEWSWEEK: "We violated the principle that we don't reward bad behavior." Promises to ease North Korea's economic squeeze are among key elements of the deal (struck by the United States and other participants in the Six-Party diplomatic talks). Among the provisions of the agreement are promises by the United States to begin direct talks with North Korea about "moving toward full diplomatic relations," and that Washington will take steps to remove Pyongyang from its official list of state sponsors of terrorism. In return, Pyongyang agreed to "shut down and seal" its main nuke reactor at Yongbyon.

But Pyongyang may also get access to controversial bank accounts. Meeting in Beijing three weeks ago, North Korean and U.S. Treasury officials held detailed talks about 52 bank accounts in Macau's Banco Delta Asia that the Macau government froze after Washington in 2005 accused the bank of money laundering. The 52 accounts, containing about $24 million, were frozen on suspicion that North Korea was using them for illicit purposes. Washington is still threatening to issue an order curbing U.S. banks' dealing with Banco Delta Asia, which has now been taken over by the government of Macau. But U.S. officials, who asked for anonymity due to the sensitivity of the subject, indicated that following further discussions with Washington, it is possible Macau authorities may lift restrictions on some of the accounts, enabling Pyongyang to regain some of its cash.

Administration hard-liners appear to have been unable to thwart diplomacy. Former officials close to Vice President Dick Cheney, who asked not to be identified characterizing his views, suggest he does not like the deal but believes there are enough get-out clauses to ensure either that Pyongyang complies or the whole bargain collapses. Cheney had long influenced North Korea policy through powerful bureaucratic allies who battled what they viewed as State Department appeasers. But Bolton, a leading hawk on North Korea, left the administration when Congress refused to confirm him as permanent U.N. ambassador. Robert Joseph, another key hard-liner, is soon to leave his job as State Department under secretary for arms control. Cheney himself may be the last hard-liner. But White House aides, along with the veep's allies (anonymous when discussing the men's relationship), acknowledge that Bush relies far less on Cheney's judgment now than he did earlier in his presidency.

Hold The Applause (USNEWS)

By Thomas Omestad

U.S. News and World Report, February 19, 2007

Last week's nuclear deal with North Korea, said a smiling Condoleezza Rice, took "patient, creative, and tough diplomacy." All true, but the secretary of state's upbeat summary masked an array of obstacles that had to be overcome merely to start down the long road toward stripping North Korea of any nuclear weapons and facilities. The obstacles included not only the North's legendary obstinance but also bitter disputes within the Bush administration. President Bush now appears to have sided with those who favor engaging Pyongyang over those who want to squeeze it in hopes of hastening the "evil" regime's collapse. "Rice was convinced, and that convinced the president," said Michael Green, Bush's former top Asia hand at the National Security Council.

And yet for all the relief by fatigued negotiators from the United States and five other countries, the hardest tasks have been left for the future. In its first phase, the accord will not eliminate any of North Korea's nuclear weapons. Experts estimate the North now has between four and 13 bombs' worth of plutonium.

Administration officials have insisted they would not reward the North's nuclear "bad behavior." But that, hard-line critics complain, is just what the deal does. Paradoxically, their assertion that North Korea had bested the United States is shared by some deal backers. Their complaint: The years of delay allowed Pyongyang to multiply its plutonium stockpile since the crisis erupted in October 2002. Says a former U.S. official, "We could have done this four years ago and gotten a better deal."

The "ABC" policy. The new accord brought immediate comparisons with the Clinton administration's 1994 bilateral pact that until 2002 delivered fuel aid, among other benefits, for a reactor freeze. The Clinton approach was the foil against which hawks rallied, dubbing the Bush policy "ABC"-Anything but Clinton. The idea was to do nothing to abet the survival of Kim Jong

Il's repressive regime. Last week, Rice argued that the new pact should be more durable because it is multilateral, backed up by power players like Russia, South Korea, Japan, and, especially, China. U.S. News has learned that China, host of the talks, pushed back on Pyongyang for nearly scuttling the accord by demanding even more energy aid.

The agreement builds on the September 2005 joint principles for denuclearizing the North in exchange for security guarantees and economic and political benefits. Pyongyang is now obligated to halt and seal its Yongbyon reactor within 60 days, verified by U.N. inspectors. It will receive initial aid of 50,000 tons of heavy fuel oil. As it disables nuclear facilities in a second phase, it gets 950,000 tons of fuel oil-all told worth $250 million to $300 million.

Key move. U.S. officials also will try to rapidly resolve a dispute with North Korea over money-laundering sanctions that nearly derailed progress in the nuclear talks. Five working groups will meet on security, political, and economic issues. One will focus on normalizing U.S.-North Korea ties. Washington agreed to "begin the process" of removing the North from the U.S. terrorism list and from countries sanctioned under the Trading with the Enemy Act. That could be key for Pyongyang. "They want a normal, long-term relationship with the United States," says Stanford University scholar John Lewis, who has visited North Korea 15 times.

Bush, Howard Discuss North Korea, Wars In Iraq And Afghanistan (AFP)

AFP, February 20, 2007

WASHINGTON - US President George W. Bush spoke with Australian Prime Minister John Howard about the North Korea nuclear deal and the military campaigns in Iraq and Afghanistan, the White House said.

Bush spoke to Howard by telephone as US Vice President Dick Cheney headed to Japan and Australia to discuss their roles in Iraq and Afghanistan and common challenges like China's rise and North Korea's nuclear program.

The two leaders spoke a week after a breakthrough nuclear deal was reached at talks in Beijing between the United States, the two Koreas, China, Japan and Russia.

Bush and Howard "discussed the recent agreement at the Six Party talks," White House National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe said in a statement.

Under the deal, the Stalinist regime has 60 days to shut down its main Yongbyon nuclear reactor and allow United Nations nuclear inspectors back into the country.

The energy-starved regime would in turn receive a first tranche of 50,000 tonnes of fuel oil -- part of an eventual one million tonnes and additional diplomatic, security and other guarantees if it permanently disables its key nuclear facilities.

Bush and Howard also discussed the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Australia contributes troops to both efforts.

"The president thanked the prime minister for Australia's continuing support in Iraq and Afghanistan," Johndroe said.

Bush and Howard also discussed "the detainee issue and shared expectations of a fair and orderly process," he said without elaborating.

The Australian government has been pressing Washington to try as soon as possible Australian terror suspect David Hicks, who has been held at the US military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba for more than five years.

Hicks, 31, was captured in Afghanistan in late 2001 where he was alleged to have been fighting with Taliban forces against US troops.

Cheney's Influence Lessens In Second Term (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

Mistrustful of North Korea and its willingness to keep promises, Vice President Cheney worked hard in President Bush's first term to prevent talks aimed at halting that country's push to develop a nuclear bomb. At one point three years ago, he even bypassed the State Department to intervene in delicate negotiations over Pyongyang's nuclear activities.

But this month Cheney stayed out of the way as a top State Department negotiator wrapped up a nuclear agreement with North Korea -- a deal that many of the vice president's conservative allies consider foolhardy and that some of his own staff are said to find hard to swallow.

The contrast underscores the vice president's shifting status in Washington. There is no evidence that Cheney's close relationship with Bush has been lessened. But there is also little doubt that the causes he has championed -- a tough skepticism of negotiations with dictatorships such as North Korea and the forceful exercise of presidential authority -- are being rethought within the Bush administration, according to officials inside the government and experts outside it.

The North Korea deal is only the latest example of a new pragmatism forced on the administration by a series of court decisions, the deteriorating situation in Iraq and -- perhaps most of all -- the Democratic takeover of Congress.

The White House has made a concerted effort to be more conciliatory with Capitol Hill; to make rhetorical nods to issues such as global warming and income inequality, which drew little attention in Bush's first term; to permit court review of secret wiretapping of terrorism suspects; and to make new diplomatic initiatives in the Middle East and elsewhere.

"There's no question in the current political situation that Cheney has lost clout," said Leslie H. Gelb, former president of the Council on Foreign Relations. "He's lost clout because Bush has to prove he's not an international confrontationalist, warmonger and diplomatic bungler. If you have such a reputation, you can't function as president."

It hasn't helped Cheney that his former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby -- who had aggressively advanced the vice president's interests through a sometimes hostile bureaucracy -- has been sidelined because of his role in the Valerie Plame case. The government's perjury case against Libby will go to the jury this week after a trial that exposed the vice president's large behind-the-scenes involvement in seeking to discredit Joseph C. Wilson IV, a former ambassador who accused Cheney and other administration officials of twisting intelligence in the run-up to the Iraq war.

Some conservatives close to the administration see Libby's resignation after his indictment in late 2005 as part of the unraveling of a Cheney network, leaving a void that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, the engineer of the North Korea deal, has exploited. Others who have departed include Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld; his deputy, Paul D. Wolfowitz; and lower-level aides with long-standing ties to Cheney.

One former administration official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to talk more candidly, said Cheney's office has "disappeared" on foreign policy under Libby's replacement, David Addington, and the vice president's foreign policy adviser, John P. Hannah. "Addington and Hannah are smart people, but they are no Scooter. Scooter worked 25 hours a day and he had Addington and Hannah working for him, so it was a powerful combination," this source said. "The result is that Cheney is taking a back seat, and there is no check or balance on Condi in foreign policy. It is what Condi decides and what the president agrees to."

Figuring out how much influence Cheney has is a longtime Washington parlor game -- but the answer is ultimately unknowable, given that almost all of his advice is offered privately, and both the president and his No. 2 zealously guard the details. The two meet for a private lunch once a week, share intelligence briefings and get together with staff for policy discussions.

Only 37 percent of Americans view Cheney favorably, according to the most recent USA Today-Gallup poll, but he remains an important emissary to key constituencies, foreign and domestic. He elicited laughter last week when, speaking to the National Association of Manufacturers in the middle of a snowstorm, he quipped, "The good news is, the federal government is shut down today -- so everybody's safe." He left yesterday for a long-planned trip to Australia and Japan, where he is expected to reassure the allies about the North Korea deal.

Cheney still shows up two or three times a month at policy lunches for Senate Republicans. "I know that he is very comfortable fundamentally with the approach the Bush administration has taken to the war on terrorism, which is go after them hard, keep them on the run and empower moderates," said Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.).

But many who know Cheney believe he is out of step with the current tenor of the administration, noting that he has offered none of the concessions of error that Bush has tried out recently to regain lost credibility on Iraq.

"Dick was always very realistic," said Kenneth L. Adelman, the Reagan administration arms-control official who has known Cheney for more than three decades. "I don't really understand how month after month he gets briefings showing Iraq's getting worse and worse, and he engages in all this happy talk. Bush has become more realistic. Certainly [Defense Secretary Robert M.] Gates is more realistic, so the happy talk from the Pentagon is over. Yet Cheney is still stuck in the mold."

The negotiations for the North Korea deal showed how much things have changed in Bush's second term. Three years ago, when Cheney's influence was at its peak, U.S. negotiators had rigid instructions to demand that Pyongyang dismantle its programs before receiving benefits, and had almost no authority to speak directly to North Korean officials.

This time, in meetings with Chinese and South Korean officials in Vietnam in November, Rice raised the idea of obtaining an "early harvest" -- a freeze on North Korea's main nuclear facility -- to start the process, administration officials said. She empowered her chief negotiator, Christopher R. Hill, to work out the details during a one-on-one meeting with the North Koreans in Berlin last month.

Under the deal, North Korea would receive an initial supply of fuel oil for the freeze. Pyongyang also promised to disable the facility and take further steps toward denuclearization in return for additional economic, energy and humanitarian assistance. The accord left for future negotiations the question of what to do with North Korea's existing nuclear weapons; Pyongyang declared itself a nuclear power in October after exploding a nuclear device. Many conservatives worry that the new arrangement could relieve North Korea of pressure from the United States without any guarantee it will eventually get rid of the weapons.

Lea Anne McBride, Cheney's spokeswoman, said he supports the plan and agrees with Bush that the North Koreans "have to prove themselves by following through on the deal."

DOJ_NMG_0133908

Sources who have spoken with administration officials said Cheney's staff is not happy with the agreement, and former administration officials said they have a hard time believing that Cheney does not share those sentiments. They pointed, for instance, to the agreement's language calling for new "working groups" to settle outstanding issues, something they said he has long opposed.

But some Cheney associates said they doubt he will work against the plan. "The one thing about Cheney is he has never done anything the boss didn't want him to do," said a longtime friend from previous administrations, who suggested that Cheney's acquiescence in the nuclear deal may have been a tactical concession, given the United States' eroding position in the world.

"I think he's someone who is very strategic in his thinking," said Aaron L. Friedberg, a Princeton University professor who served as an adviser to Cheney on national security from 2003 to 2005. "He's prepared to make adjustments and trade-offs as the situation warrants. . . . I suspect in a number of situations he would have preferred to push harder and take a tougher stand, but he has always been a pragmatist."

Cheney Due In Japan To Push NKorea Deal (AFP)

AFP, February 20, 2007

US Vice President Dick Cheney has headed to Asia with his first scheduled stop in Japan, a key US ally which has voiced increasing concern about the White House's approach on North Korea and Iraq.

Cheney will also travel to Australia and the US Pacific territory of Guam on a trip that comes on the heels of a breakthrough deal on North Korea and plans to deploy more than 20,000 extra US troops to insurgency-plagued Iraq.

The vice president will take pains to thank Japan and Australia for their help in Iraq and Afghanistan and may urge them to consider ways to beef up their presence in both war-torn countries, a senior US official said.

"We will talk about where there are places where we need to have more done, what other contributions we and other countries can make to the efforts of both those conflicts," the official told reporters on condition of anonymity.

In Tokyo, Cheney will aim to dispel any worries about the North Korean deal, emphasising that it is only a good "first step" towards stripping the regime of its nuclear weapons programmes, he said.

Japan has refused to fund the deal, under which North Korea would receive badly needed fuel aid, due to an emotionally charged row over Pyongyang's past abductions of Japanese citizens.

"I think it's reasonable to expect very serious discussions on North Korea and also some other issues that we are jointly faced with," a senior Japanese official who declined to be named said ahead of Cheney's visit.

On Wednesday, the US vice president will meet with top leaders including Prime Minister Shinzo Abe, and have an audience with Japan's emperor and empress.

Cheney will not, however, meet with Defense Minister Fumio Kyuma, who last month sharply criticized the decision to invade Iraq. A US official said Cheney's schedule was "locked in place" before Kyuma requested a meeting.

Officially pacifist Japan took the landmark step of sending troops to Iraq on a non-combat mission but former prime minister Junichiro Koizumi withdrew them before handing over power to Abe in September.

The Japanese official downplayed disagreements between the allies, saying Abe had "reiterated support for US policy and the determination of his government to carry out various measures of cooperation."

But a poll carried Tuesday by the Asahi Shimbun showed that 57 percent of Japanese shared Kyuma's view that President George W. Bush was wrong to invade Iraq.

An overwhelming 81 percent backed Abe in refusing to fund the North Korea deal, with only 11 percent expressing opposition, said the liberal newspaper's poll of 1,940 voters.

Cheney will meet Friday with Australian opposition leader Kevin Rudd -- at Rudd's request, the US official said. Rudd has said his Labor Party would not back any increase in the number of Australian troops in Iraq, even military trainers.

However, Prime Minister John Howard said Monday Australia might send up to 70 additional military instructors to Iraq and deploy more troops in Afghanistan.

Cheney will meet on Saturday with Howard, who has complained about US handling of the country's sole terror suspect jailed at Guantanamo Bay, David Hicks, the so-called "Australian Taliban."

Listen, Mr. Cheney (LAT)

WHEN Shinzo Abe meets Dick Cheney in Japan this week, a special kind of chemistry will be in effect. The hawkish Japanese prime minister and the bellicose U.S. vice president, self-described friends, have more in common than declining poll numbers. They both have war on their minds.

What we have on the one side is Abe, a historical revisionist, glorifying the losers of the last world war to reshape the past. On the other side you have Cheney, a hard-line unilateralist who has been one of the biggest planners and defenders of the American-led war in Iraq.

Cheney is visiting Japan this week, according to the White House, to thank officials there for "their efforts in Iraq and Afghanistan." Japan has sent noncombat troops to Iraq and has supplied logistical support in Afghanistan. But even as backing for the Iraq war continues to slip at home, Cheney will arrive in a Japan roiled by its own debate about rising militarism.

The latest example came when Japanese Defense Minister Fumio Kyuma suggested last month that the war in Iraq was a mistake. He was criticized roundly by Abe's people. Now, apparently as a punishment, the Bush administration asked Japan not to schedule a meeting between Cheney and Kyuma during this week's visit.

Thus, Cheney will snub the defense chief, the very person he would be expected to talk to in a visit focusing on defense and security issues. The message seems to be: Friends don't criticize friends. Japan, historically the bully of Asia, instinctively understands such threatening behavior.

There was no rational reason for Japan to get entangled in Iraq, and there's even less reason to become involved in Iran. However, Cheney appears bent on whipping up support for a reluctant Japan to continue to follow the Bush administration's lead in the war-torn Mideast. In refusing to meet with the defense minister, Cheney seems to be saying, in effect, that a silent nod to the wise is sufficient.

But the Japanese can say no, and why shouldn't they? What does the long-term Japan-U.S. relationship get out of this temporary subservience? Is it really in the interest of the Japanese people to bind their fate to the declining fortunes of the Bush-Cheney team?

Or might this be a good time, as opposition leader Ichiro Ozawa belatedly suggested a few weeks ago, to point out the obvious folly of U.S. ways, as a friend would, helping a friend?

Japan has yet to finish apologizing for the mess it made the last time it went to war, so why drag it into a new one?

The U.S. occupation of post-World War II Japan, with the attendant promulgation of a unique "peace constitution," was designed to make a former warrior nation allergic to war, and it largely succeeded. It is not only Japan's neighbors who get upset when Japanese pols visit the Yasukuni war shrine, which honors Japanese war criminals among the war dead; in fact, more than half of those polled in Japan are against such visits as well. From time to time, veteran U.S. voices, such as former Rep. Henry Hyde (R-Ill.), remind us that official visits to a shrine that makes a mockery of such events as Pearl Harbor and Nanjing do not serve U.S.-Japan interests either.

Likewise, Japan should listen carefully to what other American statesmen are saying about Tokyo's whitewash of critical history questions. A motion by Rep. Mike Honda (D-San Jose) calling for an apology on the oft-denied issue of Imperial Japan's "sex slaves" and other wartime injustices is not anti-Japan bullying but a nudge, from a friend to a friend, saying we need to agree on basic facts for the relationship to go forward.

The widespread Japanese commitment to peace, after the devastation of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, extends to an understandable abhorrence of nuclear weapons. Yet military analysts say that U.S. ships armed with nuclear weapons routinely pull into Japanese ports such as Yokosuka and Okinawa — making a sham of Japan's "three nonnuclear principles" (not possessing, producing or permitting nuclear weapons into the country).

Cheney is scheduled to have a photo-op aboard the U.S. aircraft carrier Kitty Hawk during his visit — an insensitive move that might well come to be regretted as a "mission accomplished" moment for the vice president. Tokyo's flamboyant mayor, Shintaro Ishihara, has already primed the public by asserting — without apparent evidence — that the Kitty Hawk is nuclear-equipped.

Instead of posing on the carrier, Cheney should take the time to hear what Kyuma and other Japanese critics of the Iraq war have to say.

South Korean, US Officials To Meet On North Korea Nuke Accord (AFP)

AFP, February 20, 2007

South Korea's deputy foreign minister has headed to Washington for talks with US officials on ways to follow up on last week's deal on scrapping North Korea's nuclear programme, his ministry said.

Shim Yoon-Joe was to hold talks with US Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns during his visit from Tuesday to Saturday, the ministry said.

DOJ_NMG_0133910

He would also meet other officials including John C. Rood, assistant secretary of state for international security and nonproliferation, and Jack D. Crouch II, deputy national security advisor.

At six-nation talks in Beijing last week, North Korea agreed to start disabling its nuclear facilities in exchange for badly-needed energy aid.

As a first step it will shut down and seal its Yongbyon reactor within 60 days, admit UN nuclear inspectors and receive 50,000 tons of heavy fuel oil or equivalent assistance in return.

Further steps to disable nuclear facilities would be rewarded with up to 950,000 tons of heavy oil or other aid.

Critics say the deal does not address the North's existing weapons or plutonium stockpile, or its suspected uranium-based weapons research programme. Supporters call it a good start.

The agreement is "the first step in a long series that includes the complete renunciation of nuclear weaponry and facilities within North Korea," White House spokesman Tony Snow said Sunday.

"If they are going to get the benefits down the road including ultimately as much as a million tons of heavy oil, they've got to perform."

Seoul officials point out that the North must eventually submit a list of its nuclear facilities and programmes, including any uranium-based one.

Shim's US trip precedes a planned visit by South Korea's Foreign Minister Song Min-Soon early next month, Yonhap news agency said.

The Plan That Moved Pyongyang (WP)

By Philip Zelikow

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

In 2006, the headlines from North Korea were depressing. Pyongyang was headed down the path of escalation: missile tests in July, testing a nuclear weapon in October. Now, 2007 has opened with encouraging news -- a breakthrough in Beijing. In effect, the agreement announced last week was answering the bomb test with a successful test of diplomacy. But this deal makes more sense if we understand the broader strategy, set in motion some time ago, that is starting to play out.

In 2005, the United States energized its flagging North Korea efforts on two tracks. One was diplomatic, the other defensive. The diplomatic strategy was never just about North Korea. The Korean Peninsula has repeatedly been a battleground for the great powers in Northeast Asia. The United States, particularly Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her deputy, Robert Zoellick, saw a way to break this mold: China, Japan and Russia were flexing new diplomatic muscle. The North Korean problem could be an opportunity to unite potential rivals in common effort, an enterprise without precedent in Northeast Asia.

The defensive approach responded to North Korea's outlaw strategy for economic survival. Protecting the integrity of the international financial system was just one of the ways to show the North's leaders that trafficking in contraband was not a sustainable solution to their problems.

By late 2005, both policies had been set in motion. In September, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill and his counterparts from South Korea, North Korea, China, Japan and Russia had negotiated a joint framework for comprehensive diplomatic action. Meanwhile, enforcement actions that had been pending against North Korea's partners in money laundering, such as Macau's Banco Delta Asia, were rolled out.

Then the Bush administration paused. It had been preparing to follow up with new diplomatic initiatives, but the administration was uncertain and divided about how much further to go until North Korea moved. As for the North Koreans, they were indeed hit hard as members of the international financial community became increasingly reluctant to handle their suspect transactions. Furious, they boycotted the six-party talks and tried to advertise their own strength, a course that culminated in the nuclear test last October.

After that test, Rice leaned hard on the regional diplomatic relationships she had nurtured. First -- and fast -- came U.N. Security Council Resolution 1718, the most potent action against North Korea that the United Nations had taken since 1953, when the Korean War was suspended.

Having shown the North that it had underestimated regional solidarity, the United States next moved to change the dynamic, to break the cycle of escalation. That month, Chinese President Hu Jintao and President Bush came to a strategic understanding about North Korea. They agreed that diplomacy needed to be given another chance. But the diplomacy couldn't just be a gloss, busywork that only gave the appearance of action.

To turn this strategic understanding into policy, Rice developed a two-stage strategy. First the six parties would move quickly to offset the nuclear test with unprecedented commitments from the North Koreans to stop and reverse their nuclear development and to bring back the system of monitoring by the International Atomic Energy Agency. Some called this an "early harvest" -- testing whether the ground could yield anything fruitful.

If it did, then in the second stage the six parties would follow up. But rather than returning to the old, painful pattern of piecemeal nuclear bribery, the diplomacy would have to move simultaneously on multiple fronts: scrapping the nuclear program, building normal economic cooperation, tackling the normalization of relations and -- perhaps most engaging -- getting at the unresolved issues of the Korean War.

Thus, later in October, Rice shuttled across Northeast Asia to reassure allies and win support for this diplomatic design, especially in Beijing.

Pressure had its place. So did diplomatic ingenuity. One Chinese official said to Rice, "It is better to play with two hands." And talking with the North Koreans would not be a problem, Rice concluded, if doing so did not undermine the vital regional foundation and if the North Koreans actually had something to say.

Last week's deal, skillfully negotiated by Rice and Hill with their counterparts, delivers a plan for the "early harvest." A "good, initial step" was Rice's careful phrase. The broader context in which the agreement was reached helps explain what she meant. The United States and its negotiating partners have successfully carried out a diplomatic test.

The next two months will show whether the design remains valid. Rice has agreed to a six-party meeting of foreign ministers, including the North Koreans. We will see whether the Bush administration and its counterparts can launch the second stage, when the desired outcomes to be produced from this diplomacy may finally come into view.

Head Of UN Nuclear Agency Gloomy On Iran Breakthrough (FT)

By Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, February 20, 2007

Mohamed ElBaradei has not given up hope that the US and Iran will one day sit down and negotiate their -differences away, but in the much shorter term his prognosis is bleak.

Tomorrow, in his capacity as director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, the United Nations' nuclear watchdog, Mr ElBaradei is due to certify that Iran has failed to comply with UN demands to halt sensitive parts of its nuclear programme.

"I will continue to make a last-ditch effort to try to convince them that it is in their interest to find a way to go into negotiations," he told the Financial Times in an interview in London. "If that doesn't happen, and I don't see that it is going to happen overnight, I will have to report negatively."

He adds, however, that there will still be scope for a diplomatic breakthrough until the week of March 5, when the IAEA board meets and the issue is taken out of his hands.

Mr ElBaradei makes little attempt to disguise his lack of enthusiasm for the US's drive to impose more sanctions on Tehran and push the Islamic republic into suspending activity related to uranium enrichment, which can produce both nuclear fuel and weapons grade material.

In December the UN Security Council agreed sanctions on the transfer of -missile and nuclear technology to Iran, and the issue is set to return to New York after Mr ElBaradei's report tomorrow.

"Our experience without exception is that sanctions alone do not work and in most cases radicalise the regime and hurt the people who are not supposed to be hurt," he says. "If you create an environment in which Iran feels isolated, in which Iran is subject to further sanctions, then some of these worst case scenarios could take place, because then you would put the hardliners in the driver's seat."

In his eyes, the suspension of Iran's current "research and development" enrichment activities is no longer the real issue.

Far more important for him is ensuring that Tehran does not install an industrial scale capacity of 3,000 centrifuges - enough to begin producing fissile material for a bomb - within months, further limit the work of UN inspectors, or leave the Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty.

As for the perpetual rumbles that Washington or Israel might yet contemplate the use of force, "even if [the Iranians] were not going to develop a nuclear weapon today, this would be a sure recipe for them to go down that route . . . Go for the military option and then either you'll have a repeat of North Korea [which has developed nuclear weapons] or you have a repeat of Iraq, and these are not our greatest achievements as civilised human beings."

Instead, Mr ElBaradei has been championing the idea of a "time-out" in which both Iran's nuclear programme and the sanctions targeted against it would be put on ice.

He acknowledges that the idea would allow the two sides to act simultaneously, rather than demanding that Tehran must halt enrichment as a precondition for any further steps.

"It's just a question of how to get both sides to the negotiating table while saving face," he says.

Russia expects delay to Tehran reactor

By Neil Buckley in Moscow and Gareth Smyth in Tehran

Russia warned yesterday that the launch of the Iranian nuclear reactor at Bushehr could be delayed because Tehran had fallen behind with payments and because of problems with sourcing some equipment from third countries.

Officials from Russia's atomic energy agency and from Atomstroiexport, the Russian contractor building the station, said Tehran had not made payments for more than a month, after insisting on paying in euros instead of dollars.

Tehran has been shifting transactions to euros, but has also admitted difficulties in raising finance due to western banks and financiers reducing involvement after US pressure.

Bushehr was excluded, at Russian insistence, from December's UN Security Council resolution giving Iran a 60-day deadline, expiring tomorrow, to end its nuclear activities.

A Twofold Approach To Tehran (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon And Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

As Iran's power in the Middle East grows, the Bush administration is pursuing a two-pronged strategy of directly challenging Tehran in places such as Iraq and Lebanon, while seeking to exploit fissures believed to be emerging in Iran's social and political systems.

The strategy includes military movements to underscore American resolve as well as financial pressure to drive a wedge between Iran's leaders and the country's merchants. Friday, the Treasury Department announced sanctions on three Iranian energy companies.

U.S. officials say the strategy isn't designed to court a war. Still, it is fraught with risks. Iran could misread or overreact to some American moves; strategists at the Pentagon say U.S. attempts to target Iranian agents operating inside Iraq could stoke a larger response from Tehran's paramilitary forces, such as the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps.

There are signs this escalating pressure is having some effect on Iran and opening opportunities for advancement in U.S. foreign policy, whether containing Iran's nuclear ambitions or underpinning a democratically elected government in Lebanon. But rather than seeking a quick fix to the contest against Iran, Bush administration officials say they are bracing for a long struggle to curb Tehran's influence in the region.

"We are convinced that sooner or later the costs will be so high that they [the Iranians] will have to come to the negotiating table," said Nicholas Burns, the State Department's point man on Iran. "I don't believe a conflict with Iran is inevitable. ... We've got time."

U.S. efforts to confront Iran are driven by decade-old fears that the Islamic republic will seek to export its anti-American, revolutionary doctrine across the Middle East. Iran's growing influence in the region also could further embolden Islamist militias like Hezbollah and Hamas fighting Israel and imperil U.S. access to Mideast energy reserves.

Many Middle East analysts are skeptical about the Bush administration's ability to induce political change in Iran. Siding with Saddam Hussein in the 1980-88 Iran-Iraq War, Washington further radicalized Iranian society while strengthening Iraq's despot. Attempts by the Reagan and Clinton administrations to reach out to relative moderates in Iran resulted in diplomatic frustrations and political embarrassments.

U.S. officials mapping the emerging strategy toward Iran have depicted a security posture that, in many ways, echoes the containment Washington employed against the Soviet Union during the Cold War. This entails confronting pro-Iranian groups wherever they operate in the world, while using economic and military tools to undermine the government in Tehran.

The administration has sought to stoke internal opposition to President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad by increasingly choking off his country's ties to the global economy. White House officials say Tehran's business and clerical elite are increasingly at odds with the Iranian president's confrontational stance toward the international community on issues like Iran's nuclear program and Israel's right to exist, and they fear his stance could isolate them internationally.

The Treasury is moving to exert more pressure on Tehran by imposing financial sanctions on three Iranian companies allegedly involved in supporting Tehran's nuclear program. The policy prohibits U.S. companies from doing business with the three firms, which are all owned by the Atomic Energy Organization of Iran, and freezes any assets they may have in the U.S.

U.S. officials say these measures underpin a wider push by the international community to impose financial penalties, through the United Nations, on Iranian companies and individuals believed to be aiding Tehran's alleged pursuit of nuclear weapons.

Jitters in Iran's financial markets and the poor showing of candidates associated with Mr. Ahmadinejad in recent Iranian elections are fueling optimism within the Bush administration that such measures are starting to have an impact. U.S. officials also point to recent editorials in Iranian state-owned newspapers criticizing many of the Iranian president's policies.

"This is not a monolithic government" in Iran, Mr. Burns said last week in a speech at the Brookings Institution, a Washington think tank. Disaffected ethnic groups are stoking opposition to the government. Last week, an ethnic Baluchi separatist group claimed responsibility for bombing a bus carrying Revolutionary Guard cadres in the eastern province of Sistan-Baluchistan. Tehran had originally blamed the attack on the U.S. While Washington has denied involvement, some U.S. officials say, the U.S. should exploit Iran's ethnic fissures to restrain Tehran. Ethnic Kurd, Turk and Arab minorities have historically opposed Iran's largely Persian central government.

The largest potential flashpoint between Iran and the U.S. remains Iraq. President Bush pledged to increase efforts to choke off what he says is Iran's funneling of munitions and arms to Shiite militias there. Critics say the White House is overstating Iran's involvement in Iraq's discord, potentially to blame Tehran for some U.S. setbacks. Senior Bush administration officials say drawing redlines in Iraq is crucial to blunting Tehran's ambitions throughout the region.

Elsewhere in the Middle East, the U.S. and its allies have intensified proxy battles against Iran in recent weeks. In Lebanon, the U.S. and Saudi Arabia have increased economic and military aid to the government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora to ward off efforts by Hezbollah -- Lebanon's radical Shiite group, which is backed by Iran -- to grab more power. The Bush administration has also increased aid to the Palestinian Authority and its leader, Mahmoud Abbas, in a bid to blunt the power of Iranian-funded Hamas.

Critics of the Bush administration's Iran strategy say successes may prove short-lived. U.S. efforts to arrest or kill Iranian agents in Iraq could fuel a backlash by Iranian-backed Shiite groups in Iraq and other countries and potentially spark a wider Middle East war, they say.

Pushing for the removal of Mr. Ahmadinejad, the Iranian president, meanwhile, is unlikely to significantly moderate Iran's positions, many Iran experts say. For one, the president's popularity could rise if Washington is seen as overtly trying to topple him. Many other Iranian officials have voiced a commitment to maintaining Iran's nuclear program, and Iran's broader society is seen to be behind it.

Iran Launches Large-scale War Games (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini

AP, February 20, 2007

Iran began its largest war games in almost a year Monday, just two days ahead of a U.N. Security Council deadline for Iran to halt uranium enrichment or face further economic sanctions.

The elite Revolutionary Guards began three days of ground maneuvers, state-run media reported Monday.

State television said the exercise is the biggest since last March and is taking place in 16 of Iran's 30 provinces. The broadcast said an estimated 60,000 troops are participating in the maneuvers.

"All weapons possessed by the Guards' ground force ... including new weapons, will be tested during the war games," Gen. Mohammad Reza Zahedi, commander of the Guards' ground force, was quoted by the official Islamic Republic News Agency as saying Monday.

The Revolutionary Guards is an elite military corps with more than 200,000 members and its own naval and air forces. It is independent of the regular armed forces and controlled directly by the supreme leader. It oversees vital interests such as oil and natural gas installations and the nation's missile arsenal.

In January, the Guards held three days of war games.

The Security Council approved a resolution against Iran on Dec. 23 that imposed economic sanctions and gave Iran 60 days to halt uranium enrichment, otherwise it will consider additional measures.

As tensions mount over Iran's nuclear standoff with the West, the United States and Iran have pursued an escalating series of military moves, with Washington sending more aircraft carrier battle groups to the region and Iran responding with more frequent maneuvers.

The United States and several of its Western allies believe that Iran is using its nuclear program to produce an atomic weapon — charges Iran denies, saying its aim is to generate electricity.

Iran has said it will never give up its right under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty to enrich uranium and produce nuclear fuel. Enriched to a low level, uranium is used to produce nuclear fuel but further enrichment makes it suitable for use in building an atomic bomb.

Russia Will Slow Work On Iran's Nuclear Plant (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0133914

By Andrew E. Kramer

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

MOSCOW, Feb. 19 — Russia said Monday that it would slow work on Iran's nearly completed Bushehr nuclear power plant.

Russia contended that Iran had not made the last two $25 million monthly payments, in a dispute about whether it could pay in euros instead of dollars.

The move added a new twist to the deeply contentious project to build a Russian-designed light-water reactor in Iran, a decade-old deal that is a factor in the United States' concerns over Iran's nuclear ambitions.

The dispute, which became public on Monday, will delay, perhaps by a year, any delivery of nuclear fuel to Iran, Russian officials and experts said. Low-enriched uranium fuel was scheduled to be shipped next month.

"The accounts are not being paid," said Ivan A. Dybov, spokesman for Rosatom, the Russian nuclear agency. What is at issue, he said, is a request made last month by an Iranian bank to settle accounts in euros rather than dollars. The Iranian government has a stated policy of settling contracts and holding reserves in currencies other than the dollar.

As part of its effort to halt Iran's nuclear program, the United States has encouraged European banks to freeze Iranian dollar-denominated accounts.

An Iranian official denied that the country had been late in making payments. "We have made all the payments so far based on the contract and the agreed installments," said Muhammad Saeedi, the deputy director of the Atomic Energy Organization, the official IRNA news agency reported.

"We will try to come up with a solution for the financial problem of the Russian contractor, which is their problem, not the problem of the Iranian side, in the next few days," he added.

A former Iranian president, Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, said, "World powers are trying to dominate international organizations and deny Iran's right, but we expect our friends to stop such moves," IRNA reported.

A United Nations ultimatum to Iran to halt uranium enrichment expires on Wednesday. But the commercial arm-twisting was also in keeping with the Kremlin's policy lately of pumping up the bottom line across a spectrum of state businesses, from oil and gas to nuclear power.

Analysts say rising prices for steel and heavy machinery have probably made the Bushehr project unprofitable.

Russia refused payment in euros without opening the contract to renegotiation, Mr. Dybov said. The Iranians settled less than 25 percent of the bill in January and missed February's payment entirely, he said. "We aren't turning down the euros" on principle, Mr. Dybov said, but he added that any change must be incorporated in a contract amendment. The payment conditions and the exact amount of the shortfall are commercial secrets, he said.

Russian officials also cited as a cause of the delay a holdup in the delivery of safety equipment for the reactor from an unspecified third country. The plant was scheduled to begin operations in September.

Now, they probably will not begin before mid-2008, said Andrei Cherkasenko, a board member of the Russian state nuclear power company Atompromresursy, the Russian press agency Interfax reported.

The conflict was not the first dispute between the countries over the plant. "From time to time, the Russians get fed up with the Iranians" and work slows, Rose Gottemoeller, the director of the Carnegie Moscow Center, said in a telephone interview. "The Russians have been very canny in using the Bushehr project to back up their diplomacy" by modulating the construction schedule, she said.

Iran Cash Lapse Puts Nuke Plan In Peril (WT/AP)

By Vladimir Isachenkov

The Washington Times, February 20, 2007

MOSCOW -- The opening of a Russian-built nuclear power plant in Iran could be delayed because Iran has fallen behind in payments, Russian officials said yesterday.

A top Iranian nuclear official swiftly denied that payments had been disrupted, in the latest dispute surrounding the deal at the heart of the two countries' nuclear cooperation.

Under an agreement reached last year, Russia was to ship nuclear fuel to Bushehr -- Iran's first nuclear plant -- by next month and open the facility in September, with electricity generation to start by November.

Iran agreed in a separate deal to return to Russia all spent fuel from the plant in southern Iran for reprocessing. The move was intended to assuage global concerns that the fuel could be diverted to make nuclear weapons.

Iran broke the schedule of payments this year under the $1 billion contract, said a Russian official who asked not be named because he was not authorized to speak to the press.

He said the Iranians blamed the delay on the need to switch payments from dollars to euros.

DOJ_NMG_0133915

"The launch schedule definitely could be affected," said Sergei Novikov, a spokesman for Russia's nuclear power agency.

Mohammad Saeedi, the deputy head of the Atomic Energy Organization of Iran, denied that Tehran had been late in making payments.

"Iran has had no delay whatsoever in making payments for the Bushehr nuclear power plant," Mr. Saeedi was quoted as saying by the Islamic Republic News Agency.

The dispute erupted during persistent diplomatic efforts to persuade Iran to halt uranium enrichment in order to allay international fears that it could be seeking nuclear weapons.

Although a delay in opening Bushehr is likely to anger Iran, Russia gave no indication that it was maneuvering to scrap the deal, which has provoked Western criticism.

Russia emphasizes that Iran has the right to a peaceful nuclear energy program, and President Vladimir Putin and other officials have said that the Bushehr contract would be honored.

Mr. Putin's increasingly defiant posture toward the United States makes it unlikely that the Kremlin would opt out of the agreement.

"Russia remains firmly committed to the Bushehr deal, and Putin's recent statements make a change in attitude highly improbable," said Yevgeny Volk, head of the Heritage Foundation's Moscow office.

In December, Russia supported a U.N. Security Council resolution imposing limited sanctions against Iran over its refusal to stop uranium enrichment, but only after a proposal imposing restrictions on the Bushehr plant was dropped.

The United States and some allies say Iran's nuclear program is aimed at developing nuclear weapons. Iran maintains it is intended only to generate electricity.

Word of the Bushehr delay surfaced as Iran hurriedly arranged talks today with the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) just ahead of the U.N. nuclear watchdog's report that could expose Tehran to even broader sanctions over its disputed nuclear program.

Iran's top security official, Ali Larijani, will meet with IAEA director Mohamed ElBaradei, who in a report to the Security Council later this week is expected to confirm that Tehran has defied a 60-day council deadline to stop enriching uranium.

Separately, Mr. ElBaradei said in a published interview Iran would be able to install 3,000 centrifuges as the basis for "industrial-scale" enrichment in six to 12 months.

Gholamreza Aghazadeh, who heads Iran's nuclear programs, is pushing for an even earlier completion date, according to a report by diplomats who visited Iran two weeks ago.

Mr. ElBaradei told the London-based Financial Times newspaper that it was too late for the world to deny Iran enrichment know-how, meaning that only diplomatic compromise, not sanctions, could resolve the crisis.

Soaring Energy Use Puts Oil Squeeze On Iran (WSJ)

By Bill Spindle

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

AHVAZ, Iran -- Iran sits on one-tenth of the world's known oil supplies but is using so much energy these days it may start rationing gasoline as soon as next month.

Part of the reason lies with people such as 42-year-old Seyd Jessem Moosavi. No one in Mr. Moosavi's family had an automobile when he was growing up. He was the first to buy one, followed quickly by his father. Now all five of his brothers have cars, and Mr. Moosavi just bought one for his 25-year-old son.

He also recently opened a car wash, where he stood on a recent afternoon in this southern Iranian city directing customers from the busy street to his corps of young scrubbers. "With no car wash in the neighborhood and more and more cars, I thought this would be good," he said.

Mr. Moosavi's booming new business underscores one of the biggest challenges facing Iran today. As the country has grown wealthier selling oil and gas, Iranians have themselves become large consumers of energy. Government subsidies, which make energy nearly free to consumers and businesses, stoke the demand further.

At the same time, a combination of Western sanctions and Iranian policies has discouraged foreign investment in oil fields, causing production to stagnate. The result: Iran's oil exports could dry up in as little as a decade, according to some who have studied the situation.

That's a looming disaster for Iran, which derives about 85% of its export income from the sale of oil. "The industry is in a crisis," says Mehdi Varzi, a former Iranian diplomat and national oil company official who heads a London-based consulting company, Varzi Energy.

The impact would be felt far beyond Iran. The country produced 3.8 million barrels of oil a day in 2006, almost 5% of the world's total supply, according to the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries. It exported an average of about 2.5 million barrels of that each day. Should those sales decline, Iran's largest customers, Japan and China, would scramble for other supplies, pushing up prices for everyone.

Avoiding an export squeeze is one reason Iran argues it needs to consider nuclear energy. But that ambition has contributed to a diplomatic impasse with the West. Bush administration officials describe Iran's nuclear program as little more than a ruse to conceal what they say is a hidden effort to build nuclear weapons. Iranian officials deny that, arguing that nuclear plants could handle some of the soaring domestic energy demand, leaving more oil and gas to export and avoiding difficult domestic choices.

Indeed, several other Middle East countries -- including Egypt and the world's largest oil exporter, Saudi Arabia -- also are investigating nuclear energy programs, citing similar reasons.

More Vulnerable

Iran's energy woes could make it more vulnerable to international economic sanctions, say officials from the U.S. and other countries who favor strengthening the set of punishments the United Nations Security Council has placed on the country. Even many Iranian officials concede that the longstanding ban the U.S. has placed on American oil companies working in Iran has hampered the country's ability to develop its oil fields adequately.

Others, however, suggest that sanctions can also make it easier for the Iranian regime to blame outsiders for the disruptions that solving the problem could entail.

Once seen as little more than a giant petrol station to the world, Middle Eastern oil suppliers are now becoming some of the largest consumers of energy anywhere. They are attempting to diversify their economies, often by encouraging energy-thirsty industries such as refineries and processing of metals like aluminum. Meanwhile, record numbers of young people are growing up and establishing households. Already, the Middle East and North Africa's population of some 300 million consumes almost as much oil as 1.2 billion Chinese.

Iran, where a huge population bulge is reaching adulthood, is confronting the export crunch earlier and more acutely than others. Iran already consumes more oil than all but 15 other countries on earth, according to the International Energy Agency, which monitors the world energy market. In 1995, Iranians used the equivalent of 34% of the oil they pumped from the ground, exporting the rest. Last year they used 40%. In Iran's natural-gas industry, the pinch has already begun. Although Iran has 15% of the world's gas reserves, the country imported more than it exported in 2005. In January, Iran briefly cut off gas exports to Turkey as the Iranian government struggled with a surge in domestic use during a stretch of cold weather.

Iran's leaders are keenly aware of these problems. But in recent years, they've avoided making difficult choices as global oil prices climbed. Export revenues rose even as the amount of oil exported has remained steady or even fallen.

Nonetheless, the situation is already wreaking havoc with the government's budget. Iran subsidizes most energy, including gasoline, diesel and many other refined products. Consumers and businesses alike benefit. Overall, energy subsidies cost the government as much as $40 billion, equivalent to almost a quarter of the country's entire economic output, according to Bijan Zanganeh, a former Iranian oil minister. That spending is fanning inflation in the broader economy. "It's unacceptable and it can't continue," he says.

Yet in Ahvaz, it's clear that pushing oil and gas production higher and demand lower won't be easy. Khuzestan province, the center of the country's energy industry, already generates 17% of Iran's electricity. But that's not enough to keep electricity flowing here in the provincial capital all the time.

Residents of the city, whose population has grown by one-third in the past decade to 1.3 million, are packing more people into the warrens of apartment blocks within the older city center. And they're also moving into new housing sprouting up all around the fringes of the city.

Meanwhile, inexpensive consumer appliances have flooded the country in recent years from low-cost manufacturing bases like China and Turkey. Even young couples of modest means can now afford new refrigerators, air conditioners, and microwave ovens. Better-off ones buy the luxury items -- blenders, juicers, egg cookers and coffee makers -- that fill an ever-widening number of shops in the heart of the city's traditional bazaar.

The appliance section alone now takes up two city blocks, side-by-side with vendors displaying barrels of pistachios and dates and clothing. "Financially, I'm able to afford it now," says Vahid Javadi, a 33-year-old schoolteacher, shopping in the bazaar for a washing machine with his wife.

Ibrahim Marwani, a 40-year-old electrician, spends most of his workdays trying to upgrade rickety old electrical wiring for customers. "These days, they want to overhaul everything," he says. He had to redo the wiring in his own house, he says, to keep up with the growing need for power as he's purchased two refrigerators, two televisions, a stereo, DVD player and two air conditioners that "run around-the-clock" during summer days when temperatures regularly reach 110 degrees.

Some of the Middle East's first oil came from wells not far from Ahvaz, starting in 1908 when Persia's British overseers began drilling operations in the nearby desert. Ever since, Khuzestan Province has been the center of Iran's ascent to the ranks of the world's top oil producers.

Under the regime of the last Shah, Mohammad Reza Pahlavi, Iranian oil production reached 6.6 million barrels per day in 1974, five years before the revolution ushered in Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini and the Islamic Republic that rules the country today. Oil production crashed as the turmoil of the revolution segued into an eight-year war with next-door-neighbor Iraq. Oil fields and refineries were bombed and crucial maintenance ignored. By the early 1980s, only about 1.3 million barrels per day were being pumped from the ground.

Ahvaz and the nearby port and refining centers of Abadan and Khorramshar were especially hard hit. Saddam Hussein's Iraqi forces invaded Khorramshar, and shelled Ahvaz and Abadan. Many residents fled. When the war ended in 1988, the cities were key to an intense program, pushed along by national desperation, to get the country's oil industry back on its feet.

In Abadan, one of the country's largest refineries, largely destroyed by Iraqi shelling, was slowly brought back into operation. It still only processes about half the 630,000 barrels a day of crude it did at its prerevolutionary peak. But residents of the city still point to that comeback with pride, since it was accomplished with very little foreign capital or expertise. Oil production also climbed back to close to 4 million barrels a day in the late 1990s.

Those comebacks, which were achieved with little outside assistance, helped the clerical government in Tehran consolidate its power. But many of Iran's producing oil fields are now old and overall could be losing production of as much as 500,000 barrels a day each year. That shortfall has to be made up with new production or the country's overall oil output will fall.

Yet to keep up exports, Iran will also have to keep ahead of Iranians' own thirst for gas and oil, which is growing at a double-digit pace. So far, it is losing the race.

Much of the problem is waste. A recent study by a parliamentary committee said that 18.5% of the country's electricity is lost before it even reaches consumers, due to rickety infrastructure, corruption and mismanagement.

Bigger Problem

But an even bigger problem is the consumers themselves. That's because subsidies make energy practically free in Iran, discouraging any serious energy conservation. Gasoline, for example, costs about 40 cents a gallon at the pump. That's encouraged an explosion of use, as Iranians add new cars while continuing to use fuel-guzzling old models. It has also encouraged a brisk smuggling trade as Iranians buy millions of gallons of fuel at the subsidized price and truck them into neighboring Pakistan, Turkey, Afghanistan and Iraq for sale at market rates.

Demand has now far outstripped the country's refinery capacity. The government has shelled out at least $7 billion on gasoline imports alone so far this fiscal year, which ends in March. Much of that money was drawn from the country's rainy-day oil surplus fund, which is supposed to be used only on capital projects or during periods when global oil prices are low.

Next year, if nothing is done to change the situation, the bill could top $9 billion, government officials have warned. So plans to begin rationing fuel are being drawn up. But the government nixed a similar initiative last year for fear of a political backlash. This time, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad says the government is serious about cutting back consumption, though he acknowledged recently it's politically impossible to get rid of subsidies and raise pump prices the 40% to 50% that would require anytime soon.

In Ahvaz, gasoline quotas aren't likely to win the government many fans. "I'm concerned," says 29-year-old taxi driver Farzad Mesbinia, adding that he heard that if rations are imposed he would be limited to 5.8 gallons of subsidized gasoline a day. "With that, I can't get by," he says as he inches his cab forward in two long queues at a busy gas station here.

Massive Plan

To alleviate these problems, and the looming export squeeze, the government has also embarked on a massive plan to try to boost oil and gas production. But there are problems with both initiatives. The Azadegan oil field, located about an hour's drive west of Ahvaz near the border with Iraq, underscores some of them.

The field, discovered in late 1990s, is among the largest deposits in the world. It holds about 26 billion barrels oil and could one day produce as much as 260,000 barrels a day, Iranian officials estimate. It's the kind of field U.S. oil majors would be keen to help develop, were it not for U.S. government sanctions on Iran preventing them from participating. In 2004, Iran signed a deal to allow a Japanese company, Inpex, to take a 75% stake in the field and develop it. But for years, the project remained stalled by the need to remove land mines left from the war. The U.S. also urged Japan behind the scenes to scale back its involvement in the project, as Iran's confrontation with the international community over its nuclear program has escalated.

After years of dispute between the Iranians and Japanese over why the project wasn't proceeding, Inpex's 75% stake was cut to 10% last year. Management of the project was handed over to an Iranian company. The upshot: Little progress has been made in getting the oil out of the ground -- and without significant new foreign participation that's unlikely to change, according to many observers inside and outside Iran's oil industry. Overall, industry officials estimate between $100 billion and $120 billion is needed to get Iran's oil production back on track.

Adding refinery capacity in hopes of cutting fuel imports has proved an equally tough slog, although the Iranian government has now allotted $16 billion to the task of building three new refineries and boosting the capacity of the existing ones, including the one in Abadan.

In addition to that, the government has taken the unprecedented step of allowing some private entrepreneurs to step into the energy game. Jamal Hayat is hoping to take advantage of that opening.

Born in Ahvaz, Mr. Hayat moved with his parents to Tehran as a youth. He calls Khuzestan Province "the ideal place" for a $50 billion refinery and electrical power plant he and his brother, who was born in Abadan, are trying to build between the two cities of their births. "This is the province of black gold," says Mr. Hayat.

Five years after the brothers approached Tehran officials for permission to build the refinery, however, the planned site for the plant remains a fallow field in the desert. The Hayat brothers now hope to complete construction in a year.

Europe And The Mullahs (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 20, 2007

On the record, Europe claims to be as concerned as America about a nuclear-armed Iran. The record also shows, however, that Europe's biggest countries do a booming business with the Islamic Republic. And so far for the Continentals, manna trumps security.

The European Union -- led by Germany, France and Italy -- has long been Iran's largest trading partner. Its share of Iran's total imports is about 35%. Even more notable: Its trade with Tehran has expanded since Iran's secret nuclear program was exposed. Between 2003 and 2005, Europe's exports rose 29% to €12.9 billion; machinery, transport equipment and chemicals make up the bulk of the sales. Imports from Iran, predominantly oil, increased 62% to €11.4 billion in that period.

In the absence of an official embargo against Tehran, private EU companies have sought commercial opportunities in Iran. But the real story here is that these businesses are subsidized by European taxpayers. Government-backed export guarantees have fueled the expansion in trade. That, in turn, has boosted Iran's economy and -- indirectly by filling government coffers with revenues -- its nuclear program. The German record stands out. In its 2004 annual report on export guarantees, Berlin's Economics Ministry dedicated a special section to Iran that captures its giddy excitement about business with Tehran.

"Federal Government export credit guarantees played a crucial role for German exports to Iran; the volume of coverage of Iranian buyers rose by a factor of almost 3.5 to some €2.3 billion compared to the previous year," the report said. "The Federal Government thus insured something like 65% of total German exports to the country. Iran lies second in the league of countries with the highest coverage in 2004, hot on the heels of China."

Iran tops Germany's list of countries with the largest outstanding export guarantees, totaling €5.5 billion. France's export guarantees to Iran amount to about €1 billion. Italy's come to €4.5 billion, accounting for 20% of Rome's overall guarantee portfolio. Little Austria had, at the end of 2005, €800 million of its exports to Iran covered by guarantees.

The Europeans aren't simply facilitating business between private companies. The vast majority of Iranian industry is state-controlled, while even private companies have been known to act as fronts for the country's nuclear program. EU taxpayers underwrite trade and investment that would otherwise be deterred by the risks of doing business with a rogue regime.

It's also hard not to see a connection between Europe's commercial interests and its lenient diplomacy. The U.N.'s December sanctions resolution orders countries to freeze the assets of only 10 specific companies and 12 individuals with ties to Iran's nuclear program. Europe's governments continue to resist U.S. calls for financial sanctions, and the German Chamber of Commerce recently estimated that tougher economic sanctions would cost 10,000 German jobs.

As if on cue, Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier last week detected in Tehran a "new ambition" to resume talks. The last time the Europeans promoted such diplomatic negotiations, Iran won two more years to get closer to its goal of becoming a nuclear power. In 2004, according to the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung daily, then-Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer told Iranians to consider Europe a "protective shield" against U.S. pressure. The EU continues to provide a shield for its business interests in Iran, and thus a lifeline to a regime that is unpopular at home and sponsors terror abroad.

Mideast Talks Conclude With Little Result (NYT)

By Helene Cooper And Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 19 — An American-sponsored meeting between Israeli and Palestinian leaders meant to start a new peace initiative after six years ended Monday with little more concrete than a promise to meet again.

DOJ_NMG_0133919

For most of its period in office, the Bush administration has kept a hands-off stance in Arab-Israeli peace negotiations, but the meeting was evidence of a new commitment by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to try to improve a deteriorating situation.

Ms. Rice and her aides made it clear that her efforts had been complicated by the recent decision in principle of the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, to bring his Fatah faction into a unity government with Hamas, which Israel, the United States and the European Union consider a terrorist organization.

She suggested that if this meeting had not been scheduled beforehand, the Israeli prime minister, Ehud Olmert, might not have agreed to meet with Mr. Abbas, whom she praised nevertheless for supporting international and Israeli demands that the Palestinians recognize Israel's right to exist, forswear violence and accept previously negotiated agreements with the Israelis.

Although Hamas has not agreed to any of those requirements, a new unity government may come closer to meeting them than the Hamas movement itself. But Ms. Rice said she doubted that such a government would come close enough to satisfy the Americans and the Israelis.

The joint statement read by Ms. Rice after two hours of talks on Monday with Mr. Olmert and Mr. Abbas was vague. The two men "discussed their views of the diplomatic and political horizon," the statement said, and agreed to meet again "soon."

Neither Mr. Olmert nor Mr. Abbas appeared by Ms. Rice's side as she read the statement, reflecting the tenuous nature of the talks, which appear to be so fragile that no side has even been willing to label them negotiations. One American official called them "an informal dialogue," and the official statement referred to them simply as efforts.

The commitment from Mr. Olmert to meet again with Mr. Abbas is a minor victory for Mr. Abbas, known as Abu Mazen, because it signals that Israel will continue to deal with him despite his unity government plans.

Mr. Olmert said later: "There will be a dialogue, and we will continue the communication channel with Abu Mazen. We will not accept a situation in which we have no channels of communication with the Palestinian public, as I think this will be a dire mistake, all this without compromising over the principle we have established: not to conduct ties or acknowledge institutions that fail to endorse the basic principles which are the foundation to any future dealings."

A top Palestinian negotiator, Saeb Erekat, said Mr. Abbas had agreed to the unity government deal, signed in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, to end weeks of fighting between Hamas and Fatah. He added that Mr. Abbas, as the legal representative of the Palestinians as head of the Palestine Liberation Organization, "recognizes Israel, and that's what really matters."

Ms. Rice made it clear that she felt it wise to continue to talk to Palestinians like Mr. Abbas who accept Israel and nonviolence, which she said represented the views of a majority of Palestinians.

But a Palestinian unity government that does not recognize Israel or renounce violence — and thus far, the Abbas-Hamas agreement does not do so — will make any talks on what is being called a "political and diplomatic horizon" for a settlement even more complicated.

It is one thing for Israel to begin talks with Mr. Abbas while it is boycotting the unity government he helped to negotiate. But it is another for Israel to make meaningful progress toward concluding such negotiations and reaching a peace deal with a government that refuses to recognize it or renounce violence against it.

Ms. Rice defended the decision to hold the meeting. "Sure, we could have said we'll just wait until it all sorts out, " she said. But she added that the Mecca agreement had strained relations between Mr. Abbas and Mr. Olmert to the point that the two needed to clear the air between them. "It's really valuable that they sat face to face," she said.

Some analysts who had been critical of the Bush administration's earlier stance on peace talks agreed. "In this environment, given the odds against even launching a process, what she's done is an achievement," said Aaron David Miller, a scholar at the Woodrow Wilson Center who was a senior adviser for Arab-Israeli relations at the State Department under the previous three presidents.

But the odds for success remain long, he cautioned, until the Palestinians acquire a government that is willing to recognize Israel. "Oddly enough, we're now dressed up for the party, but we've got nowhere to go," he said.

Beyond that, Israel's government is deeply skeptical of Mr. Abbas's ability to deliver calm, let alone a peace agreement. Mr. Olmert and his aides view Mr. Abbas as weakened by the Mecca agreement. A senior Israeli security official said the Saudis treated Mr. Abbas not so much as the Palestinian president, but as a leader of Fatah and an equal to the exiled Hamas political leader, Khaled Meshal.

The Israelis take the view that Mr. Abbas arrived at Mecca weakened by the recent fighting in the Gaza Strip, in which forces loyal to Hamas took over northern Gaza and large parts of Gaza City. Fatah forces did not collapse, but they did not defeat Hamas and were perceived as weaker.

In Gaza, a Hamas spokesman, Ismail Radwan, said Ms. Rice "did not succeed in pressuring President Abbas to withdraw from the unity government." He said Hamas "calls on the U.S. administration to respect the Palestinian people's will and recognize the government and open a dialogue with the government."

Rice's Mideast Talks Yield Little Except A Promise To Meet Again (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 19 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Monday hosted talks between Israeli and Palestinian leaders on ways to build an independent Palestinian state, but the summit appeared to yield little but a pledge to meet again.

Rice's role was intended to signal her deepening commitment to helping resolve the conflict, but the talks demonstrated the difficulties ahead. Neither Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert nor Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas accompanied Rice when she met with reporters after more than two hours of talks.

The "useful and productive meeting" included discussion of the "diplomatic and political horizon" of creating a Palestinian state, Rice said, reading a statement issued in the name of the three officials. The two leaders requested "American participation and leadership in facilitating efforts to overcome obstacles, rally regional and international support and move forward toward peace," Rice said. "In that vein, I expect to return to the region soon."

Although Rice told reporters traveling with her that the two leaders spent "substantial time" discussing the contours of a Palestinian state, some Palestinian officials said Olmert had dismissed discussions about the future until immediate concerns were addressed, including the fate of an Israeli soldier who is being held prisoner in the Gaza Strip.

In any case, Rice acknowledged that a recent Palestinian unity deal, which will leave the militant Hamas group in power, had scaled back her ambitions.

"You could not have walked into that room and said, 'All right, let's talk about your views of the political and diplomatic horizon' " in the wake of the unity accord, which appears to fall short of international demands to recognize Israel, Rice told reporters. But she said there was "real value" in having the two leaders hash out their differences instead of communicating through the news media or surrogates.

In interviews, Palestinian officials were pessimistic about the prospects for talks. Israeli officials, meanwhile, appeared pleased that pressure that might have been exerted on them by the United States was deferred because of the uncertainty over the new Palestinian government.

A month ago, when the summit was announced, Rice hoped to demonstrate progress on moving toward a Palestinian state, but Abbas upended that ambition by unexpectedly agreeing to allow his moderate Fatah party to join a government led by Hamas, or the Islamic Resistance Movement. Abbas said he made the move to end the street battles between the two factions that had killed scores of Palestinians.

Rice had made several trips to Jerusalem in just over four months, in part to ensure a successful summit. She insisted on going ahead with the meeting despite Israeli misgivings, but the summit appears to have mostly devolved into a ground-level discussion on improving the lives of Palestinians. Senior U.S. officials, who confessed they had been surprised about Abbas's unity accord, generally were tight-lipped about the contents of the talks, except to say it was an opportunity to "clear the air."

In the end, Olmert and Abbas agreed only to hold another bilateral discussion on Palestinian movement and access -- but not on the creation of a separate negotiating track for a Palestinian state.

For the benefit of television cameras, Rice, Abbas and Olmert clasped hands and smiled politely as the meeting began. After about an hour of what Rice described as pro forma discussion of outstanding issues -- including the unity deal -- she moved the meeting up to her hotel suite, with its spectacular views of the Old City.

Palestinian officials said that given the tensions with Israel over the unity deal, the meeting would not have taken place if Rice had not insisted on . Israeli officials have said they would snub the new unity government, though after the meeting Olmert said he would continue to work with Abbas, who is an independently elected president.

The peace process has been nearly moribund for three years, as neither side has fulfilled initial steps outlined in a U.S.-backed peace plan. Rice hopes to jump-start peace talks by sketching what she calls a "political horizon" -- the outlines of a Palestinian state -- so that the Palestinian people will support Abbas in his effort to negotiate an agreement with the Israelis.

In theory, this marked the first time Israeli and Palestinian leaders have discussed the contours of a Palestinian state since the aborted peace talks brokered by President Bill Clinton in his waning days in office six years ago. Officials on all sides had striven to keep expectations low for the talks, saying this was only an informal meeting to help build momentum for a new peace process.

"We try to define it as confidence-building," said Olmert spokeswoman Miri Eisin. "You have to meet somebody and talk to him and see if you have confidence and trust each other and see if there is a sense that you can go forward."

Rice Calls Mideast Meeting 'Productive' (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

DOJ_NMG_0133921

The Los Angeles Times, February 20, 2007

JERUSALEM — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice hosted an Israeli-Palestinian summit here Monday, but the session produced little beyond promises to uphold past agreements and meet again soon.

Rice characterized the three-way gathering with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas as "useful and productive," though her summary of the two-hour, 20-minute session was largely a checklist of commitments previously made by the two sides.

Rice billed the meeting as an opportunity for the two leaders to informally explore ways to restart peace talks after more than six years of conflict. She said they did some of that, but also discussed agreements that have not been fully met, such as the 2005 pact on borders aimed at further opening the Gaza Strip to the outside world.

Olmert and Abbas reaffirmed their support of the U.S.-backed diplomatic blueprint known as the "road map" and discussed how to begin reviving it, Rice said. The plan, which lays out a step-by-step path to an independent Palestinian state alongside Israel, has languished since it was unveiled in 2003 because neither side has fulfilled even initial commitments.

Rice said she planned to return to the region soon but did not say when. Olmert and Abbas plan to meet on their own before that.

"They reiterated their desire for American participation and leadership in facilitating efforts to overcome obstacles, rally regional and international support and move forward toward peace. In that vein, I expect to return to the region soon," Rice said in terse remarks after the session.

Olmert and Abbas did not accompany Rice in issuing the statement, and did not meet with the media separately.

No one on either side expected much from the summit, given the weakened political condition of both Olmert and Abbas. Hopes sank further in recent days because of confusion over plans for a Palestinian unity government in which Abbas' Fatah party is to join hands with the radical Hamas movement.

Abbas, a relative moderate, agreed to join a governing alliance with Hamas after months of factional violence that has left more than 100 Palestinians dead. Hamas, whose charter calls for Israel's destruction, has ruled alone since winning parliamentary elections early last year.

Abbas has justified the deal, reached two weeks ago in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, as a way to end the fighting between the rival Palestinian factions. He also hopes that creation of a unity government will end international limits on aid to the Palestinians imposed after Hamas came to power.

But Israel has threatened to snub the proposed government, as it has the Hamas administration, unless the government meets international demands to recognize the Jewish state, renounce violence and abide by past Israeli-Palestinian agreements. Israel also demands the release of a soldier captured last summer by Gaza-based militants.

Olmert said later Monday that Israel would work with Abbas, who was elected separately as Palestinian Authority president.

Rice has said the U.S. will not make a decision on whether to recognize the government until it is formed, but she indicated that it would have to meet the international conditions to gain U.S. acceptance.

The wording of the Mecca agreement appears to fall short of satisfying those demands, laid down last year by the so-called quartet of Middle East mediators: the U.S., European Union, Russia and United Nations. The Mecca pact promises only that the new government will "respect" international resolutions and past peace agreements; it does not clearly recognize Israel.

Rice did not provide details on the discussions. Olmert and Abbas also agreed to respect a cease-fire in place in the Gaza Strip since November, though it has been marred by occasional rocket attacks on Israel by Palestinian militants.

It was the second time Olmert and Abbas have met during the last two months. The prior summit, in December, produced only modest concessions by Israel.

Olmert promised to reduce the number of roadblocks in the West Bank and to transfer $100 million in taxes and customs revenues, part of the funds collected by Israel and withheld from the Palestinians since Hamas took power. The money was transferred last month, but Palestinians and Israeli rights groups say few roadblocks were cleared.

This time, Rice kept the agenda clear of those sorts of nuts-and-bolts issues. She said the purpose instead was to explore a "diplomatic and political horizon," meaning the possible outlines of a peace between the two sides and how to get there.

U.S. officials say that the prospects of a brighter future through peace talks could strengthen Palestinian moderates such as Abbas as a counterweight to Hamas. But in Monday's meeting, the leaders did not appear to have broached the issues likely to be the most difficult to resolve in reaching a final peace accord, such as borders, the status of Jerusalem and the fate of Palestinian refugees.

Monday's meeting took place in a luxury Israeli hotel overlooking Jerusalem's walled Old City. The three first met around a small table in a carpeted conference room, but after about an hour they relocated to Rice's suite to continue the discussions in a more relaxed setting.

Speaking with a group of reporters late Monday, Rice said the meeting was "enormously valuable" because it gave Olmert and Abbas a chance to talk during a delicate moment created by the formation of the Palestinian unity government.

"I frankly don't know how long it might have been before they would have talked with each other, were it not for the coincidence of this meeting having been scheduled," she said.

Olmert, Abbas Revive Peace Negotiations (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, February 20, 2007

JERUSALEM -- Israeli and Palestinian leaders sat down yesterday for the first comprehensive peace talks in six years and emerged with a promise to continue the negotiations in spite of daunting problems ahead.

The two-hour meeting, brokered by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, produced no immediate breakthroughs but will allow Washington to show its Arab allies it is working to resolve one of the region's toughest problems.

As expected, the summit was overshadowed by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' decision last week to form a coalition government with the militant group Hamas, which steadfastly refuses to renounce violence or recognize Israel.

"The real value here was that they sat down to talk with each other pretty early in this process," Miss Rice told reporters after the meeting at the luxurious David Citadel Hotel.

Given Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's reluctance to deal with any Palestinian government that includes Hamas, Miss Rice said, "I frankly don't know how long it might have been before they would have talked with each other were it not for the coincidence of this meeting having been scheduled."

A communique issued after the summit offered few details about the talks, which were described in diplomatic terms as "useful and productive." But Miss Rice said she would return to the region soon, and that the bilateral talks would continue in coming weeks.

Frustrated by years without progress on the U.S.-backed "road map" peace plan, Mr. Olmert and Mr. Abbas had agreed to begin discussing the political "horizon" -- an allusion to principles that would underpin any final peace deal.

But hopes for progress were dimmed by Mr. Abbas' Saudi-brokered unity government deal with Hamas, which failed even to acknowledge international demands that the Palestinian administration recognize Israel, renounce violence and honor past agreements.

The omission took the United States by surprise and led some Israelis to call for Mr. Olmert to boycott the meeting.

Nevertheless, Miss Rice said the two leaders had been able to air their concerns in a candid, respectful atmosphere. The three stepped onto a balcony at one point to view the Old City together and later shared lunch with aides and ministers.

Mr. Olmert reassured members of his Kadima party afterward that there would be no easing of the three international demands. "We would not recognize any government that won't meet these obligations, and we won't cooperate with such a government or its ministers," he said.

But he said Israel would continue to be in contact with the Palestinian Authority to ease humanitarian conditions and to coordinate the fight against terrorist groups. The Palestinian territories have been hard hit by a cutoff in international aid since Hamas formed a government last February.

Mr. Abbas reportedly appealed to the U.S. and Israel to withhold judgment on the new Palestinian government. The Palestinians have argued that Hamas' agreement to sit in a unity government while Mr. Abbas negotiates peace with Israel marks an important evolution among the Islamic militants.

Any progress on final status talks, which would boost Palestinian confidence in negotiations, is thought to strengthen Mr. Abbas in his power struggle with Hamas.

"We view this meeting as a beginning and not an end," said Palestinian spokesman Saeb Erekat. "The meeting was not supposed to wave a magic wand to solve all the problems."

The summit also helps the Bush administration to show its Arab allies that it is doing its best to bring the sides together. Miss Rice said last month she had gotten the message "loud and clear" that Washington had to do more to encourage talks between the Israelis and Palestinians.

The sides last talked about peace in 2001 during the final days of the Clinton administration and the beginning of the Palestinian uprising.

The U.S. introduced the road map near the peak of the violence in mid-2003, but the Israelis and Palestinians alike failed to follow through on the series of parallel confidence-building measures.

Some observers say that after six years without talks, a mere return to continuing negotiations would be a significant achievement.

DOJ_NMG_0133923

"If there is good will and there is a confidence-building process, we might not reach a comprehensive peace, but we could get back on track," said Mohammed Dajani, a political science professor at Al Quds University.

Middle East Talks End Without Progress (FT)

By Harvey Morris

Financial Times, February 20, 2007

A meeting that Israeli and Palestinian leaders held on Monday with Condoleezza Rice, the US secretary of state, matched its low expectations when they agreed on little more substantial than a willingness to meet again.

After talks with Ehud Olmert, the Israeli prime minister, and Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority president, that lasted just over two hours, Ms Rice said the three affirmed their commitment to a two-state solution of the Middle East conflict.

Ms Rice read a prepared statement in which she said the meeting had been useful and productive, but neither she nor her interlocutors offered any further comment on what had originally been billed as the forum for a possible breakthrough.

Against the background of Mr Abbas's deal to create a national unity government with the ruling Hamas party – regarded by Washington as a terrorist organisation – earlier hopes that the meeting would dramatically jump-start the stalled peace process had already faded.

"You are seeing a lot of expectations managed by a lot of weak leaders," said a Palestinian official. "So, in that sense, everyone got what they wanted."

The primary purpose of the accord between Hamas and Mr Abbas's Fatah was to avert further conflict among their warring militias. Its second aim of persuading international donors to lift a ban on direct aid to the PA looks unlikely to be fulfilled in the short term.

Monday's statement noted that the Middle East Quartet – the US, European Union, United Nations and Russia – required any PA government to recognise Israel, commit itself to non-violence and accept previous agreements, including those relating to the Quartet's own "road map".

Neither the US nor Israel believes the Mecca accord, in which Hamas agreed to "respect" existing agreements with Israel, went far enough.

Ismail Haniyeh, the Hamas prime minister who resigned along with his cabinet last week, has up to five weeks to form a government in which Fatah and independents will share power.

Pointing to positive aspects of Monday's meeting, Palestinian officials noted that the Israeli government appeared ready to maintain its relations with Mr Abbas despite his embrace of Hamas. He and Mr Olmert are to meet again soon, the statement added.

Some suggested this might allow for the emergence of a less high-profile negotiating track, which Mr Abbas was known to prefer.

Ms Rice said she would return to the region soon but gave no date for a further tripartite meeting. "That's a tool that everybody can pick up and use when everybody thinks it's useful to do it," Sean McCormack, state department spokesman, said.

Slow Start To New US Bid For Israeli-Palestinian Peace (CSM)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Christian Science Monitor, February 20, 2007

JERUSALEM

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice held a summit with Israeli and Palestinian leaders Monday in a bid to reenergize the stalled peace process.

The trilateral talks with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas fell short of any significant progress, but marked the first time in six years that the sides have discussed a two-state solution face to face.

The summit also devoted time to discussing Mr. Abbas's controversial "unity" government agreement with the Palestinian militant group Hamas.

The US wanted the sides to start hashing out a political "horizon," an allusion to the principles for a final peace deal. But Abbas's new partnership with Hamas in some ways brings the sides back to square one, forcing them to focus on the Islamic militants' refusal to recognize Israel, accept peace agreements, or renounce violence.

These talks, which are the most significant US push for peace since the introduction of the "road map" peace plan in 2003, came at a time of uncertainty regarding the character of a Hamas-Fatah unity government that was agreed to earlier this month in the Muslim holy city of Mecca, Saudi Arabia.

DOJ_NMG_0133924

The Quartet – the US, United Nations, European Union, and Russia – has demanded that any Palestinian government recognize Israel, accept previous peace deals, and renounce violence, but the Hamas-Fatah unity government deal in Mecca only pledges to "respect" past peace agreements.

Inconclusive talks, vague language

The vague language of the summit communiqué reflected the awkward effort to restart negotiations for the first time since President Bush took office: "The President and the Prime Minister discussed their views of the diplomatic and political horizon and how it might unfold toward the two-state vision of President Bush."

Describing the two-hour meeting as "useful and productive," Ms. Rice said that she expects to return to the region soon, and that both she and Mr. Olmert had agreed to meet each other soon. A State Department official said there are no plans for another three-way meeting.

While Olmert and Rice are waiting for the formation of the new unity government before passing judgment, they have both said that Quartet demands must form the foundation of any peace process.

"It simply can't be the case that a political horizon can be built on a basis where one of the parties doesn't accept the right of the other to exist," she told reporters on Monday. "I haven't seen anything to date that suggests that this is a government that's going to meet the Quartet's principles."

Serious questions about the peace process

There are difficulties on the Israeli side as well.

With Olmert dogged by low public-approval ratings following Israel's stymied war effort in Lebanon over the summer, it is questionable whether Olmert himself would have the public backing to negotiate a final peace deal.

"[The talks] seemed to be pretty inconclusive, as expected. Judging by what we heard, they didn't seem to decide anything. A lot will depend on how [the new Palestinian 'unity' government] is formed," says Yossi Alpher, the co-editor of the Arab-Israeli opinion website www.bitterlemons.org.

"Given Abbas's weakness, and given Olmert's weakness, and given the low energy level of what the [Bush] administration is ready to invest, there's no peace process there," says Mr. Alpher.

Despite the inconclusive results of the meeting, the analyst says that the summit helps the US demonstrate to its Arab allies that it is doing its best to prod the sides back to the negotiating table. The Bush administration has been accused of not being proactive enough to encourage talks between Israelis and Palestinians.

Israelis and Palestinians last negotiated a peace treaty in 2001, in the waning days of the Clinton administration and the early days of the Palestinian uprising.

The US introduced the "road map" peace initiative near the peak of the violence in mid-2003, but it quickly lost steam as Israelis and Palestinians failed to follow through on parallel confidence-building measures that were conditions for restarting political negotiations.

With less than two years left in Bush's tenure, it is unclear whether there is enough time for his administration to see the peace process through to a final agreement.

But some observers say that after six years of no talks, a return to consistent negotiations would be a significant achievement.

"If there is good will and a confidence-building process, we might not reach a comprehensive peace, but we could get back on track," says Mohammed Dejani, a political science professor at Al Quds University in Jerusalem. "At least the present administration could take the credit for going from a state of confrontation and violence to dialogue."

Mideast Summit Ends With Little Progress (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, February 20, 2007

A Mideast peace summit designed to open a new chapter for Israelis and Palestinians fed up with violence concluded Monday with no new agreements and a pledge to keep talking.

The United States, which had pushed for the session, said it was an accomplishment merely to hold such a get together for the first time in six years. After two hours of talks with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice stood alone in a bare-bones hotel function room to call the session "useful and productive."

The prospect of any immediate success here essentially was hijacked by Abbas' surprise announcement last week that he will govern hand-in-hand with the militant group Hamas. The United States and Israel list Hamas as a terrorist group and refuse all dealings with the group.

DOJ_NMG_0133925

Speaking to reporters, Rice said the meeting was particularly valuable, however, in light of the lingering uncertainties over Abbas' pact with Hamas.

"I think the real value here is that they sat down to talk with each other pretty early in this process," Rice said.

"I could have made the decision that, well, I'll just wait until this all sorts out," Rice said, but she said that could have created new obstacles. "We thought it would be best to go ahead," the secretary added.

Neither Rice nor other U.S. officials would describe the content of the session, although Israeli and Palestinian officials offered some details.

Olmert said he and Abbas agreed to maintain an open channel of communication, focused both on improving the lives of Palestinians and stopping terrorism.

"What we have heard today has nothing to do with a partnership," said Mohammed Dahlan, an Abbas confidant.

"Abu Mazen is determined to go ahead with this national unity government. There is no backing down," Dahlan said.

Abbas has said that the deal brokered by Saudi Arabia is the best one he could get from Hamas, and that he would move ahead with forming a coalition. The power-sharing deal is seen as crucial to halting internal Palestinian fighting that has killed more than 130 since May.

Abbas and Olmert also discussed possibly extending a 3-month-old cease-fire covering the Gaza Strip to include the West Bank, said Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat.

Hamas spokesman Ismail Radwan called Monday's summit a failure.

"Rice did not succeed in pressuring President Abbas to withdraw from the unity government. We call on the U.S. administration to respect the Palestinian people's will and recognize the government and open a dialogue with the government," he said.

A senior State Department official, speaking on condition of anonymity to describe the closed-door session, said it was an "an irreplaceable opportunity to clear the air."

Meanwhile, Israeli police arrested three protesters who managed to enter the floor of the Jerusalem hotel where Rice is staying, a spokesman said.

The three entered the hotel, climbed the stairs to the floor where Rice is staying and shouted before they were stopped by bodyguards, police spokesman Micky Rosenfeld said. They called on the United States to free Jonathan Pollard, an American who is serving a life term in the United States for spying for Israel.

Israeli police arrested the three before they got very close to Rice's room, Rosenfeld said. It was not clear if Rice was in the room at the time, he said.

The three-way meeting was planned before Abbas made his pact with Hamas. The gathering was meant to offer weary Palestinians a brighter vision for their future by opening a discussion of the contours of an eventual Palestinian state.

It also was a way to strengthen Abbas in his power struggle with Hamas, which surprised the Bush administration by defeating Abbas' secular Fatah Party in elections 13 months ago.

Although U.S. officials brush off any suggestion the pact has tainted Abbas, diplomats have not hidden their displeasure with both the content and timing of the deal he made.

Both the United States and Israel have said they will continue to deal with Abbas, although it is unclear how much authority he will command in the new government.

The Bush administration resisted the troubled Israeli-Palestinian negotiations during Bush's first term, but is displaying a new interest in the old problem. Rice said she understands that the United States plays a crucial role as host and prod, U.S. officials said.

The Hamas deal shifted the ground for talks, but Abbas and Olmert agreed to meet separately soon and Rice said she will return quickly.

There is no set date for another three-way meeting.

"That's a tool that everybody can pick up and use when everybody thinks its useful to do it," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said following the meeting.

All sides had low expectations for Monday's three-way session, even before last week's announcement. The session was billed as a baby step to build confidence between two sides estranged by historic grievances and years of low-level fighting.

The session got off to a lackluster start, with Rice, Abbas and Olmert clasping hands together and flashing polite smiles for the cameras in a spare hotel conference room.

The three met without any aides, except for Rice's Arabic interpreter, officials said.

After about an hour, they moved to Rice's suite overlooking Jerusalem's Old City, continuing talks for another hour in a more comfortable setting. At one point the group walked onto Rice's balcony, each with a view of some of the most revered and disputed real estate in the world.

DOJ_NMG_0133926

Many of the core questions that frame the hoped-for destination — an independent Palestine alongside Israel — apparently would not be on the table Monday. Those include the borders and the fate of disputed areas of Jerusalem.

A third or more of the session was devoted to discussion of the planned coalition government.

Rice Meets Mideast Leaders But Little Progress (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, February 20, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice held a rare summit with Israeli and Palestinian leaders but achieved little concrete progress in reviving the peace process other than a pledge for further talks.

Rice said all sides had discussed a future Palestinian state at the first such meeting in nearly four years, but warned that peace would not come through terror, in a clear reference to the dominant Islamist movement Hamas.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas agreed to meet again "soon," Rice said, adding that she also planned to return to the region to pursue peace efforts.

Hopes of a breakthrough in Middle East peacemaking have been complicated by a deal between Abbas and Hamas -- blacklisted by the West as a terrorist group -- to form a unity government in a bid to end a crippling aid boycott.

After the talks, Olmert insisted Israel would not cooperate with any government that did not meet international demands for peace, while Hamas lashed out at what it labelled US isolationism and "blackmail".

Ismail Haniya, the head of the outgoing Hamas-dominated cabinet who will also lead the new unity administration, said he "regretted that the American administration always behaves according to the logic of isolation and boycott which has proved to be a failure".

Abbas's office announced that the president would head to Britain, Germany and France later in the week to press for a more welcoming approach to the new government from the European Union.

"All three of us affirmed our commitment to a two-state solution, agreed that a Palestinian state cannot be born of violence and terror, and reiterated our acceptance of previous agreements and obligations, including the roadmap," Rice said after more than two-and-a-half hours of talks in a Jerusalem hotel.

Monday's meeting was the first of its kind since 2003 when Rice's predecessor, Colin Powell, met Olmert's predecessor, Ariel Sharon and Abbas, then Palestinian prime minister.

Rice denied it had been thin on outcome.

"I certainly think that it had a confidence-building outcome because, again, this is a period of considerable uncertainty and I'm not sure when they would have sat down to try to come to terms with some of those uncertainties, to try to get answers to each others' questions," she said.

A senior US official said the Israeli and Palestinian leaders had agreed to meet again within weeks. But Rice's visit, her 10th to Jerusalem as secretary of state and her fourth in just five months, comes with both Olmert and Abbas weakened by political struggles at home.

Rice said they had discussed the long-standing international demands of the Palestinian government, as Fatah and Hamas work to form a unity cabinet they hope will lead to a resumption of desperately needed Western funding.

"The president and prime minister also discussed issues arising from the agreement for the formation of a Palestinian national unity government and the position of the Quartet that any Palestinian Authority government must be committed to non-violence, recognition of Israel and acceptance of previous agreements and obligations, including regarding the roadmap," she said.

The European Union, Israel and the United States have insisted the new government meet the three conditions in exchange for ending their boycott.

While Abbas says the new unity government will honour existing agreements with Israel, implicitly recognising the Jewish state, Washington has remained publicly non-committal and Israel has rejected the deal outright.

Olmert said Israel would not work with a Palestinian government that snubbed the conditions but that he would maintain contact with Abbas.

"We will not recognize any government that does not honour these commitments. Neither will we cooperate with it or its ministers," he told a meeting of his centrist Kadima party.

Abbas's spokesman Nabil Abu Rudeina said the Palestinian president would travel to London Wednesday, Berlin Thursday and Paris Friday "in a bid to end the siege imposed on the Palestinian people and explain the Mecca agreement" which set the framework for the new unity government.

Palestinian chief negotiator Saeb Erakat said Abbas insisted the new cabinet should be judged on having recognized his authority to negotiate with Israel.

Old Foes Join In Anger Over India Train Bombing (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

DIWANA, India, Feb. 19 — A day after two homemade bombs killed at least 66 people on a train traveling to Pakistan from India, the governments of both countries on Monday condemned the attack and pledged that it would not deter their aim of reducing longstanding hostilities on the subcontinent.

The office of Manmohan Singh, the Indian prime minister, on Monday morning called the bombing "an act of terror" and promised to apprehend those responsible. Pakistan also denounced the attack, which occurred on the eve of a visit by Khurshid Mehmood Kasuri, the Pakistani foreign minister, to the Indian capital, New Delhi, and two weeks before officials from both countries were to meet for the first time to share information on terrorism-related activities.

The train had ferried more than 600 passengers from Delhi to the India-Pakistan border. The bombs exploded just after midnight Sunday, trapping slumbering passengers aboard the Attari Express in flames. By early Monday, when the bodies were pulled from train, they were so severely burned it was difficult to tell who they were, let alone whether they were Indian or Pakistani.

All told, 66 bodies were taken out of two burned-out compartments; 13 survivors somehow escaped, including an infant and Kamruddin, 60, a small thin man from Multan, Pakistan, who thanked God as an ambulance carried him to an Indian government hospital in New Delhi on Monday. Kamruddin recalled making his way to the door of his coach and having someone pull him out.

Twelve hours later, the two coaches were still smoldering.

Peace talks between India and Pakistan have crawled along for three years, yielding little more than an accord on transportation links like the Attari Express. The two last stepped close to the brink of war in early 2002. They have fought each other in three wars since independence from British rule in 1947.

"This is an act of sabotage," Laloo Prasad Yadav, the Indian railroad minister, told reporters in the eastern city of Patna, according to wire service reports. "This is an attempt to derail the improving relationship between India and Pakistan."

In a statement reported by [a news agency], Gen. Pervez Musharraf, the Pakistani president, said, "We will not allow elements which want to sabotage the ongoing peace process to succeed in their nefarious designs."

The overnight train, en route from Delhi to the border post at Attari, began service 30 years ago, and after a two-year suspension at a time of acute enmity between India and Pakistan, resumed service in January 2004. From Attari, passengers board a second train, which takes them to Lahore, Pakistan.

The explosions occurred when the train had advanced about a mile from Diwana, a tiny station here surrounded by fields of wheat.

Three other bombs were found in the train's other coaches, according to police and railroad officials; a police officer at the scene said he saw a suitcase packed with eight to nine bottles filled with an unknown liquid, along with a plastic detonator.

V. K. Duggal, the home secretary, told reporters that sulfur and kerosene had probably been used.

Mr. Yadav, the railroad minister, said Monday evening that one person had been detained in connection with the blasts, according to [a news agency], but offered no further details.

Navtej Sarna, a spokesman for the Indian Ministry of External Affairs, told reporters that visas would be issued to Pakistani relatives of those who were feared dead. On Monday afternoon, police officers worked in the sun to identify victims at the main government hospital in Panipat, the nearest city to the site of the explosions, recording the remnants they had found: singed passports, a wallet, a key.

The attack occurred almost exactly five years after a fire on a train killed 59 Hindu pilgrims in Gujarat State, in western India, setting off some of the worst communal carnage in India's history, in which at least 1,100 people were killed, mostly Muslims. Last July, a series of synchronized bombs went off on commuter trains in Mumbai, India's largest city, killing about 180 people.

In the attack on Sunday, bombs went off inside two coaches, toward the back of the train, shortly after it left Diwana at 11:53 p.m., two officials at the station said. By the time the first fire trucks arrived, the two coaches were ablaze, and the air smelled of burning plastic and flesh, according to B. D. Ahuja, the fire station officer at Panipat.

Satya Narain Sharma, a firefighter who was among the first to reach the scene at 12:10 a.m. said that when fire crews tried to pry open the first door, it did not budge. Later, they found behind it a pile of bodies, all apparently passengers trying to escape. They found a second door open and began pulling out the dead. Muhammad Wasim Khan said his uncle, Shaffiq Ahmed Khan, from Karachi, was among the dead. Shaffiq Ahmed Khan and his sons, Aarish, 15, and Sammy, 9, had come to visit relatives in Delhi. They stayed for a month and began to make their way home on Sunday night, their bags stuffed with gifts: clothes, fancy soap and packets of Rajanigandha-brand paan masala, a North Indian mouth-freshener. They stuffed their money into their shoes, relatives said, so it would not be taken by the police along the way.

On Sunday night, Muhammad Wasim Khan settled them into the fourth coach from the back, and waved goodbye from the platform. The next afternoon, he found his uncle's body at the hospital in Panipat. He recognized him by the brown coat he wore, and the money stuffed inside his shoes. His face was burned beyond recognition. The two boys had been admitted to Safdarjung Hospital in New Delhi.

At the Old Delhi railroad station, distraught friends and relatives began gathering before dawn to learn who had been killed and who had escaped alive, but at the emergency assistance booth on Platform 15, officials had little information.

Mohammad Aslam, a bangle manufacturer, who accompanied five of his cousins to the train on Sunday night, said his repeated requests for information were brushed off by station staff members. "They keep saying 'How can we give you information when we know nothing ourselves?' " he said.

He said there had been no security searches before passengers boarded the train. Nodding toward the row of police officers searching people at the entrance to the station, opening suitcases and checking handbags, he said, "None of that was there yesterday."

Moscow Warns Neighbours Over US Shield (FT)

By Neil Buckley, Jan Cienski And Hugh Williamson

Financial Times, February 20, 2007

Poland and the Czech Republic could be targeted by Russian missiles if they host elements of the planned US missile defence system, the commander of Russia's strategic missile forces warned on Monday.

The warning came as both Warsaw and Prague signalled they were likely to respond positively to US requests for them to host anti-missile defence bases.

Germany also on Monday expressed concern about the stand-off over the missile defence project, with Frank-Walter Steinmeier, foreign minister, criticising the US and Nato for not addressing Russia's worries over the system earlier. Russia continued to make clear its deep opposition to the system as General Nikolai Solovtsov warned that basing parts of it in eastern Europe risked undermining strategic stability.

"If the governments of Poland, the Czech Republic and other countries make this decision . . . [Russia's] strategic missile troops will be able to target those facilities," he said.

His comments come after criticisms of the project by Vladimir Putin, Russian president. General Yuri Baluyevsky, chief of the Russian army, has warned that Moscow might withdraw from the 1987 Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces treaty unless the US dropped its plans. The strategic missile forces commander echoed that threat yesterday, saying Russia could resume production of medium-range missiles within five or six years.

"We have all the documents, we have the technology, especially as the missiles used to be produced by existing enterprises.

Therefore resuming production, provided there are relevant decisions, will be easy enough," Gen Solovtsov said.

During a visit to Warsaw on Monday, Mirek Topolanek, the Czech prime minister, said Poland and the Czech Republic would have to undertake a large communication effort to explain the programme to Russia as well as to Germany and France – and to their own populations.

But he said it was "naïve" to suppose that the US had not consulted Russia over the project. Jaroslaw Kaczynski, his Polish counterpart, said the shield was "not aimed at any normal country".

"We will attempt to persuade the Russians that which is obvious and which they of course realise, that this is in no way an installation directed at them," he said.

Mr Kaczynski said: "We are jointly deeply convinced that important decisions concerning the security and future of our countries and Europe have to be taken – I'm speaking here of the shield."

The US state department did not comment on the Russian threat but said the defensive system it was developing with the Czech and Polish governments was in no way targeted at Russia.

"We have offered to co-operate with Russia on missile defence. We think we face a common set of threats emanating from the Middle East as well as other areas," a spokesman said.

Russia has dismissed US arguments that the shield – with tracking radar in the Czech Republic and missiles in Poland – is designed to allow Europe and the eastern US to intercept missiles launched from rogue nations in the Middle East.

Mr Steinmeier said in a newspaper interview: "Because the sites for the stationing [of the missile defence system] are quite near Russia, one should have talked about it with Russia beforehand."

DOJ_NMG_0133929

Henning Riecke, security expert at Berlin's DGAP foreign affairs institute, said it was clear to the German government that Russia was not threatened by the proposed defence system, but Berlin was keen to maintain stable relations with Moscow.

Ex-allies Warned On Anti-missile Defense Plan (WT/AP)

By Vladimir Isachenkov

The Washington Times, February 20, 2007

MOSCOW -- Poland and the Czech Republic risk being targeted by Russian missiles if they agree to host a proposed U.S. missile defense system, a top Russian general warned yesterday.

Russia has been increasingly bellicose in its response to the U.S. proposal to build the missile defense system in Eastern Europe. President Vladimir Putin has said he does not trust U.S. explanations that the system would protect the American East Coast and Europe from any missiles launched by "rogue nations" in the Middle East.

Gen. Nikolai Solovtsov, head of Russia's missile forces, said the system would upset strategic stability. It would be the first such site in Europe.

"If the governments of Poland and the Czech Republic take such a step ... the Strategic Missile Forces will be capable of targeting these facilities if a relevant decision is made," he said.

Also yesterday, Czech Prime Minister Mirek Topolanek said his country and Poland were in favor of the U.S. missile defense proposal.

"I think it is in our joint interest to negotiate this initiative and to build in our area the missile defense," Mr. Topolanek said after talks in Warsaw with Polish Prime Minister Jaroslaw Kaczynski.

The bases in Poland and the Czech Republic would be designed to intercept missiles being developed by Iran, U.S. Air Force Lt. Gen. Henry A. Obering, director of the Missile Defense Agency, said last month. Two other bases in Alaska and California would protect the United States from threats from North Korea, Gen. Obering said.

Mr. Kaczynski brushed aside Russia's fears, saying, "The missile defense is not directed against any normal state.

"Any statement suggesting that the missile defense would change the alignment of forces in Europe is a misunderstanding," he said. "This truth is being conveyed to our partners in the West and the East."

State Department spokesman Edgar Vasquez said the United States has worked closely with the Czech and Polish governments to develop the missile defense system and that it was in no way directed at Russia.

"We have offered to cooperate with Russia on missile defense because we believe we face a common threat emanating from the Middle East as well as other areas," Mr. Vasquez said.

Gen. Solovtsov said he was concerned that the United States, which plans to deploy 10 interceptors in Poland, could boost those numbers in the future.

The general also said it would take Russia less than six years to build upgraded medium-range missiles if Moscow decided to pull out of a 1987 agreement with the United States that bans their deployment.

"It is not difficult to restore their production," Gen. Solovtsov said at a press conference. "The missiles were dismantled, but the production technology has remained."

Russian military officials have said Moscow's decision to pull out of the Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces Treaty would depend on whether the United States goes ahead with the missile defense plan.

The agreement was negotiated by Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev and President Reagan.

Our Strange Devotion To The Kremlin (WP)

By Anne Applebaum

The Washington Post, February 20, 2007

"I have a difficult time explaining that speech. It doesn't accord with either the world as we see it nor with the character of our interactions with the Russians."

-- Condoleezza Rice, Feb. 15

Ten days have passed since the Russian president, Vladimir Putin, made a speech in Munich accusing the United States of plunging the planet into "an abyss of permanent conflicts," of deliberately encouraging the spread of weapons of mass destruction, and (this from a country that regularly blackmails and manipulates its neighbors) of having "overstepped its national borders in every way." During that time, the American secretary of state -- quoted above -- has not been alone in expressing surprise. With varying degrees of shock, commentators and politicians have speculated about the significance of Putin's "new" language, wondering whether it means Russia's road to democracy has reached a fork, whether Putin was really speaking to his domestic audience or whether the speech heralded some kind of policy change.

DOJ_NMG_0133930

In fact, the only thing continually surprising about President Putin is the surprise itself. For we have long known a great deal about Putin, about his biography -- his time as a KGB officer in East Germany, his years in the government of St. Petersburg -- and about his personal philosophy, too. We have long known, for example, that he is a great admirer of Yuri Andropov, the former Soviet leader best remembered for his belief that "order and discipline," as defined by the KGB, would revive the weakened Soviet Union of the 1980s. Way back in 1999, Putin went so far as to dedicate a plaque to Andropov in a corner of the Lubyanka, once the headquarters of the KGB as well as its most notorious political prison.

Since then, Putin has not ceased emulating many of the methods of the Andropov-era KGB, including its paranoid suspicion of America. He continues to treat all Western organizations in Russia, whatever their purpose, as "spies and diversionaries." He has used Russian television -- all state-owned or state-influenced -- to portray the recent mysterious deaths of his critics, including one by polonium poisoning, as part of a nefarious Western plot to discredit his government. In the wake of the 2004 Beslan school massacre, he hinted that American support for Chechen terrorists was to blame. I myself have heard that claim repeated in Moscow more than once.

Nevertheless, we were surprised, are surprised and apparently always will be surprised by Putin, just as we were surprised by Yeltsin before him and Gorbachev before that. Despite Putin's background and his well-known views, President Bush from the beginning of his term treated Putin the way all American presidents treat all Russian leaders: as America's new best friends. Bush, infamously, looked deep into Putin's eyes, found him to be " straightforward and trustworthy" and invited him to his ranch.

Not so many years earlier, when President Boris Yeltsin was up for reelection, President Bill Clinton told his main Soviet adviser, Strobe Talbott, that "I want this guy to win so bad it hurts." Never mind that inside Russia, Yeltsin was already associated with massive theft and economic chaos, or that his regime was perceived internally as corrupt and nepotistic: The American president went out of his way to visit Moscow during the campaign, just to make sure Yeltsin won.

It is, if you think about it, an odd phenomenon. After all, American presidents generally don't campaign on behalf of their French counterparts or look deep into the eyes of German chancellors in order to divine their true natures. While at times very friendly, neither Clinton nor Bush seems to have felt a mystical connection to British Prime Minister Tony Blair.

Yet Russian politicians still seem to make American politicians grow starry-eyed and lose their bearings. Perhaps it's a secret longing for the glamour of those Cold War summits, for the days when it seemed as if the personal relations between superpower statesmen could ward off the destruction of the entire planet. Or perhaps they put something in the vodka -- sorry, mineral water -- at those elegant Kremlin lunches.

Either way, it's time to kick the habit. True, it is perfectly possible that whoever leads Russia after Putin steps down (if Putin steps down) will be a nicer, friendlier person. It is perfectly possible that we will find areas of cooperation with him, just as we sometimes do with Putin. But however friendly and cooperative, however much a "democrat" he appears to be, I hope we'll avoid the instant professions of eternal friendship. At the very least, we'll avoid being unpleasantly surprised, yet again, if things turn out otherwise.

US And EU Trade Zone Gathers Pace (FT)

By Andrew Bounds In Brussels

Financial Times, February 20, 2007

The US and European Union could set a date for the creation of a transatlantic trading zone at a summit in April, diplomats say.

The idea of harmonising rules and regulations between the world's biggest economies to boost growth has gathered momentum since Angela Merkel, German chancellor, embraced it in January.

Both sides have taken up the so-called Merkel initiative as a way of re-invigorating the partnership after tension over Iraq and the Doha trade round.

Boyden Gray, US ambassador to the EU, said: "The political commitment is there from the president and members of his cabinet. It is a great opportunity."

Mr Gray said it was likely the objective would be set at the summit but stressed that more work was needed on how it would be achieved.

"There are political and structural problems. You have to set up a mechanism involving members of Congress and the European parliament. It has to outlive individual presidents and committee chairmen. It will take a long time."

John Bruton, EU ambassador to the US, last week said involving the US Congress. which jealously guards its regulatory powers, would be key but the goal was vital. "New models of motor cars have to be crashed twice, once to comply with the EU standard and again to comply with the US standard.

"We simply cannot afford to load more costs on the shoulders of our customers, or place more restrictions in the way of our businesses, if we are to beat our global competitors."

There are panels of technocrats from both sides, but Mr Bruton said they would make swift progress only if politicians set targets. “All regulations ultimately have a political source,” he said.

Some people compare the Merkel initiative with the creation of the EU single market, which existed on paper for decades before becoming a reality. It was only after EU leaders set a timetable for action that barriers began to fall.

Bob Bennett, a US Republican senator, will on Thursday meet José Manuel Barroso, Commission president, and hand over a timetable to conclude talks by 2015.

The report, prepared for legislators of the Transatlantic Policy Network by Bruce Stokes of the German Marshall Fund and seen by the Financial Times, calls for studies on how to tackle each sector and then a two-step process to implement the market.

From 2007-10 negotiators should aim to harmonise accounting standards, chemicals regulations, customs co-operation, healthcare records and sign an open skies air transport deal.

From 2011-15 they would tackle such sensitive areas as entry requirements, capital market regulation and cargo. Many of these have been complicated by US security concerns.

The trade departments of the EU and US remain sceptical of concluding a deal. Peter Mandelson, EU trade commissioner, while welcoming the initiative, said recently: “It is going to take a great deal of effort and may not be possible.”

Rugs to riches

Afghanistan's ambassador is hoping that the ancient art of rug weaving will help spur development in his Central Asian nation, which is struggling with Taliban terrorism and donor fatigue from nations that have so far failed to put up the money to match their aid promises.

"Afghan rugs connect you to thousands of years of history, a group of talented artists halfway around the world, and a reconstruction process that is helping millions of people find security, prosperity, education and new hope," Ambassador Said T. Jawad said at a recent exhibit of Afghan rugs in Atlanta.

"Afghanistan's rug trade is at least 1,000 years old. The Silk Road and Afghanistan were the nexus of civilizations, knowledge and trade, stretching from Spain to China. Today, Afghan rugs are regaining their fame and recognition for excellent value, superb quality, rich colors and unique patterns."

The exhibit, attended by top U.S. officials, attracted wealthy investors who bought nearly all of the rugs on display.

David Sampson, U.S. deputy commerce secretary, noted that the exhibition was a "smart step" toward the goal of promoting Afghanistan's traditional rug industry, which generates $50 million in annual exports.

Mr. Jawad urged buyers to help Afghanistan's economy by investing in its arts and crafts, which have tax-free access to the U.S. market. He noted that his country is trying to recover from 30 years of conflict -- from the Soviet invasion in 1979 to the resurgent threat from the extremist Taliban, trying to regain power after the United States overthrew them in 2001 for sheltering Osama bin Laden and his al Qaeda terrorist network.

"You are helping millions of women and families struggling to recover from three decades of war and despair," the ambassador said.

"Afghans are grateful for your support and assistance and the sacrifices of your soldiers fighting to defend freedom in Afghanistan, here in the U.S. and all over the world. They are all heroes."

Darfur dispute

Andrew Natsios, the special U.S. envoy to Sudan, angered the Africa Action network by dismissing the term "genocide" in connection with the humanitarian crisis in the Darfur region of the African nation.

Mr. Natsios earlier this month told an audience at Georgetown University, "The term 'genocide' is counter to the facts of what is really occurring in Darfur."

Nii Akuetteh, executive director the Washington-based advocacy group, said Sudan clearly intends to destroy communities of black African farmers through proxy Arab militias.

"Natsios' declaration that genocide is no longer occurring in Darfur denies the reality on the ground and conflicts with numerous statements from the White House and State Department over the past two years," Mr. Akuetteh said.

"This is more than a semantic change. Natsios' claim represents a calculated attempt to re-characterize the crisis, undermine its urgency and obviate the need for new U.S. action to address it."

In an interview last week, however, Mr. Natsios re-emphasized the threat posed by the militias to more than 2.5 million refugees displaced since 2003, when so-called Janjaweed militias began slaughtering civilians and burning villages in response to anti-government rebel attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0133932

Mr. Natsios told the [a] news agency that the Sudanese government has "lost control" in Darfur.

"There is anarchy in Darfur. The risk is that if the [nongovernmental organizations] leave, the U.N. humanitarian agencies leave, there will be no one to care for these people in the camps who can be trusted," he said.

"There is a potential for an explosion if the agencies leave that would match the risk" to the local population that occurred in 2003 and 2004, Mr. Natsios said.

The result "would be a blood bath," he warned.

The conflict has claimed between 300,000 and 400,000 lives.

Let's Start A War, One We Can Win (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, February 20, 2007

AFETA, Ethiopia

They were two old men, one arriving by motorcade with bodyguards and the other groping blindly as he shuffled on a footpath with a stick, but for a moment the orbits of Jimmy Carter and Mekonnen Leka intersected on this remote battlefield in southern Ethiopia.

Mr. Mekonnen, who thinks he may be 78, is a patient in Mr. Carter's war on river blindness. He is so blind that he rarely leaves the house any more, but on this occasion he staggered to the village clinic to get a treatment for the worms inside him.

His skin is mottled because the worms cause ferocious itching, especially when they become more active at night. He and other victims scratch until they are bloodied and their skin is partly worn away. Ultimately the worms travel to the eye, where they often destroy the victim's sight.

Ethiopia has the largest proportion of blind people in the world, 1.2 percent, because of the combined effects of river blindness and trachoma. As in many African countries, the wrenching emblem of poverty is a tiny child leading a blind beggar by a stick.

As Mr. Mekonnen waited on a bench by the clinic, there was a flurry of activity, and an Ethiopian announced in the Amharic language that "a great elder" had arrived. Then Mr. Mekonnen heard voices speaking a foreign language and a clicking of cameras, and finally the whirlwind around Mr. Carter moved on.

"Do you know who that was?" I asked Mr. Mekonnen.

"I couldn't see," he replied.

"Have you ever heard of Jimmy Carter?"

"No."

Yet in remote places like this, former President Carter, at 82, is leading a private war on disease that should inspire and shame President Bush and other world leaders into joining. It's not just that Mr. Carter's wars have been more successful than Mr. Bush's; Mr. Carter is also rehabilitating the image of the U.S. abroad and transforming the lives of the world's most wretched peoples. (For a video of Mr. Carter's trip, please go to www.nytimes.com/ontheground.)

On the previous night, Mr. Mekonnen had slept under a mosquito net for the first time in his life, as part of a Carter initiative to wipe out malaria and elephantiasis in this region. And Mr. Mekonnen now uses an outhouse as a result of a Carter Center initiative to build 350,000 outhouses in rural Ethiopia to defeat blindness from trachoma.

Mr. Carter has almost managed to wipe out one horrific ailment — Guinea worm — and is making great strides against others, including river blindness and elephantiasis. In this area, people are taking an annual dose of a medicine called Mectizan — donated by Merck, which deserves huge credit — that prevents itching and blindness.

Mectizan also gets rid of intestinal worms, leaving Ethiopian villagers stronger and more able to work or attend school. Among adults, the deworming revives sex drive, so some people have named their children Mectizan.

Mr. Carter's private campaign against the diseases of poverty, put together with pennies and duct tape, is a model of what our government could do. Imagine if the U.S. resolved that it would wipe out malaria and elephantiasis (both are spread by mosquitoes, so a combined campaign makes sense). What if we celebrated science not by trying to go to Mars but by extinguishing malaria? What if we tried to burnish America's image abroad not only with press releases and propaganda broadcasts, but also with a bold campaign against disease?

So I wish that President Bush could visit villages like this and see what Mr. Carter has accomplished as a private individual. Mr. Bush, to his great credit, has financed a major campaign against AIDS that will save nine million lives, and he is also increasing spending against malaria — but not nearly as energetically as he is increasing the number of troops in Iraq. So I asked Mr. Carter whether President Bush should be pushing not for a possible war with Iran, but for a war on malaria.

“That would certainly be my preference,” he said. “I thought the war in Iraq was one of the worst mistakes our country ever made, and we’re possibly about to make an even worse mistake by precipitating a war with Iran. But I would like to see us shift away from war being a high priority, to diplomacy and benevolent causes.”

So, President Bush, how about if we as a nation join Mr. Carter’s war on diseases that afflict the world’s poorest peoples — and are one reason they are so poor. That’s a war that would unite Americans, not divide them. Come on, Mr. Bush, sound the trumpets!

Just when you think world economic policy might be moving in a more sensible direction, along comes Latin America. This month's lesson in how not to create prosperity comes from Argentina, which has decided that the way to whip inflation is to throw out inconvenient statistics.

Recently the Peronist government of President Nestór Kirchner sacked an official at its National Statistics and Census Institute for refusing to agree to alter the "methodology" used to calculate inflation in January. Armed guards then escorted a political appointee to replace her.

As his government heads into the season of negotiating labor contracts, Mr. Kirchner has an incentive to underestimate inflation. And sure enough, five days after this dismissal, the government released its January inflation number of 1.1%, well below the 1.5% to 2% expected by non-government economists. These private economists say that, to reach the lower number, the new director agreed to modify increases in the cost of fruits and vegetables and understate soaring health insurance premiums and higher prices in tourism.

Employees of the Statistics Institute protested outside their offices and issued a statement accusing the government of "tampering" with the inflation index. International markets did not react well either. Inflation-linked Argentine peso bonds sold off almost 4%. Mr. Kirchner has responded by referring to the protesters as "mafiosas." Mark it down as one more reason Argentina can't shake its reputation as an economic banana republic.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Draws Link Between Revolutionary War, Struggle Against Terror. USA Today (2/20, 8A, 2.27M) reports, "President Bush honored the 275th birthday of the nation's first president Monday, likening George Washington's long struggle that gave birth to a nation to the war on global terrorism. 'Today, we're fighting a new war to defend our liberty and our people and our way of life,' Bush said in front of Washington's home along the banks of the Potomac River in Mount Vernon, Va." Bush "chose the Presidents Day holiday to make his first visit as president to Mount Vernon. He and first lady Laura Bush helped lay a wreath at Washington's tomb, then the president gave a speech on the lawn of the estate." Bush quipped, "I feel right at home here. After all, this is the home of the first George W." The AP (2/20, Raum) notes Bush said, "As we work to advance the cause of freedom around the world, we remember that the father of our country believed that the freedoms we secured in our revolution were not meant for Americans alone. … Over the centuries, America has succeeded because we have always tried to maintain the decency and the honor of our first president."

Likewise, the Los Angeles Times (2/20, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports Bush "linked the ideals of the first president to the war being fought by the 43rd, saying Washington's goals guided the nation's quest to extend freedom beyond its borders."

The Washington Post (2/20, A5, Jackman, 690K), meanwhile, reports "Bush's remarks consisted mainly of a reflection on Washington's life and impact on the United States, with brief allusions to today's war."

But the New York Times (2/20, Stolberg, 1.16M) reports Bush "implicitly compared himself to his predecessor. 'With the advantage of hindsight, it is easy to take George Washington's successes for granted,' Mr. Bush said after enumerating Washington's achievements as commander of the Continental Army and later as president. But 'America's path to freedom was long and it was hard,' he continued, 'and the outcome was never really certain.'" McClatchy (2/20, Douglas) also says Bush "drew comparisons between America's first wartime president and the current one. He likened Washington's struggles in fighting for and forging democracy to his global war on terrorism."

The Washington Times (2/20, Dinan, 88K) reports, "As he nears the end of his own two terms as president and his Iraq policy faces heavy criticism, Mr. Bush, the 43rd president, seems to take solace in the fact that historians are still digesting the first president's legacy. 'My attitude is, if they're still analyzing No. 1, 43 ought not to worry about it and just do what he thinks is right, and make the tough choices necessary,' he said at a press conference late last year." Bush "clearly has done some of his own analyzing about Washington, praising him several times for being steady as a wartime leader. 'In the end, General Washington understood that the Revolutionary War was a test of wills, and his will was unbreakable,' he said."

Australian Official Says US Will Turn Hicks Over By End Of Year. The New York Times (2/19, Johnston, 1.16M) reports Australian Foreign Minister Alexander Downer said Sunday "that his government had reached a deal to allow David Hicks, who has been held at the American military base in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, for more than five years without trial, to return to Australia by the end of the year." American military prosecutors "have accused Mr. Hicks, 31, an Australian citizen, of attempted murder in violation of the laws of war and providing material support for terrorism. Mr. Hicks, who was captured in Afghanistan in late 2001, is expected to be formally charged soon." Downer said US authorities "had told him that if Mr. Hicks was found guilty by the military tribunal, he would be allowed to serve out his sentence in an Australian prison."

US To Conduct Large-Scale Anti-Terror Exercise On Guam. The Washington Times/AFP (2/20) reports, "The world's biggest anti-terrorism exercise will be held this year on Guam, underscoring the Pacific island's growing importance to Washington, officials said yesterday. Exercise TopOff4 is part of a series of large-scale maneuvers established to strengthen the U.S. ability to respond to terrorist attacks involving weapons of mass destruction." US Coast Guard Commander William Marhoffer said that "TopOff4 'is a domestic counterterrorism exercise. ... It involves the intelligence communities, the Department of Homeland Security, the FBI, the Department of Defense, the U.S. Coast Guard.' The exercise is expected to simulate a maritime terrorist attack."

Madrid Attack Defendant Says Refusal To Be Informant Prompted Arrest. The AP (2/20) reports, "A Moroccan who ran the shop where most of the cellphone cards used to set off the bombs in the 2004 Madrid train attacks were sold said Monday he was implicated in the case as punishment for refusing to be a police informant." Jamal Zougam "denied he was a member of al-Qaeda or other radical Islamic groups, or that he had ever trained in terrorist camps in Afghanistan. He also condemned the Madrid blasts, and said he had never thought of his host country as an enemy." In additional testimony yesterday, bombing suspect Syrian Basel Ghalyoun "acknowledged that he was a friend of Tunisian Serhan Ben Abdelmajid Fakhet and other ringleaders who blew themselves up as police moved to arrest them weeks after the attacks but denied having anything to do with the bombings."

European Terror Investigators Have Wider Powers Than US Counterparts. In a Wall Street Journal (2/20, 2.04M) column, Bret Stephens writes that the Napoleonic Code gives "French investigative magistrate and counterterrorism supremo Jean-Louis Bruguiere" many powers that the Constitution denies to US counter-terror officials. "In the U.S., Mr. Bruguiere's activities would amount to one long and tangled violation of the First, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth and Eighth Amendments to the Constitution. … In France, however, Mr. Bruguiere…is a folk hero." Stephens adds, "All this calls into question the seriousness, if not the sincerity, of European complaints that under the Bush administration the U.S. has become a serial human-rights violator. … When President Bush declared a war on terror after 9/11, it was because he had no other realistic legal alternative. And when the rest of us make invidious comparisons between Europe and America, we should keep our fundamental differences in mind. There is no European 82nd Airborne, and there is no American Jean-Louis Bruguiere."

Trial Of Accused Madrid Train Bombers Broadcast Over Web. The New York Times (2/19, Carvajal, 1.16M) reports that on the "opening day of Spain's trial of 29 men accused in the deadly Madrid train bombings, police officers ringed the maximum-security brick courtroom while a helicopter whirled overhead." But with "the click of a computer mouse, anyone can peek inside the inner sanctum for a glimpse of Spanish judges in black robes with white lace cuffs facing suspects barricaded behind bulletproof glass." That "YouTube-style window has been opened by a high-tech legal services company, Datadiar, which is streaming live coverage of the trial on its Web site, datadiar.com, and posting archived video testimony that began with the appearance on Thursday of the first suspect, Rabei Osman Sayed Ahmed, known as Muhammad the Egyptian" The "rare running view of what stands to be a legal marathon is of keen interest to a nation still haunted by questions about who set off the bombs on March 11, 2004, killing 191 and wounding nearly 2,000 on four commuter trains."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

DHS Ramps Up Nuclear Weapons Detection Efforts. U.S. News and World Report (2/26, Marek, 2.03M) reports, "Nuclear bombs are the rare weapon that can kill hundreds of thousands. And experts say the unleashing of a dirty bomb-a conventional explosive laced with radioactive material-could sicken thousands of people and cause unparalleled economic damage. So it's not surprising that DHS and New York-area authorities are planning an aggressive approach in coming months: They'll surround Manhattan with radiation detectors they hope can sniff out a weapon before it does harm. But it's an ambitious, expensive effort, and critics worry they're going too far, too fast. … Today's detection efforts, however, are limited by technology." The "vast majority" of machines "can't distinguish between harmful and harmless, naturally occurring radiation. Still, DHS's current approach has been quietly gaining speed in the past year."

U.S. News and World Report (2/26, Kingsbury, 2.03M) also reports that in December 1945, Robert Oppenheimer wasquoted as saying, "If you hired me to walk through the cellars of Washington to see whether there were atomic bombs, I think my most important tool would be a screwdriver to open the crates and look. I think that just walking by, swinging a little gadget would not give me the information." US News adds, "Not everyone completely agrees; Department of Homeland Security officials say new state-of-the-art detectors can do a much better job than that. But the basic point is still valid-and alarming."

DHS To Work With States On Chemical Plant Security Concerns. USA Today (2/20, 3A, Hall, 2.27M)

reports, "New government rules seeking to thwart terrorist attacks on chemical plants are facing stiff opposition from state leaders, environmentalists and others who say the regulations are flawed, vague and unlikely to protect the public." Sen. Joe Lieberman has wrote to DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff this month saying that the rules, set to take effect in April, "are seriously flawed and could have a very harmful impact." Agency spokesman Russ Knocke "says the department is reviewing the complaints and will work with plant managers, state officials and other groups to address their concerns." USA Today notes that New Jersey Gov. Jon Corzine has complained that the federal rules would weaken "stricter chemical security rules" passed in his state in 2005. However, "Knocke says the nation must have uniform security policies."

Congressional Democrats Urge Tighter Security For Subways. USA Today (2/19, 1A, Hall, 2.27M) reports congressional Democrats "now in charge of homeland security are pushing ahead with legislation to tighten security in the nation's subways and other mass-transit systems." Senate Banking and Urban Affairs committee Chairman Chris Dodd, D-Conn. said, "These are ripe, easy targets. Commuters shouldn't have to play Russian roulette when they get on the train in the morning." USA adds Dodd's panel "has approved legislation authorizing $3.5 billion over the next three years on transit security. The committee oversees mass transit." Meanwhile, House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Bennie Thompson "says his panel's legislation will mandate more training for transit workers, whistle-blower protection for those who reveal security lapses, increased screening at stations and federal grants for mass-transit security."

NYTimes Calls For Repeal Of Provisions That Ease Declaration Of Martial Law. The New York Times (2/19, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "A disturbing recent phenomenon in Washington is that laws that strike to the heart of American democracy have been passed in the dead of night. So it was with a provision quietly tucked into the enormous defense budget bill at the Bush administration's behest that makes it easier for a president to override local control of law enforcement and declare martial law." The provision, "signed into law in October, weakens two obscure but important bulwarks of liberty." The first, posse comitatus, "is the doctrine that bars military forces, including a federalized National Guard, from engaging in law enforcement." The other "is the Insurrection Act of 1807, which provides the major exemptions to posse comitatus. It essentially limits a president's use of the military in law enforcement to putting down lawlessness, insurrection and rebellion, where a state is violating federal law or depriving people of constitutional rights." There is "a bipartisan bill, introduced by Senators Patrick Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, and Christopher Bond, Republican of Missouri, and backed unanimously by the nation's governors, that would repeal the stealthy revisions. Congress should pass it."

Justice Sought For Japanese Taken From Latin America During WWII. In a n op-ed for the Washington Post (2/19, A19, 690K) Reps. Xavier Becerra and Dan Lungren write, "2,300 people of Japanese descent from 13 Latin American countries who were taken from their homes and forcibly transported to the Crystal City camp during World War II. The U.S. government orchestrated and financed the deportation of Japanese Latin Americans for use in prisoner-of-war exchanges with Japan. Eight hundred people were sent across the Pacific, while the remaining Japanese Latin Americans were held in camps without due process until after the war ended.." The congressmen add, "Further study of the events surrounding the deportation and incarceration of Japanese Latin Americans is merited and necessary. That is why we have introduced H.R. 662, the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Latin Americans of Japanese Descent Act."

Settlement Expected In Hurricane Lawsuits. USA Today (2/19, 1B, Chu, 2.27M) reports, "The first major insurance settlement involving a group of hurricane-damaged homes in Louisiana is in its final stages and could be announced as soon as in a week or two, according to the attorney for the homeowners who sued. The likely multimillion-dollar deal would cover about 165 homeowners insured by Louisiana Citizens -- the state-created insurer of last resort -- in Cameron Parish, where the 2005 hurricanes reduced homes to slabs, says Jennifer Jones, the homeowners' lawyer." Jones "cautioned that the settlement could still be scuttled. But if it succeeds, it could provide a model for resolving hundreds other such cases in the state. The deal would not affect thousands of homes damaged by the New Orleans levee breach after Hurricane Katrina."

Katrina "Voluntourists" Noted. USA Today (2/19, Copeland, 2.27M) reports on Katrina "voluntourists," a "massive wave of volunteers -- half a million, by one estimate -- who have come here from across the nation in the nearly 18 months since Katrina struck. In storm-ravaged Mississippi, their impact has been immeasurable. From Pascagoula in the east to Bay St. Louis in the west, these volunteers have been the one positive constant for residents who have battled through lengthy power outages, mosquito infestations, stuffy FEMA trailers, recalcitrant insurers and an often molasses-slow government bureaucracy."

Many In New Orleans Said To Be Ready To Leave City. The CBS Evening News (2/19, story 9, 2:25, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported that as "a successful Mardi Gras" in New Orleans comes to a close, more than 700,000 tourists are set to leave following Fat Tuesday, and "many of the city's prominent residents may soon be following." CBS (Smith) continued, "A recent study by the University of New Orleans found that nearly a third of the people here say they might be moving in the next two years. For people who stayed after the storm, day-to-day life in the big easy has been anything but. … The homicide rate is one of the highest in the country and 17 officers a month are quitting the police department." City councilman Oliver Thomas was shown saying that living in the city is "a little tougher right now. But it's worth it."

WAR NEWS:

Al Qaeda Attack Against US Outpost In Iraq Raises Alarms. Coverage of yesterday's attack on a US outpost outside Baghdad, reportedly carried our by an Al Qaeda-linked group, is being portrayed as an ominous sign for President Bush's new Iraq strategy. All three networks led with the story, which is also being covered on the front pages of today's major newspapers. ABC World News (2/19, lead story, 2:45, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Part of the President's new plan in Baghdad is to place US forces in a number of outposts in and around the city. One of those outposts, heavily-fortified, occupied by about 100 American troops, came under attack today. Two Americans were killed, 17 wounded. The attack raises new concerns. If the additional US troops now in the city restrict insurgents, will they start attacking outside the city? And it raises the question about whether smaller outposts put America's troops in greater danger." Here's ABC's Miguel Marquez." ABC (Marquez) added, "Explosions thundered throughout Iraq today, as insurgents appeared to mount a surge of their own. … The Al Qaeda group, Islamic State of Iraq, claimed the responsibility for the attack. The claims couldn't be verified. As many as 60 similar bases will eventually house US troops taking part in the surge. They are smaller and less secure than most other US bases." ABC World News (2/19, story 2, 1:40, Gibson, 8.78M) later reported, "Overall, six US troops died in Iraq today, bringing this month's US death toll to 59."

The CBS Evening News (2/19, lead story, 2:25, Mitchell, 7.66M) attributed the attack to "Sunni insurgents," and said they "are responding to the US and Iraqi sweep of Baghdad with some new tactics of their own. They made a direct in-your-face attack today on a US combat base outside Baghdad." CBS (Logan) added, "This was a rare and brazen assault on a US base carried out in broad daylight by gunmen intent on killing and wounding as many American soldiers as possible."

NBC Nightly News (2/19, lead story, 2:05, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There is a strong possibility that we are looking at a big change in the war in Iraq happening right now before our very eyes." NBC (Arraf) added, "Al Qaeda in Iraq has claimed responsibility for this attack," one "US officials are calling coordinated and sophisticated. It was also devastating. … Interior Ministry sources say it happened like this. Two suicide bombers drove their cars to the outer perimeter of a police station used by US forces. That perimeter was protected by concrete blast barriers and barbed wire. They detonated the cars, killing two soldiers at the gates. As other US troops rushed out of the police station a third bomber drove up and detonated his car. A building in the compound collapsed. Then a firefight broke out between US troops and insurgents armed with rocket propelled grenades, sniper rifles and AK-47's. As the fighting raged, American helicopters touched down to evacuate wounded soldiers. Tonight, US troops have sealed the roads in and out of the farming community where for the last few months, the only defense against Sunni insurgents have been the US soldiers attacked today."

NBC Nightly News (2/19, story 2, 2:00, Engel, 9.87M) later reported, "We're seeing foot patrols again in Baghdad that we haven't seen in a long time. More hearts and mind campaign. There are also vulnerabilities. These small bases are not as well protected. What we saw today is that the enemy is trying to probe the weaknesses and look for weaknesses in the new battle plan and it looks like they found at least one. … It is very much a new war. A lot of people say this feels like 2003, that the war is starting again. This is a new battle plan. The battle plan to end the war in Iraq and finally establish some sort of stability."

The New York Times (2/20, Santora, 1.16M) reports the attack "appeared to be part of a renewed drive by insurgents in recent weeks as more American and Iraqi troops flood the streets of Baghdad and thousands of marines head to western Anbar Province to try to stem the violence. Hundreds of Iraqis have died in a recent wave of car bombings in Baghdad and elsewhere." Insurgents "have been able to shoot down more helicopters through coordinated assaults, captured documents suggest, and American and Iraqi military officials say they are concerned that militants are moving to areas where the American troop presence remains thin."

The Washington Post (2/20, A8, Londono, Ricks, 690K) also says "the coordinated frontal attack -- which occurred as hundreds of American soldiers are being deployed to small, similarly vulnerable inner-city posts -- appeared to be a shift toward more aggressive tactics. … Sunni insurgent attacks on U.S. forces have become increasingly sophisticated and effective in recent months." The Los Angeles Times (2/20, Daragahi, 850K) runs a similar report.

The Chicago Tribune (2/20, Janega, 617K) also recounts that "in a sign of the sectarian tensions threatening the country, a Sunni woman appeared on television to say she had been raped by Iraqi national police, most of whom are Shiite. The charge was rejected by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, who called it 'made-up noise.'" Sunnis "have criticized the new security plan, saying they are being unfairly targeted. The Sunni woman's allegation that she was assaulted by three members of the national police fed Sunni apprehensions about 'Impose the Law.'"

Car Bombs Kill At Least 11 In Baghdad. The AP (2/20) reports, "Car bombs killed at least 11 people in Baghdad on Tuesday as militants show increasing defiance to a major security operation in the capital. ... More than 100 people have been killed in the Baghdad area since Sunday, when twin blasts in a market claimed 62 lives. U.S. and Iraqi forces last week launched a massive effort of house-to-house searches and checkpoints around Baghdad to try to cripple extremist factions."

Decline In Number Of Insurgent Attacks Seen As Temporary "Lull." USA Today (2/20, 11A, Dorell, Jervis, 2.27M) reports "the number of extremist attacks in Baghdad has declined over the past two weeks since a new security plan took hold, although the relative lull may be short-lived, the US military said Monday. Bombings on Monday that killed more than 40 Iraqis demonstrated that extremists were still staging attacks aimed at grabbing headlines," but "the overall number of attacks on US and Iraqi troops has fallen, said Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a spokesman for the US military." Gen. David Petraeus, "the new commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, warned last month that it could be late summer before it becomes clear whether the new security plan is working." Mohamed Al Daiyni, "a member of Al Tawafek, the largest Sunni coalition in the parliament, said violence was down because 'all the fighting groups are hiding.' 'If there is any lull in violence, it will be temporary,' Al Daiyni said."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/20, Peterson, 59K) reports "Iraqi and American forces are meeting mixed results – that often vary street by street and day by day – as they struggle to regain control of Baghdad. … Some neighborhoods are seeing tentative early progress in this city of 6 million, where a surge of Iraqi and American forces started last week." The Monitor adds, "Shiite areas controlled by the Mahdi Army, loyal to anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, are meant to be a particular US target because of links with death squads that have been killing dozens of Sunnis a day. Maliki's government, which relies on Mr. Sadr's supporter to rule, is reported to have pushed for Sunni areas to be cleaned up first. Sunni leaders have cried foul."

Marines In Anbar Province Cope With "Daily Grind." The Los Angeles Times (2/20, Perry, 850K) reports, "Rather than charge into battle, most Marines in Iraq's western desert are engaged in nation building on a piecemeal basis, the kind of venture…Bush once publicly disdained. Trained to win quick, decisive victories with firepower and bravery, Marines in Al Anbar province instead face a daily grind. Most never fire their weapons. ... What has changed is not the violence, but the U.S. expectations. ... Now the watchword is that all gains are small and that prevailing here could take years. ... A counterinsurgency operation such as the one in Al Anbar is slow, and gauging its progress is like trying to measure a child's growth on a daily basis, Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer said. Even when there are hopeful signs, they are contradicted by disappointing ones."

Democrats Readying Draft Of War Reauthorization. CNN's Situation Room (2/19) reported, "Democratic sources say the Senate Foreign Relations and Armed Services chairmen are now writing a resolution reauthorizing the war, but limiting US troops in Iraq to a support, not a combat role." In a phone interview from Iraq, Senator Jon Kyl told CNN that limiting the mission there "would be a huge mistake when we are just beginning to execute a new strategy."

On Fox News' "Your World With Neil Cavuto" (2/19, Cavuto), Rep. Tom Davis, an opponent of the Iraq troop surge, said the House resolution passed last week "sends a lot of messages. This is a democracy. And, of course, there is a lot of dissent, even within the Pentagon, about this troop surge. That's why some generals were replaced. … I am afraid that the surge is going to produce more Gold Star moms. … The Iraqis have to step to the plate. And one of the things this resolution did, in my opinion, is, it sends a very strong message to the Iraqis. They are going to have to step up to the plate. And they can't rely on Americans to continue to do this."

House GOP Leaders, Conservatives Activists Target Surge Critics. The Politico (2/20, O'Connor, Kraushaar) reports House Republican leaders "and conservative activists are targeting critics of President Bush's plan to send more combat forces into Iraq -- and some GOP lawmakers are on the hit list." Amid a "mounting campaign in Congress to limit Bush's military options, conservatives led by talk show host Hugh Hewitt have created an advocacy group designed to counter the anti-war MoveOn.org. And its first round of targets will be the 17 GOP lawmakers who voted for last week's Democratic resolution in the House opposing the troop increases." The first member in "the sights of the new Victory Caucus is Rep. Ric Keller, R-Fla., whose district includes Orlando." House Republicans are also "hitting Democrats who represent districts Bush won in hopes of preventing a congressional majority that would restrict money for Afghanistan and Iraq. The GOP is flooding those districts with news releases and e-mails warning that Democrats are undermining U.S. troops." Republicans "claim the campaign already has paid off in South Dakota, where the Sioux Falls Argus Leader ran a column over the weekend highlighting how Democratic Rep. Stephanie Herseth is pinched between party leaders and conservative voters in the state."

Fineman Says Republicans "Caved." On MSNBC's "Hardball" (2/19, Matthews), MSNBC political analyst Howard Fineman said congressional Republicans "are throwing away what little credibility they have. They are giving in to…Bush in his effort to prevent the Congress from doing anything. … [If congressional Democrats] can't get this resolution, how are they going to get one to cut off funding for the troops? Because that is much more dangerous politically. One would have thought that this was pretty much of an easy get for almost all members of Congress. But the White House put on the pressure and the Republicans caved, virtually all of them."

Democrats' Possible Strategies Outlined. E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (2/20, A13, 690K), "Two things are now abundantly clear about the future of US policy toward Iraq. First, majorities in both houses of Congress have lost faith in President Bush's approach to the war. Second, the president will do all he can to resist changing his strategy by trying to split his critics into ineffectual factions. Bush's choice is certainly bad for opponents of the war, but it's also bad for American foreign policy. … For now, the war's opponents are focused on three strategies. One would be to cut off funds for the war, but there is currently no majority in either house for this. A second approach, expected to come from Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), would propose restrictions on troop deployments -- for example, forbidding the redeployment of units that have been home for less than a year and imposing substantial training requirements on the troops who are sent. … A third path, offered by Sens. Joseph Biden (D-Del.) and Carl Levin (D-Mich.), would have Congress revisit its original 2002 Iraq resolution to make clear that the war authorized then (against Saddam Hussein and what turned out to be nonexistent weapons of mass destruction) had nothing to do with putting American troops in the midst of a Muslim civil war now." Rep. Chris Van Hollen "has an additional idea: Opponents of the war need to force full consideration of the original Baker-Hamilton proposals."

Vilsack Calls For Taking US Troops "Out Of Harm's Way." In an interview with CNN's Situation Room (2/19, 5:15PM), Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack said, "Capping the number of troops" in Iraq "is simply maintaining the status quo, staying the course." Instead, he said the US needs "a change of course. We need to take our troops out of harm's way and we need to do it now." Calling the situation in Iraq a "civil war," Vilsack said the war "can only be resolved in a political resolution among the Iraqis themselves. And it's time to transfer responsibility to make those decisions to the Iraqis."

House Vote Unlikely To Impact Bush's Iraq Policy. U.S. News and World Report (2/26, Brush, 2.03M) reports, "Congress has been talking about it for weeks, jousting, posturing, and trading partisan jabs. Last week, the Democrats who control the House of Representatives finally got around to actually voting on President Bush's new policy in Iraq. … While it was a resounding vote of no confidence in the president's plan, it was also just the first of many legislative battles as Congress decides how strenuously to exert its constitutional powers to control funding for the war." According to US News, "the president shows no signs of backing away from his insistence on 'victory.' He hopes that the situation improves and that Iraqi forces can gradually take more responsibility." White House advisers "are clinging to the hope that, in the end, most congressional Democrats won't vote to cut off funds for the troops."

Iran's Quds Force Reportedly Close To US Allies In Iraq. Newsweek (2/26, Dickey, Barry, 3.12M) reports, "The Iranian Special Operations unit called the Quds Force has for years been accused, with or without evidence, of assassinations and terrorist attacks as far away as Argentina. But its specialty is different: striking fear in the hearts of generals. Over the past 25 years, the Quds Force has proved ferociously effective at organizing, training and equipping guerrillas to confront the world's most vaunted armies. Quds played a vital role in creating Hizbullah to fight the Israelis in Lebanon. It supported the legendary Ahmed Shah Massoud against the Russians and his Taliban rivals in Afghanistan. Quds helped the Bosnians hold back the Serbian war machine. And now -- it's in Iraq." Quds "appears to be as close to America's Shiite and Kurdish allies as to splinter groups. … The relationship between the Quds Force and figures like Iraqi President Jalal Talabani or Abdul Aziz al-Hakim of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (both of whom have been received in the White House recently) goes back two decades to the days when only Tehran was aiding Saddam Hussein's enemies."

Reaction To Iranian Weapons Allegations Seen As Evidence Of "Credibility Gap." U.S. News and World Report (2/26, Mulrine, Whitelaw, 2.03M) reports, "It should have been a pretty straightforward case: Shiite militias are using Iranian weapons to kill U.S. soldiers in Iraq. On that, the evidence is clear. But when unnamed officials at a hastily convened briefing in Baghdad went a step further, accusing Iranian officials 'at the highest levels' of funneling a particularly deadly form of roadside bomb to the Shiite militias, it raised more questions than it answered. For one thing, while the analysts laid out detailed evidence that the armor-piercing 'explosively formed penetrators,' or EFPs, originated in Iran, they offered nothing to support the allegation of Iranian government involvement. Confusing matters further, several senior U.S. officials-including the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Peter Pace, Gen. William Caldwell, the chief spokesman for U.S. forces in Iraq, and even President Bush-made a point of walking back from the accusation. … In Washington and other capitals, many were left questioning the allegations and wondering aloud what, exactly, the Bush administration was hoping to achieve." US news adds, "The Bush White House ran smack into a growing credibility gap of its own making -- a hangover from its handling of intelligence regarding Iraq's alleged weapons of mass destruction before the invasion."

State Department, Pentagon Reach Deal On Iraq Reconstruction Jobs. The New York Times (2/20, A6, Shanker, 1.16M) reports the Pentagon and State Department "have worked out a deal to send a small number of military personnel and Defense Department civilians to Iraq for several months until Foreign Service officers and State Department contract workers with specialized skills can fill those jobs," senior officials said Monday. The discussions over filling the posts "had exposed tensions between the military and civilian agencies over how to share responsibilities in carrying out President Bush's new strategy for stabilizing and rebuilding Iraq -- in particular, how to fill hazardous positions in new provincial reconstruction teams." The State Department had asked the Pentagon "to come up with military personnel or civilians to fill about one-third of the 350 new State Department jobs in Iraq. While the numbers involved are relatively small, the debate raised larger issues of whether the government was properly organized to carry out a long-term occupation of a country like Iraq."

Iraq Refugee Plan Faces Bipartisan Opposition. The Washington Times (2/20, Hudson, 88K) reports the State Department's plan to admit 7,000 Iraqi refugees into the United States this year "is meeting with some resistance on both sides of the political aisle." Rep. Tom Tancredo (R) "says the policy flies in the face of US law" and Ohio Gov. Ted Strickland (D) "says refugees are not welcome in his state." However, the program "has the support of key Democrats in the Senate, including Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and Sen. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, who say the United States should contribute $30 million, half the cost of refugee-resettlement worldwide." Sen. Kennedy argues that the US has "a moral responsibility to do all that we can" since "our invasion of Iraq led to this crisis, and we have a clear responsibility to do more to ease it."

Many Iraqis Opposed To Allowing Foreign Involvement In Oil Industry. The Wall Street Journal (2/20, Cummins, Hafidh, Jordan, 2.04M) reports, "Foreign technology and capital are seen as vital to restoring Iraq's crumbling oil industry. But as a draft petroleum law inches its way toward the Iraqi parliament, fresh opposition to the legislation is emerging, underscoring the difficulty that may still lie ahead for any move to invite in international oil companies." US officials and "petroleum experts have been advising Iraqi politicians almost from the start of the American occupation nearly four years ago about how to build a legal framework that would enable foreign oil-field development. International majors have been reluctant to venture into the country until violence subsides and before politicians endorse a law spelling out legal rights and financial terms for foreign firms." The Journal adds, "In its current form, the legislation envisions the re-creation of an Iraqi state oil company, and it gives broad latitude to officials from the country's various regions to encourage foreign investment and development. … The legislation still faces significant political hurdles. Earlier this month, an influential union of oil workers in the country's south said it will oppose the legislation." Also, "the nationalization of the Iraqi oil industry in the 1970s under Saddam Hussein remains a point of pride for many Iraqis, and opposition still runs deep to any hint of foreign interference. Also, opposition has emerged from prominent former Iraqi oil officials, who have recently fled the country's chaos but continue to hold some sway in Baghdad's oil bureaucracy."

North Africa Could Be New War On Terror Front. The New York Times (2/20, Smith, 1.16M) reports from Tunisia, "The plan, hatched for months in the arid mountains of North Africa, was to attack the American and British Embassies here. It ended in a series of gun battles in January that killed a dozen militants and left two Tunisian security officers dead. ... Counterterrorism officials on three continents say the trouble in Tunisia is the latest evidence that a brutal Algerian group with a long history of violence is acting on its promise: to organize extremists across North Africa and join the remnants of Al Qaeda into a new international force for jihad." Experts "say North Africa, with its vast, thinly governed stretches of mountain and desert, could become an Afghanistan-like terrorist hinterland within easy striking distance of Europe. That is all the more alarming because of the deep roots that North African communities have in Europe and the ease of travel between the regions. For the United States, the threat is also real because of visa-free travel to American cities for most European passport holders. The violent Algerian group the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, known by its French initials G.S.P.C., has for several years been under American watch."

Moroccans Lured To Join Insurgency In Iraq. The Washington Post (2/20, A1, Whitlock, 690K) reports from Morocco, "About two dozen men from Tetouan and nearby towns in the Rif Mountains have traveled to Iraq in the past 18 months to volunteer as fighters or suicide bombers, according to local residents and officials. Moroccan authorities said the men were recruited by international terrorist networks affiliated with al-Qaeda that have deepened their roots in North Africa since the invasion of Iraq four years ago. ... Foreign fighters in Iraq account for only a small percentage of the combatants attacking U.S. troops and their Iraqi allies. U.S. military officials and independent analysts peg the number at no more than a few thousand. But as the war drags on, it continues to serve as a powerful rallying tool for radical Islamic networks around the world that have developed recruiting pipelines as far afield as Europe and Southeast Asia. Moroccan authorities said they have identified more than 50 volunteers who have gone to Iraq since 2003, and many more are believed to have made the journey undetected. ... Morocco and its neighbors are finding it increasingly difficult to suppress the militants. Several networks that used to operate independently in North Africa have put aside their differences, united in part by the ongoing violence in Iraq."

Afghan Forces Retake Western Town. The AP (2/20, Shah) reports, "Afghan security forces supported by NATO troops on Tuesday retook a town in western Afghanistan that briefly had fallen to Taliban militants, an official said. About 200 Afghan police and soldiers moved into the remote town of Bakwa in Farah province at 5 a.m. and faced no resistance, said Gov. Muhajuddin Baluch. ... It was the second time this month that the government has lost control of a district in the region." The AP adds, "Meanwhile, a U.S. soldier was killed during combat operations on Monday in the Naray area of eastern Kunar province, the U.S. military said in a brief statement." AFP (2/20) reports the retaking of the town but adds that Taliban members "have been holding the southern town of Musa Qala -- about 150 kilometres (93 miles) east of Bakwa -- for more than two weeks. The authorities say they are waiting for the right time to retake the area. ... Afghanistan's government is unable to establish a presence and maintain authority in vast swathes of the volatile country."

Before that development, the New York Times (2/20, Wafa, 1.16M) reported, "Taliban insurgents seized control of a district in southwestern Afghanistan on Monday as the Afghan police abandoned their post and fled, officials said." The district "is the second to fall into Taliban hands this month, and its capture underlines the precarious hold of the government and NATO troops in the remote districts of southern Afghanistan."

British Troops Destroy Taliban Stronghold. USA Today (2/20, 8A, 2.27M) reports, "British NATO forces destroyed a 'major Taliban headquarters and stronghold' in Garmsir, in Afghanistan's Helmand province, Lt. Col. Rory Bruce said Monday at the British task force headquarters in London." He said "the troops killed a 'significant number' of Taliban fighters and disrupted their command system."

NATO Urged To Focus On Defeating Taliban, Not Combating Narcotics Trade. Vanda Felbab-Brown, a research fellow at the Brookings Institution, writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/20, A16, 2.04M), "As NATO braces for a spring Taliban offensive in Afghanistan, many in the Bush administration, the Congress and the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime are calling for it to take on a prominent role in combating the narcotics trade. Although this task is meant to help Afghanistan repress the worrisome, if predictable, expansion of its opium economy, it will greatly hamper NATO's effectiveness." NATO's "crucial role is to establish security throughout the country -- and not to dilute its focus in eradication and interdiction missions that are presently bound to fail." NATO "does have an important role to play in counternarcotics -- namely, to defeat the insurgency."

Al Qaeda Reportedly Regrouping In Pakistan. NBC Nightly News (2/19, story 3, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There are new anxieties this evening about what is said to be Al Qaeda's new strength in a remote part of the world where the US has been fighting them since shortly after 9/11. ... Andrea Mitchell reports tonight on the resurgence of Al Qaeda in bin Laden territory." NBC (Mitchell) added, "More than five years after 9/11, US officials say Al Qaeda leaders are back, out of their caves, re-establishing command and control. Setting up small training camps in northwest Pakistan, only half a mile from the Afghan border, unleashing a new generation of terrorists." Maj. Gen. Azhar Ali Shah, Pakistan Army: "It is physically not possible to 100% seal the [Afghan] border." Mitchell: "Another reason for Al Qaeda's resurgence, experts say, the war in Iraq." Prof. Bruce Hoffman, terrorism expert: "They've seen in our entanglement in Iraq, an opportunity, an enormous opportunity to resuscitate themselves, to continue to marshal their forces."

The CBS Evening News (2/19, story 2, 2:05, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Another US soldier was killed today in Afghanistan. President Bush is calling for a NATO troop buildup there for a spring offensive against Al Qaeda. But the terror network apparently is building up its forces as well." CBS (Axelrod) added, "Western intelligence sources say these pictures show Al Qaeda training camps operating in remote areas of Pakistan near the Afghanistan border. After years spent running for their lives, the highest ranking Al Qaeda leaders are now beginning to reassert their command-and-control structure at camps where jihadists are trained and the next large-scale attacks on the West are planned." CBS consultant John Brennan: "Zawahiri is probably having operational engagement with a number of his lieutenants and commanders, so it is a worrisome development." ... Axelrod: "This reemergence of an Al Qaeda threat in the borderlands has prompted President Bush to act. Some 3,200 US troops who are set to come home from Afghanistan have now been ordered to stay."

Pakistan's Ambassador in Washington, Mahmud Durrani, told CNN's Situation Room (2/19, 7:02PM) that "there may be an odd place" where they are hiding out, but "to say they have reestablished themselves and there are a lot of compounds and they're rejuvenated, that is incorrect." The ambassador also "rejects any notion of American forces crossing into Pakistan to go after Al Qaeda, even though they have targeted forces there from the air."

Hoffman Argues For Multipronged Strategy Against Al Qaeda. In the Los Angeles Times (2/20, 850K), op-ed contributor and Georgetown professor Bruce Hoffman writes, "Al Qaeda's stunning resurrection, before the very eyes of American military forces stationed across the border in southern Afghanistan, begs the question of how the most powerful country in the world can launch a six-year, no-holds-barred, global war on terrorism — at great cost to its pocketbook and international standing — only to find the main target of these Herculean efforts still alive and kicking. In retrospect, it appears that Iraq blinded us to the possibility of an Al Qaeda renaissance. ... Pakistan is both the problem and the solution to the most salient terrorist threat still directed against us. Al Qaeda and its Taliban allies could not function without the passive connivance of Pakistani authorities." Hoffman recommends three tactics to defeat Al Qaeda: "Defeating Al Qaeda requires, foremost, that our assessments and analyses be anchored firmly to sound, empirical judgment and not blinded by conjecture and wishful thinking. Second, we need to refocus our attention and efforts on Pakistan and Afghanistan, where, in the months after 9/11, Al Qaeda was indeed on the run. Third, Al Qaeda cannot be defeated by military means alone because it relies on propaganda and radicalization."

Syrian Opposition Leader Says Assad Regime Complicit In Terrorism. Farid N. Ghadry, president of the Reform Party of Syria, writes in today's Washington Times (2/20, 88K), "The Syrian regime is just as complicit as Iran in moving forward hostile activities specifically designed to kill Americans. The evidence is there and widely acknowledged by those in the know, but US political and military leadership have proved hesitant to publicly pursue a tandem case against both Iran and Syria, despite the very prominent linkages that exist between the two in fermenting a wide spectrum of terror operations targeting US forces. … Regional intelligence services and inside sources from within Sunni officer corps opposed to the Assad regime have identified major foreign-fighter training camps in northern Syria and just outside Damascus overseen by Syrian Military Intelligence and run by former Iraqi Ba'athi Generals and senior Saddam Fedayeen commanders. One major foreign fighter camp exists in the Latakia province in northern Syria, a mountainous area replete with Syrian Military Intelligence facilities and wide swaths of ostensibly government property closed to the public." Ghadry adds, "The al Qaeda connection is not that far removed. Arab papers report that the recent movement of large numbers of al Qaeda in Iraq fighters from Syria into Palestinian refugee camps in northern Lebanon and Beirut are sounding alarm bells that the Syrian security services are preparing to use these heavily armed and visibly well-funded cells to launch attacks against the anti-Syrian democratic government of Lebanon."

NYTimes Says Army "Lowering Its Expectations" To Fill Ranks. The New York Times (2/20, 1.16M) editorializes, "To keep filling the ranks, the Army has had to keep lowering its expectations. ... So the Army has found itself recklessly expanding the granting of 'moral waivers,' which let people convicted of serious misdemeanors and even some felonies enlist in its ranks. ... Those who have committed more serious crimes, especially those involving weapons, vehicular homicide or sexual abuse, should generally be denied moral waivers. And those who do qualify for waivers should be monitored, counseled and carefully supervised. The fastest way to drop the rate of moral waivers would be for the Army to rebuild its recently tarnished reputation among less problematic young Americans. That will require an end to involuntarily extended tours of duty and accelerated, multiple redeployments into combat."

Dismissal Of US Attorneys Sparks Continuing Commentary. The Hartford Courant (2/19) editorializes, "A decision by Justice Department officials to fire federal prosecutor Carol C. Lam in San Diego for unspecified performance-related reasons is getting curiouser and curiouser." The Courant continues, "Ms. Lam is among a dozen U.S. attorneys around the country who have been told to resign. Justice Department officials say the firings are for just cause; in Ms. Lam's case at least, the decision appears to be just political. … Ms. Lam headed the investigation into former U.S. Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, a prominent San Diego Republican who pleaded guilty last year to tax evasion, conspiring to commit bribery, wire fraud and mail fraud. Prosecutors say Mr. Cunningham accepted at least $2.5 million in bribes from defense contractors." The Courant adds, "On Tuesday, a San Diego grand jury returned an 11-count indictment against Kyle 'Dusty' Foggo, the CIA's executive director from November 2004 to May of last year. Mr. Foggo is accused of steering business to his friend, Brent R. Wilkes, a California businessman and top Republican fundraiser. … The Cunningham and Foggo probes are pieces of a larger, ongoing investigation into the way lawmakers directed federal contracts toward friends and campaign supporters. … Both inquiries were overseen by Ms. Lam." The Courant concludes, "Her firing appears to have less to do with performance-related deficiency than it does political retaliation by high-level Justice Department officials who may also be attempting to derail an investigation that's potentially embarrassing to other members of Congress and the White House."

In a column for the Seattle Post-Intelligencer (2/20), University of Richmond law professor Carl Tobias writes, "The controversy involving December's forced resignation of U.S. Attorneys, who are the chief prosecutors for six federal districts in the West, has heated up and focused on John McKay, who recently stepped down as the U.S. Attorney for the Western District of Washington." Tobias continues, "On Feb. 6, the Senate Judiciary Committee held a hearing to analyze whether the Department of Justice was sacrificing prosecutorial independence by politicizing U.S. Attorney firing and hiring. Because it is unclear why McKay was forced out, Congress must continue evaluating his departure, and, if he resigned for questionable reasons, it should address them. … The hearing produced certain information, yet it provoked new questions. Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty testified that the resignations were for non-specific 'performance-related' reasons. This prompted an immediate, sharp response from Western District of Washington Chief Judge Robert Lasnik and his colleagues: 'We unanimously agreed that (John McKay) was an absolutely superb U.S. Attorney (and for DOJ) to suggest otherwise is unfair.' He elaborated that local prosecutors and sheriffs and the FBI 'never had the kind of service' in terms of 'cooperation and aggressive handling of cases that they had under McKay's leadership.'" Tobias adds, "The expeditious, thorough, informed response by the Western District judges is extraordinary. Federal judges rarely and with extreme caution publicly address Department of Justice interaction with U.S. Attorneys' offices because of separation of powers concerns and mutual respect. However, this response's unusual nature and its thorough, expert character suggest how deeply the judges feel about McKay's abilities. Moreover, district judges know much about U.S. attorneys' competence, because that office appears daily in the judges' courtrooms. … Lawmakers should continue investigating why John McKay resigned and, if he departed for inappropriate, politically animated reasons, initiate action. … Legislators who agree with those notions must cooperate with others to ascertain why McKay left and adopt any correctives that are required."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Emails Shed Light On Mercury Options Backdating Scheme. The Wall Street Journal (2/19, A4, Boslet, Maremont) reports, "As part of a years-long scheme to backdate stock options at Mercury Interactive Corp., former executives allegedly altered documents, repeatedly changed the dates of some option grants, and sent each other emails discussing the improper practice, according to a court document that has been at the center of a battle over confidentiality in the case." The Journal continues, "In one 2000 email quoted in the court document, filed in state court in California by shareholders suing the former executives, a Mercury finance executive wrote to another official about using 'magic backdating ink' to manipulate the date of an options grant. Another employee whose grant allegedly was backdated was told in an email that 'the stock price drop made us change the grant date' and 'you will be happier with the new price.'" The Journal notes, "In another incident described in the filing, insiders allegedly covered up fax headers on documents to disguise the fact that an options grant was approved by directors long after its purported date. … The court document appears to provide some of the most vivid evidence yet of how options backdating took root and flourished inside a company, depicting a culture of lax controls in which top executives openly discussed how to manipulate the dates of options to make them more favorable to themselves and other insiders. … Mercury was one of the first companies ensnared in the options-backdating scandal, and it previously has admitted that its top executives improperly altered the dates of more than 50 option grants between 1996 and 2002. The Mountain View, Calif., software company, which was acquired by Hewlett-Packard Co. late last year for $4.5 billion, previously restated years of financial results, reducing its pretax income by $566.7 million from 1992 to 2004 -- nearly all because of options-related problems. Most of its top executives from the period in question have left the firm. … Mercury is one of about 140 companies being investigated in a broad federal probe of options backdating. Last week, a former chief executive of Take-Two Interactive Software Inc. and a former general counsel of Monster Worldwide Inc. separately pleaded guilty to options-related criminal charges in New York."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Lawyers In Libby Trial To Make Final Arguments Today. The New York Times (2/19, Lewis, 1.16M) reports, "As lawyers for I. Lewis Libby Jr. make their final argument to the jury on Tuesday, they face the daunting task of raising sufficient doubts about the government's assertion that Mr. Libby lied to a grand jury and federal investigators." Prosecutors "have built a detailed case to support their charges, presenting several plausible witnesses whose testimony conflicts with Mr. Libby's sworn statements. Still, the prosecution has the burden of convincing the jurors of Mr. Libby's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, an imprecise concept that makes the outcome of most complicated criminal trials unpredictable. Peter Zeidenberg, a Justice Department prosecutor, is to begin the summation case for the government. He will be followed by Theodore V. Wells Jr., Mr. Libby's chief defense lawyer." The Times adds, "The stakes are obvious for Mr. Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, who faces five felony charges for allegedly lying during an investigation of who leaked to reporters the name of a C.I.A. operative, Valerie Wilson. But there are significant stakes as well for Mr. Wells and Mr. Fitzgerald.

Libby Evidence Said To Show Cheney's "Free Rein" In Bush's First Term. Under the headline "Trial Spotlights Cheney's Power as an Infighter," the New York Times (2/20, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports, "A picture taking shape from hours of testimony and reams of documents in the trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. shatters any notion that the White House was operating as a model of cohesion throughout President Bush's first term," and "a close reading of the testimony and evidence in the case" reveals "a portrait of a vice president with free rein to operate inside the White House as he saw fit in order to debunk the charges of a critic of the war in Iraq. The evidence in the trial shows Vice President Dick Cheney and Mr. Libby…countermanding and even occasionally misleading colleagues at the highest levels of Mr. Bush's inner circle as the two pursued their own goal of clearing the vice president's name in connection with flawed intelligence used in the case for war." The Times notes, "While others on the White House team were primarily concerned about Mr. Bush, the evidence has shown that Mr. Libby had a more acute concern about his own boss."

White House Officials Tied To Secretive GOP Club Led By Hohlt. Newsweek's Michael Isikoff (2/26) reports, "Testifying last week in the trial of…I. Lewis (Scooter) Libby," columnist Robert Novak "said he'd discussed " Valerie Plame's CIA status "with a lobbyist named Richard Hohlt. … Indeed, Hohlt is such a good source that after Novak finished his column naming Plame, he testified, he did something most journalists rarely do: he gave the lobbyist an advance copy of his column. What Novak didn't tell the jury is what the lobbyist then did with it: Hohlt confirmed to NEWSWEEK that he faxed the forthcoming column to their mutual friend Karl Rove (one of Novak's sources for the Plame leak), thereby giving the White House a heads up on the bombshell to come." Newsweek adds, "Hohlt's more significant role may be his leadership of a secretive social group of GOP heavy hitters and, occasionally, White House officials, who convene to smoke cigars and mull over politics. The group's name: the Off The Record Club. … Rove and White House chief of staff Josh Bolten 'have both attended these meetings on occasion,' says a White House spokesperson."

Possible Defense Strategies For Fumo Examined. The Philadelphia Daily News (2/19, Hinkelman) reports, "When the Feds delivered a hefty 267-page, 139-count indictment against state Sen. Vince Fumo on Feb. 6, they were trying to show they've got the goods on him, a former federal prosecutor said. … But is it really a 'slam dunk' case against the Prince of Philadelphia, who has pleaded not guilty to the charges? … Or are there strategies that Fumo can use to beat the case? … Yes, say defense lawyers and legal experts. This case is winnable for Fumo." The News continues, "Fumo is charged with defrauding the state Senate and a South Philly charity of more than $2 million by using Senate staffers and charity workers for his personal and political benefit. … His lawyer, Richard A. Sprague, calls the indictment malicious and politically motivated, and says the feds didn't appreciate or understand how Fumo's office operates. … Sprague said he didn't want to tip his hand about how he'll defend Fumo, so the Daily News contacted some prominent defense attorneys to see how they might defend the embattled pol. … Here are some strategies they suggested." The News adds, "Delay, delay, delay … A prominent criminal defense attorney and former federal prosecutor said he would do everything he could to keep the case from going to trial. … 'I'd use every legal maneuver I could,' said Carmen C. Nasuti. 'I'd try to get the indictment dismissed, I'd try to get evidence excluded and I'd file as many pretrial motions as I could.' … Nasuti said once the trial starts and evidence is admitted, there are 'little things' that can't be readily explained or easily defended." The News notes, "The O.J. Simpson defense … The feds investigated Fumo for four years, and Sprague has said prosecutors want to 'destroy' Fumo. … Some lawyers said this could be the linchpin of a strategy where the defense tries to paint prosecutors as overzealous or having misplaced enforcement priorities." The News continues, "Fumo as his own best defense … Many white-collar defense lawyers don't want their high-profile clients to testify because it's high-risk and could undermine previous gains they've made with jurors. … But Fumo's situation is different, some say. … 'My own experience is, if you have an engaging client and you know he has a plausible explanation for conduct the government claims is illegal, then put him on the stand," said Jack Meyerson, a former federal prosecutor who prosecuted Fumo in 1980 on fraud charges."

High Court To Revisit Sentencing Guidelines. The New York Times (2/20, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports, "The Supreme Court returns on Tuesday from a monthlong recess to face a daunting and urgent task: explaining what it meant two years ago when it ruled that the federal sentencing guidelines were to be treated as 'advisory,' no longer binding on federal judges." The decision that "dropped that bombshell on the criminal justice system, United States v. Booker, has not penetrated public consciousness in the way that, say, the Miranda decision on the right against self-incrimination did a generation ago. But in its own way, it has been no less revolutionary, creating turmoil in criminal sentencing." The justices "will hear arguments on Tuesday morning in two cases that will provide the latest chapter, although almost certainly not the final one, in the court's continuing and, to many, profoundly unsettling reappraisal of the roles of juries and judges in criminal sentencing."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/20, Richey, 59K) reports, "On one side are those who argue that sentencing judges should be free to adopt or reject the guidelines on an equal footing with several other factors Congress has identified as important sentencing objectives. The key, they say, is that judges rely on reasoned judgment rather than a mechanical guidelines formula to mete out punishments." On the other side are "those who say the guidelines must be afforded an exalted status among sentencing factors since they represent the collective wisdom of the US Sentencing Commission created by Congress. Five of the nation's 12 appeals courts have embraced the former approach, while seven have embraced the latter approach." The Monitor adds, "Specifically, the question is whether appeals court judges should award a presumption of reasonableness to any sentence imposed within the range of the guidelines."

DeVecchio Case Investigator Resigns Over Relationship With Mob Witness. The New York Post (2/19, Celona, 631K) reported, "An investigator for the Brooklyn DA's Office has been forced to resign amid allegations she fell for a jailed mobster -- and hatched a plan to bear his love child, The Post has learned. The 37-year-old prober had been assigned to protect the 'mob associate' while he was being held in secret hotel rooms for interviews about the bombshell corruption case involving ex-FBI agent Lindley DeVecchio, sources said. The sources identified her as Maria Biagini, a 15-year veteran of DA Charles Hynes' office who left her job last week." The Post noted, "She allegedly loosened her prisoner's strings and allowed him to contact his family and take money from relatives. He used the cash to throw dinner parties, attended by his family and the investigator -- all in violation of DA policies, the sources said. After the prisoner was returned to jail, the investigator allegedly wrote him several letters and visited -- which led authorities to uncover their relationship."

FBI Subpoenas Memphis Utility's Records In City Council Probe. WMC-TV Memphis (2/19) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story that "federal agents have subpoenaed records from Memphis Light, Gas and Water concerning City Councilman Edmund Ford's previous utility payments. Sources tell Action News 5 the FBI has interviewed a number of City leaders during the past week and a statement from the public utility confirms that officials there have responded to a subpoena for records. Their interest…revolves around embattled Councilman Edmund Ford, recently indicted on charges he took bribes in exchange for votes." WHBQ-TV Memphis (2/19) noted MLGW counsel Odell Horton "said the company had no idea the FBI agents were coming, but said MLGW cooperated completely. … MLGW said it expects to forward some paperwork to the FBI over the next couple of days. It's not clear if the agents will be returning to MLGW." Meanwhile, City Councilwoman Carol Chumney "said she didn't know about the FBI visit, but she plans to make inquiries into what happened and why she wasn't informed."

The Memphis Commercial Appeal (2/20, Aaronson, 163K) reports Ford "hasn't been paying his power bills -- and federal authorities want to know why." Horton "confirmed that money is owed on the accounts but would not say how much. He refused to disclose the property addresses to which the utility accounts were assigned." The Commercial Appeal notes, "Money has been at the root of the council member's recent legal problems. On Dec. 19, 2006, federal prosecutors indicted Councilmen Ford and Rickey Peete on bribery and extortion charges following an FBI sting starring lobbyist Joe Cooper."

FBI Child Abduction Teams Provide Crucial Support To Local Police. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (2/19, Patrick, 297K) reported Special Agent Dirk Tarpley "is a member of the bureau's 48-member Child Abduction Rapid Deployment Team, a year-old unit designed to rush experienced help to local police dealing with a suspected abduction. Neither Tarpley nor other investigators interviewed for this report would comment on the case against Michael J. Devlin, who has been charged with kidnapping Ben Ownby and Shawn Hornbeck, or the specifics of the investigation. But they are eager to talk about what their new setup offers, saying they hope it causes local authorities to call them more quickly and more often." On the Devlin case, Franklin County Sheriff Gary Toelke "worked closely with the team. 'I couldn't ask for better help than what we got,' Toelke said. 'If this was a member of my own family, I'd want them investigating.'" The Post-Dispatch notes St. Louis SAC Roland Corvington said that "before the formation of the team, each FBI office relied on its own expertise," but "now, specialists arrive in person within hours, drawn from across the region. … Contrary to the FBI's common portrayal on TV, Tarpley said, agents don't come in and take over. 'We're just there to assist,' he emphasized."

Appellate Ruling Could Make Jefferson Conviction More Difficult. The Washington Post (2/20, A11, Birnbaum, 690K) reports the US Court of Appeals for the DC Circuit "has reversed the conviction of a former District police detective in a case that experts believe might make it tougher for the feds to prosecute Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.)." The court voted "7 to 5 on Feb. 9 to overturn the 2002 conviction of Nelson Valdes on three counts of receiving illegal gratuities. Prosecutors said he passed along information from restricted law enforcement databases to an FBI informant who paid him $450." The court ruled "that the gratuities law did not apply to Valdes's conduct -- his use of the databases was not 'an official act' because it did not spur a police investigation." The "same issue hovers around Jefferson," who is "under investigation for allegedly taking cash -- $90,000 of which was famously found in his freezer -- in exchange for using his congressional clout to arrange business deals. Two businessmen have pleaded guilty to giving Jefferson money to promote a company marketing new technology in Africa. But was that promotion an 'official act?'"

Maryland Shopping Center Destroyed After Police Standoff. The Washington Post (2/20, B1, Rucker, Wan) reports, "A gunman entered a liquor store in Frederick yesterday, shot at police, locked himself in the store during a 30-minute standoff and ignited a fire that engulfed and gutted a two-story shopping plaza along one of the Western Maryland city's major commercial corridors, police said." The Post continues, "James Douglas, 29, of Frederick walked into Jim's Liquors at Antietam Village Center about 12:30 p.m., showed the owner a handgun and told him, 'Get out,' Frederick Police Lt. Thomas Chase said. Police said the store's owner, whose name they would not release, called Douglas a frequent customer and knew him by a nickname, 'Menace.' … Nobody else was in the store, Chase said, and the owner left to call police. When two officers pulled up, Douglas fired at least one shot at them through the store's glass door. Police then surrounded the shopping plaza and ordered nearby businesses to lock their doors and windows." The Post adds, "Authorities had not located Douglas last night, and police said it is likely that he died in the fire. Nobody else was injured, Chase said. He added that a search of the liquor store will begin this morning. … Douglas apparently lit boxes of liquor to ignite the blaze, which spread quickly and destroyed all 14 stores in the center, Chase said."

Family Struggles To Understand Son's Role In Utah Rampage. The New York Times (2/20, Stolz) reports from Salt Lake City, "At 1 a.m. last Tuesday, the parents of Sulejman Talovic called the police to report him missing. After watching television news coverage, they feared he might be among those dead or wounded in a shooting rampage at a mall here. One hour later, with the arrival of detectives, they discovered the shocking truth, that their son, 18, was the gunman." The Times continues, "In six minutes on the night of Feb. 12, Mr. Talovic shot nine customers at the Trolley Square mall, killing five and seriously injuring four others. The attack ended when the police shot and killed Mr. Talovic after he refused to surrender his 12-gauge shotgun. … Mr. Talovic's motive remains a mystery, investigators say." The Times adds, "In the week of grief and confusion since the shooting, the Talovic family has been struggling to unearth some explanations. Their reflections, inadequate as they may seem, revolve around a handful of formative experiences: war in his native Bosnia, rejection at school and difficulty in assimilating in the United States, they said Sunday in the living room of his aunt's tidy apartment. … If the public has come to see Mr. Talovic as a deranged killer, the family knew him as a shy and generous boy. … The gunman's aunt, Ajka Omerovic, and his father, who was visibly exhausted, spoke to a reporter just hours after Mr. Talovic's body was cleansed in an Islamic ritual in preparation for its burial in Tuzla, Bosnia, expected later this month, and after days of funerals for shooting victims across the Salt Lake Valley." The Times notes, "The Talovics had no information on how Sulejman had obtained his weapons and ammunition. The police could not be reached to comment on a report in The Salt Lake Tribune that the shotgun had been bought legally at a sporting goods store."

Panel Probes Florida Execution Techniques. The New York Times (2/20, Waddell, Goodnough) reports from Tampa, FL, "A member of Florida's execution team told a panel studying lethal injection protocols on Monday that intravenous lines had been placed properly in the arms of a condemned inmate who took 34 minutes, twice as long as normal, to die." The Times continues, "The man, who testified by phone and whose voice was electronically altered to shield his identity, said he had medical qualifications but would not elaborate. He added that in any event he did not consider the execution a medical procedure. … 'Absolutely nothing is remotely connected with medicine,' the man told the panel, which former Gov. Jeb Bush appointed in December to study whether Florida's lethal injection system could be improved. 'From that point on, the condemned inmate will not leave the chamber alive. It is done as quickly as possible. It is done as humanely as can be done under the circumstances.'" The Times adds, "The man, who identified himself only as 'medically qualified,' was the second member of Florida's execution team to address the panel this month. … On Feb. 9, the lead executioner in the case of Angel Diaz, who took 34 minutes to die, told the panel, 'I have no medical training or qualifications.' … Some witnesses to the execution have said that Mr. Diaz, who was put to death on Dec. 13, gasped and appeared to grimace in pain as the procedure stalled. But state corrections officials have told the panel that he did not voice discomfort or appear to be in pain. … A preliminary medical examiner's report suggested that intravenous needles placed in Mr. Diaz's right and left arms plunged through his veins into tissue, preventing the drugs from quickly entering his bloodstream. An autopsy found a 12-inch chemical burn on Mr. Diaz's right arm and an 11-inch burn on his left." The Times notes, "Mr. Bush halted executions in Florida on Dec. 16, when the preliminary autopsy results came out, and appointed the panel to study lethal injection protocols. The panel is to submit recommendations to Gov. Charlie Crist by March 1."

WPost Questions Shooting Suspect's Status As PG County Officer. The Washington Post (2/20, A12) editorializes, "Cp. Keith Washington, the Prince George's County police officer who shot two unarmed furniture deliverymen in a dispute at his home three weeks ago, one of them fatally, is on administrative leave pending the outcome of an investigation into the incident. That status notwithstanding, he remains certified as a police officer, meaning he is still authorized to carry a weapon issued by the department. Given what is known about his past, and his repeated problems with anger management, you'd think Prince Georgians might justifiably be nervous about that. … But not Jack Johnson, the Prince George's county executive. Mr. Johnson is an old associate and booster of Cpl. Washington's, having hired him first as his driver and then, two years ago, as his deputy director of homeland security, despite public warnings about Cpl. Washington's checkered past, volcanic temper and tendency to turn routine encounters into tempestuous ones. Now that Cpl. Washington has killed one man and badly injured another, Mr. Johnson says the officer will not be returning to his position in the county department of homeland security. Well, that's comforting. Less comforting, however, is Mr. Johnson's prescription -- that Cpl. Washington resume work as a police officer." The Post concludes, "We hope an ongoing investigation will reveal how a dispute over the delivery of a bed set escalated to the point where Cpl. Washington not only brandished a weapon but felt it necessary to pull the trigger again and again. The facts surrounding those shootings are still uncertain: One man is dead; another hasn't yet talked to police, prosecutors or a grand jury; and Cpl. Washington's own account hasn't been heard in public. So we won't prejudge the outcome of the investigation. But it seems fair to wonder whether Mr. Johnson's cavalier prescription -- to send Cpl. Washington back to active duty as a police officer -- is not premature, at the very least."

Clinton's Brother Faces Renewed Claims In Bankruptcy Case. The Washington Times (2/20, McElhatton, 88K) reports a Federal judge "has reopened a bankruptcy case in which a trustee is demanding that one of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's brothers repay more than $100,000 in purported loans from a carnival outfit whose owner was pardoned by President Clinton." Anthony D. Rodham "received $107,000 in payments from Tennessee-based United Shows of America Inc. before the company went bankrupt in 2002, according to court records." United Shows' owners – "Edgar Gregory Jr. and his wife, Vonna Jo Gregory -- were pardoned by Mr. Clinton in March 2000, despite an objection by the Justice Department. The couple was convicted of bank fraud in 1982 for illegally giving loans to friends. Mr. Gregory died in 2004."

NYTimes Supports Giving FDA Power To Regulate Tobacco Industry. The New York Times (2/19, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "Wall Street analysts may be applauding R. J. Reynolds for introducing a feminized version of its macho Camel cigarette brand, and company executives clearly think they have hit on an innovative marketing strategy. But this new attempt to woo women smokers can only be viewed as another cynical blow to public health. … Bipartisan bills were introduced in both houses of Congress last week to give the Food and Drug Administration needed authority to regulate tobacco products and restrict marketing to young people, consistent with free-speech principles. That may not do much to wean their elders from the habit. But it could stop young women from being entrapped by cynical marketers."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Plaintiffs Often Distanced From SCOTUS Hearings Of Their Cases. The Washington Post (2/20, A3, Barnes) reports from Jacksonville, AL, "Lilly M. Ledbetter says she almost stopped breathing when she heard her name called that day, her eight-year battle over alleged pay discrimination finally reaching the ultimate legal forum, the U.S. Supreme Court. … 'We'll hear argument next in Ledbetter versus Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company,' Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. announced. … The odds are akin to being struck by lightning, having your case plucked from the thousands of others who have vowed, like you, to take the fight all the way to the Supreme Court. And then you find it's not so much about you anymore." The Post continues, "It was the only time that November morning that any of the nine justices spoke Lilly Ledbetter's name. … When she thought back last week on the arguments before the court, she remembered them as not being much about her complaints about Goodyear, or Goodyear's complaints about her. 'Except when my lawyer got up, it [seemed to be] based on changing the law somewhere down the line,' she said. 'That's what it boils down to, I guess. It tends to leave the person out.'" The Post adds, "At a forum late last year, Justices Antonin Scalia and Stephen G. Breyer, usually the court's yin and yang on matters of constitutional interpretation, agreed that that is how it should be. They were asked whether their duty was to provide justice for those who came before the court or simply to interpret the law. … 'The point of the law is to satisfy a human desire for justice,' Breyer explained, but he added: 'You don't necessarily get to that end by simply trying to look for what is the intuitively nicer result in each case.' … Scalia was blunter. 'By the time you get up to an appellate court -- and lawyers ought to learn this -- I don't much care about your particular case,' he said. 'I am not about to produce a better result in your case at the expense of creating terrible results in a hundred other cases.' … A specific Supreme Court decision may contain obvious benefits for the winner -- see George W. Bush, circa 2000. But it can often be an inconclusive way station for the plaintiff, sometimes leading only to additional years of litigation. … Supreme Court cases outlive the individuals who give them a name, and give rise to legal precedents beyond the specific cases. That explains why Ledbetter finds herself supported by a large contingent of women's groups and civil rights organizations that she had never given much thought to – 'The ACLU is supporting me; I don't know how we picked them up' -- and opposed by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the Bush administration."

Voter ID Laws Said To Reduce Minority Turnout. USA Today (2/20, 5A, Wolf, 2.27M) reports voter identification requirements "designed to combat fraud can reduce turnout, particularly among minorities, a new study shows." A study by the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University "shows turnout in 2004 was about 4% lower in states that required voters to sign their name or produce documentation. Hispanic turnout was 10% lower; the difference was about 6% for blacks and Asian-Americans." The study, "presented to the U.S. Election Assistance Commission this month, comes as voter identification requirements are being subjected to increased scrutiny. Two researchers last year told the Election Assistance Commission that they found little evidence of voter fraud at polling places."

Congressional Democrats Call For E-Voting Paper Trails. The Washington Post (2/19, A17, Goldfarb, 690K) reports, "Efforts are intensifying in Congress to pass legislation that would require electronic touch-screen voting machines used in federal elections to provide paper trails that could be checked in the case of a recount. The new momentum is the result of lingering concerns about the machines as the 2008 presidential primaries fast approach, as well as strong support for changes by the new Democratic majority, with Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), chair of the Rules Committee, taking a leading role. … 'Democrats are committed to election-reform legislation that requires all voting machines produce a paper trail,' said Brendan Daly, a spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). The work at the national level echoes moves in many states. Often under pressure from voting-rights groups, 27 states have decided to require paper trails. Last month, Gov. Charlie Crist of Florida went a step further, asking the legislature to pay for replacing touch-screen machines by next year with optical-scan devices, which read paper ballots. Virginia and Maryland are considering similar moves."

New Jersey Civil Union Law Goes Into Effect. The AP (2/20) reports, "Hundreds of gay couples received the same legal protections as married couples early Monday when a law took effect to make New Jersey the third U.S. state to offer civil unions. The civil unions -- which offer the legal benefits but not the title of marriage -- were granted automatically to the hundreds of gay New Jersey couples who have been joined in civil unions or married in other states or nations." New Jersey lawmakers "hastily created civil unions last December, less than two months after a state Supreme Court decision held that gay couples had a right to the same benefits as married couples."

The New York Times (2/20, Barry, 1.16M) says "about a dozen couples visited clerks' offices in New Jersey on Monday, the first day on which people were allowed to submit applications for civil unions, which guarantee all the rights and benefits of heterosexual marriage." New Jersey "is the third state to offer civil unions, following Vermont, which introduced them to rapt national attention in 2000, and Connecticut, which quietly followed suit in 2005."

ANTITRUST:

Sirius To Merge With Rival XM IN $4.57 Billion Deal. The New York Times (2/20, Siklos, Sorkin) reports, "The nation's two satellite radio services, Sirius and XM, announced plans yesterday to merge, a move that would end their costly competition for radio personalities and subscribers but that is also sure to raise antitrust issues." The Times continues, "The two companies, which report close to 14 million subscribers, hoped to revolutionize the radio industry with a bevy of niche channels offering everything from fishing tips to salsa music, and media personalities like Howard Stern and Oprah Winfrey, with few commercials. But neither has yet turned an annual profit and both have had billions in losses. … While there had been speculation of a merger, neither side had engaged in serious negotiations until December, when both companies determined it was in their best interests to complete a deal while the Bush administration was in power, people in the negotiations said." The Times adds, "The companies said yesterday that their $13 billion merger — code-named Project Big Sky by XM — would give consumers a broader range of programming, while eliminating overlapping stations that focus on genres of music. At the same time, they said, they could cut duplicated costs in sales and marketing. … A merger would require antitrust approval from the Justice Department and would have to be considered in the public interest by the Federal Communications Commission."

Bloomberg (2/20, Stern) reports, "Mel Karmazin, chief executive officer of New York-based Sirius, will be CEO of the combined company, and Gary Parsons, chairman of Washington-based XM, will continue as chairman, the companies said today in a statement. … Sirius and XM faced pressure to merge after losing a combined $7 billion to attract subscribers over the past eight years and signing talent including Howard Stern and Oprah Winfrey. The merger will face antitrust scrutiny and must also be approved by the U.S. Federal Communications Commission." Bloomberg adds, "Under the terms of the accord, which the companies describe as a merger of equals, XM investors will receive 4.6 shares of Sirius common stock for each share they own. Shareholders of each will own about 50 percent of the combined radio company."

The Wall Street Journal (2/20, A1, McBride, Berman, Schatz) reports, "Broadcasters said yesterday that they will fight the proposed merger, and FCC Chairman Kevin Martin released an unusually grim statement saying that the two companies will face a 'high' hurdle, since the FCC still has a 1997 rule on its books specifically forbidding such a deal which would need to be tossed. The transaction also requires the Justice Department's blessing." The Journal adds, "Indeed, XM and Sirius may be rushing into a deal because they sense the regulatory terrain will only get tougher. People close to the matter said that the two companies acted because the climate is already changing with the election of a Democratic-controlled Congress. Future developments -- such as the possibility of a Democratic president -- could make it even harder for the proposed merger to pass muster. … In their strategy, the two companies may be subtly acknowledging the risks before them: By conceiving their deal as a merger of equals and declining to say which company name would emerge ascendant, they minimize the business risks should the deal fall through. If, for example, the combined company were to be dubbed Sirius, XM could be vulnerable to a decline in sales during a regulatory review period that could last a year. A person familiar with the negotiations said the two companies have set March 1, 2008, as their 'drop-dead date,' after which either side can walk away if approval is not granted. … The coming regulatory battle is likely to focus on the definition of satellite radio's market. The two companies are expected to argue that the rules established a decade ago, which require two satellite rivals to ensure competition, simply don't apply in today's entertainment landscape."

USA Today (2/20, Lieberman) reports, "The vision of a robustly competitive satellite radio business came crashing to Earth on Monday, as the industry's once bitter rivals — Sirius (SIRI) and XM Satellite Radio — agreed to merge, creating a company valued at $13 billion, including $1.6 billion in debt." USA continues, "Each of the two has created an array of radio channels, and they've amassed more than 13 million subscribers between them but never made a profit. … The announcement also created uncertainty, and provided few answers, for current subscribers and those considering buying one of the services. The two systems are incompatible, and virtually all satellite radios are designed for one and can't receive the other." USA adds, "Sirius CEO Mel Karmazin, who would hold that job at the still-unnamed combined company, sought to reassure consumers. … 'You should assume that we're going to continue for a very, very long period of time to offer the Sirius and XM service,' he says. 'Once this merger is approved, we'll be able to work with receiver manufacturers and chip-set designers to have a next-generation radio that can pick up both services.' … Left unanswered is what will happen to consumers who have one of the current generation of radios once it's time to blend the companies. … In addition to the tech hurdles, the companies will have to get the deal to pass muster with antitrust officials and the Federal Communications Commission. … Congress also might have something to say. Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., who chairs the House Subcommittee on Telecommunications and the Internet, said in a statement, 'The merger of the only two satellite radio companies must be assessed with an eye toward ensuring that it does not have a … deleterious effect on diversity on the dial and localism in radio coverage and reporting.'"

The Washington Post (2/20, A1, Babington, Heath) reports, "If approved by federal regulators, the merger would give all satellite subscribers access to Sirius's Howard Stern, pro football games and NASCAR races, as well as XM's Oprah Winfrey, Major League Baseball and Bob Dylan. … Before XM Satellite Radio Holdings of the District and Sirius Satellite Radio of New York can combine, however, the companies must persuade the Justice Department and Federal Communications Commission that they are complying with antitrust laws, a claim that land-based broadcasters and consumer groups are likely to dispute. XM and Sirius contend that customers have ample audio choices through devices such as iPods and cellphones. … The FCC bars a single company from controlling the satellite radio market, but FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin recently noted that such rules can be changed. Martin said yesterday that the hurdle 'would be high. . . . The companies would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off with both more choice and affordable prices.'" The Post notes, "The merger would be a milestone in the evolution of commercial radio. XM and Sirius, founded in the early 1990s, predicted that enough people would be willing to pay for a wide array of radio choices -- with clear reception, no fundraising appeals and commercial-free music stations -- to allow the providers to turn a profit. … But their bidding war for on-air talent escalated dramatically. Sirius spent $500 million over five years to employ Stern, who earned another $300 million in stock for meeting certain subscriber goals. XM signed Winfrey to a three-year, $55 million contract. Both companies have spent millions of dollars on professional sports deals."

The Washington Times (2/20, Rowland) reports, "Currently, XM has more than 7.6 million subscribers and a market capitalization -- the value of a company based on the stock price multiplied by the number of shares outstanding -- of $3.75 billion, while Sirius has more than 6 million subscribers and a market cap of $5.2 billion. … The rate of subscriber growth has slowed at both companies, which had combined revenue of $1.5 billion last year. XM and Sirius also have drawn the ire of Wall Street for bleeding millions of dollars on competing with each other over the years for high-priced talent."

Sirius CEO Knows Art Of Deal. USA Today (2/20, 2B, Petrecca) reports, "If there's anything that Mel Karmazin knows, it's the art of the deal. … The 63-year-old media executive has spent most of his career expanding the reach — and public profile — of the companies he's run." USA continues, "Since he joined Sirius Satellite Radio in November 2004 as CEO, he's signed big-name talent to create channels such as Martha Stewart Living Radio and Jamie Foxx's The Foxxhole. Now, with the planned XM and Sirius merger, he's slated to take over as CEO of the combined company. … The native New Yorker got his start as a radio ad salesman at WCBS in 1967. He joined John Kluge's Metromedia in 1970, rising to general manager, before leaving in 1981 to become president of Infinity Broadcasting. He became Infinity's CEO in 1988." USA adds, "It was in the 1980s and 1990s at Infinity that he really made his mark — expanding it from a fledgling company to a radio empire, buying up stations around the country, particularly in major markets. … It also was at Infinity that Karmazin first worked with Howard Stern. (Although Karmazin was Stern's boss when both worked for Infinity, he didn't engineer the shock jock's highly publicized move to Sirius. Stern jumped over before Karmazin.)"

More Commentary. The Los Angeles Times (2/20) editorializes, "Federal regulators are notoriously slow to act, yet it took the chairman of the Federal Communications Commission less than half a day to erect a daunting roadblock to the proposed merger of the country's two satellite radio services, XM and Sirius. Within hours of the companies' announcement of their intention to combine operations, FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin reacted, saying that XM and Sirius 'would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off with both more choice and affordable prices.'" The Times continues, "Martin's two-pronged test sets a nearly insurmountable bar. It's hard to argue that 'more choice' results when the only two suppliers of a product combine, or that the merged entity will be deterred from hiking the fees paid by its subscribers (14 million at last count). In addition, when the FCC issued two licenses for a national satellite radio service in 1997, it said that they could not be owned by a single company. … .That said, Martin's statement is inconsistent with the approach the FCC has taken on media consolidation in general. The goal should be to promote choice not in the niche occupied by XM and Sirius but in the general market of audio entertainment. That market is very competitive, particularly among national players." The Times adds, "Anticipating resistance from the FCC, the companies said they would let people subscribe to channels on a more a la carte basis — a favorite cause of Martin's, at least where cable and satellite TV are concerned — and broaden their programming. They also said the combination would lead to less expensive receivers and more advanced services, such as delivering improved traffic and weather reports. The FCC should look at these concessions, declare victory and approve the merger."

Movie Industry Cracks Down On Canadian Pirating. The New York Times (2/19, Austen) reports, "Canada heavily promotes itself as a place to make films. But now it has a more dubious distinction: an analysis by the Motion Picture Association of America has found that 30 to 40 percent of the bootleg DVDs sold in the United States were made by camcorders smuggled into Canadian theaters." The Times continues, "In response, 20th Century Fox Film is considering holding back film releases for the Canadian market, and the film industry in general is calling for stricter Canadian laws. One theater chain has even equipped some its staff with night-vision goggles to better ferret out copiers." The Times adds, "The apparent rise of Canada's illegal film industry stems from several factors. Tighter federal and state laws in the United States covering film piracy have not been matched by similar legislation in Canada. And because most film releases are simultaneous in Canada and the United States, Canadian pirates get a head start relative to their counterparts abroad. … And, finally, even industry officials acknowledge that Canadian pirates offer technically superior work. … The film industry's estimate of how many black market DVDs originate from Canadian multiplexes is not simply a guess. In many release prints, almost unnoticeable identification marks are scattered throughout random frames. … In the United States, federal law as well as 40 state laws can impose harsh penalties for videotaping movies from theater screens, a process known as camming. In Canada, however, it violates copyright laws only if the police can show in court that the camera operator intended to commercially distribute copies of the recording."

Scor Likely To Continue Pursuit Of Converium. The Wall Street Journal (2/20, A3, Mcdonald, Mijuk) reports, "Swiss reinsurer Converium Holding AG spurned a takeover proposal from French rival Scor SA. But the courtship isn't likely over and it may be the first of many this year in the European insurance sector." The Journal continues, "Converium said yesterday its board rejected a proposed offer of three billion Swiss francs ($2.43 billion) made by Scor over the weekend. If merged, the two companies could leapfrog several competitors to become one of the world's five largest reinsurers depending on how it's measured. Reinsurance firms essentially backstop insurance companies' biggest risks in return for a cut of their premiums." The Journal adds, "Scor said it secured a 32.9% stake in Converium and approached the board regarding a proposed offer of 21 francs a share for the rest -- a 12% premium to the stock's closing price Friday. A 33.3% stake would require a formal offer, according to Swiss securities rules. Scor said it is convinced that a tie-up makes sense, so it is unlikely that chatter about a merger between the two will end there. … Scor said a merger with Converium was 'a unique strategic opportunity to create a top five global multiline reinsurer in this time of market consolidation.' … A Converium spokesman noted that Scor's official stake will be filed publicly this week and that Converium remains focused on growth and profitability targets laid out in recent weeks. … The Scor offer could be the first of several in the insurance sector this year. Cost cuts and below-average claims have left many European insurers with billions more than regulators require to back up their policies. At the same time, maturing insurance markets in the U.S. and Europe have lead analysts to expect single-digit premium growth -- particularly in property-casualty coverage -- in coming years. Some players may seek growth by buying up rivals with today's excess cash."

Vulcan To Acquire Florida Rock In Cash-Stock Deal. The Wall Street Journal (2/20, Berman) reports, "Making a long-term wager on the now-faltering construction markets in the U.S. Sunbelt region, Vulcan Materials Co. yesterday said it agreed to acquire Florida Rock Industries Inc. in a cash and stock deal valued at about $4.6 billion." The Journal continues, "Florida Rock makes construction aggregates such as concrete and distributes gravel and sand." The Journal adds, "The total blended cash and stock consideration of $68.03 a share, based on the 4 p.m. price of Vulcan Materials' stock Friday of $111.81 a share, represents a premium of 45% for Florida Rock shareholders based on the company's own 4 p.m. Friday stock price of $46.96. The price is only slightly above Florida Rock's 52-week-high of $66.10. … In an interview, Vulcan Chief Executive Officer Donald M. James said the combined company's largest market will be in public infrastructure, such as highways. … Florida Rock's shares have fallen 17% over the past year, as investors feared booming growth in Florida would taper off as part of a nationwide real-estate slowdown. … The deal, which should close in mid-2007, is expected to be neutral to Vulcan Materials' earnings this year and accretive next year and beyond."

Apple Gets More Time To Respond To iPhone Suit. The Wall Street Journal (2/20, B3) reports, "Apple Inc. was granted more time to respond to Cisco Systems Inc.'s claim that its new iPhone mobile handset infringes on a Cisco trademark." The Journal continues, "Cisco said it agreed to give Apple until tomorrow to file its legal response in the case. The San Jose, Calif., networking company said Apple asked for a second extension after the initial extension ended Thursday, and Cisco complied." The Journal adds, "Cisco filed suit in U.S. District Court in San Francisco on Jan. 10, arguing the Cupertino, Calif., maker of electronic products and computers infringed on a trademark Cisco obtained in 2000 with its acquisition of Infogear Technology Corp. Cisco markets a phone with the iPhone name through its Linksys division. Apple has called the suit 'silly' and says that other products also use the iPhone name, but the companies have been trying to resolve the issue through negotiations."

Justices To Address Reach Of US Patent Laws. The Financial Times (2/20, Waldmeir) reports, "The Supreme Court will on Wednesday test the global reach of US patent law, in a case that could have big implications for new technology industries such as software and biotechnology." The case "concerns whether Microsoft should be liable for damages overseas for infringing a software patent owned by AT&T for the manufacture of synthetic speech. It will test the extraterritorial application of US patent law in the information age at a time when courts around the world are struggling to apply national laws to increasingly globalised economic activity." However, "the court is also being urged to use the case to look at a much bigger issue: the scope of what can be patented in the first place, including software. If the court takes up that issue – a move that is far from guaranteed – it could make an even bigger impact on US patents and incentives for innovation."

Congress Urged To Maintain Patent System. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/20, A17), Laura Peter, general counsel of Immersion Corporation who recently served on a judicial committee on patent litigation reform in Texas, writes, "There is a large risk that Congress may deform the patent system rather than reform it. For in its quest to modernize the antiquated and underfunded system for protecting our inventions, Congress has trotted out an easy target -- so-called 'patent trolls' -- to justify changes that would stifle innovation, benefiting large technology companies at the expense of smaller ones. … 'Patent trolls' are typically companies that buy patent rights from inventors, then receive royalties from other companies who actually use the patents. Inventors get either a single payment, or a share of the royalties. In some cases trolls (like other patent owners) must go to court to enforce their patents; and like any group, some of them use abusive litigation against large technology companies in the hopes of extorting settlements. … But large technology companies often 'troll' themselves, using their own portfolio of thousands (if not tens of thousands) of patents to sue smaller firms financially unable to defend themselves. And when the claims are unmerited or frivolous, this is a rather convenient way to stifle competition." Peter adds, "Thus, it is right to end frivolous trolling, but the right way is through narrow, targeted reform. Unfortunately, some reform proposals cast too wide a net, and would hurt small technology companies' ability to benefit from their own inventions. … First, Congress is considering proposals that would excessively limit the ability of small technology companies to amend pending patent applications known as 'continuation' patents. These patents, however, are a primary way that emerging technology companies protect themselves. … Thus, limiting these patents too much would just reward copycats with resources, and not the innovators." Peter notes, "Second, Congress is considering greatly expanding the ability of large technology companies to challenge smaller companies' patents even after they are issued. … Already, well-funded companies have proved their willingness to pile multiple challenges in multiple proceedings on smaller firms. … Adding yet another battlefront would simply hurt smaller firms, who are often pushed to the brink of bankruptcy defending their rights, without ensuring greater justice. … Finally, these and other proposed reforms would materially increase the costs of filing for patents. This could devastate emerging companies which pour all of their resources into the tools and people needed to turn their ideas into products. They often are not patent-savvy, or cannot afford the huge expense of filing good patents. … So, when you hear about patent trolls, think of Segway (inventors of the two-wheeled, self-balancing transportation device), think of Andre Pavel (the inventor of the Walkman personal stereo), and yes, think of H-P and Apple decades ago. They each were at the forefront cutting-edge technology and had to defend and assert their patents to become what they are today."

Bloggers Promote Net Neutrality Issue. The Washington Post (2/20, D1, Babington, 690K) reports, "Bloggers and other Internet activists made their marks in the past two presidential elections chiefly by building networks of political enthusiasts and raising money for candidates. Now, they are pushing aggressively into policymaking -- and not just over high-profile issues such as Iraq." They are "pressing candidates to back a handful of issues that are obscure to many Americans but vital to those who base their livelihoods on the Internet and track its development." The activists "are also using their new-age technologies for an old-fashioned purpose: making politicians take note of their legislative priorities. One of those is 'net neutrality.'" The issue "has no overtly partisan or ideological dimensions. Yet it is shaping up as a Democratic issue this year, largely because its most fervid advocates are liberal bloggers and other Internet activists who play a big role in the early stages of choosing a Democratic presidential nominee." Every "major Democratic presidential candidate has endorsed net neutrality. The move keeps them in good standing with powerful grass-roots groups, such as MoveOn.org, and costs them little in return -- perhaps a bit of space on campaign Web sites to promote a matter that comparatively few voters might explore." It is "a principle that bars Internet providers, primarily phone and cable companies, from charging higher rates to Web-based firms in return for giving their content priority treatment on the pathways to consumers."

ENVIRONMENT:

Linder Casts Doubt On Global Warming Science. In a Washington Times op-ed (2/19), GOP Rep. John Linder writes that "wise old heads believe that we are going through normal cycles of heating and cooling that we have seen over hundreds of millions of years as the earth heats and cools when the activity of the sun changes. The earth is heated by the sun. The sun is impacted by magnetic forces creating outbursts called sunspots, which increase the heat it imparts. During the coldest period in the Little Ice Age, which ended near the end of the 19th century, sunspots almost completely disappeared for 70 years. The earth cooled." Linder concludes, "Sunspot activity has been declining for a number of years and is expected decline by 40 percent over the next decade. The world is about to enter a cooling period. Be prepared to change your lifestyle."

Scientists Group Says Warming "A Growing Threat." The Washington Post (2/19, A20, Eilperin, 690K) reports, "The board of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, the nation's leading general science organization, yesterday issued a consensus statement declaring global climate change 'a growing threat to society.'" The statement, "released at a town hall meeting of school teachers in San Francisco, marked the first time that the board of the influential AAAS, publisher of the journal Science, has taken a stand on global warming."

New Alaska Governor Pursuing Natural Gas Pipeline Project. The New York Times (2/19, Yardley, 1.16M) reports Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin "wants to become the first Alaska governor to deliver what many others have sought without success: construction of a $30 billion pipeline to transport natural gas from the state's North Slope to markets in the lower 48 states. It is an enormous project that could strengthen Alaska's energy-based economy for decades to come, while also, according to some estimates, supplying 7 percent of the nation's natural gas annually. … Elected by a wide margin after promising to bring 'new energy' and 'transparency' to the pipeline project, Ms. Palin took office in December and immediately backed away from the negotiations that her predecessor, Frank H. Murkowski, had been pursuing with the three major energy companies that control much of the land where gas would be developed. Ms. Palin has long criticized those negotiations as back-room dealings whose extensive incentives and tax breaks would have benefited the energy companies, BP, Exxon Mobil and ConocoPhillips, far more than they would have Alaska."

Paulson Influencing Administration's Environmental Policy. Newsweek (2/26, Wolffe, 3.12M) reports, "He heads Treasury, not the EPA, but Hank Paulson is investing time in making this White House greener. … Paulson is a rare species inside the Bush administration," who "cares deeply about climate change: during his seven-year run as chairman and CEO of Goldman Sachs, the investment bank issued a policy paper backing the science on warming and promoting investment in alternative energy. In recent months Paulson has played a leading role in the administration's debate about energy -- and he's had an impact on environmental policy. It was Paulson who encouraged the former oil executives in the West Wing to embrace ambitious targets to cut by 20 percent the amount of gas Americans are forecast to consume by 2017 (part of the plan outlined in Bush's State of the Union). White House officials portray the policy as a team effort, but identify Paulson as a driver."

NYTimes Urges Spitzer Action On Emissions To "Tip National Debate." The New York Times (2/20, 1.16M) suggests Gov. Spitzer, who built a "formidable environmental record" as attorney general, should "quickly commit himself to establishing ambitious goals for reducing emissions of carbon dioxide from cars, power plants and other industrial sources in New York State, and to writing regulations to achieve those goals." The paper says such a commitment could "tip the national debate and compel Washington to move more quickly," given "persuasive new scientific evidence," progress made by CA Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, and the concerns of a new Democratic Congress. The paper says prior commitments between Schwarzenegger and Pataki "smoothed" the way for Spitzer to "some extent." Spitzer "must help get the regional greenhouse initiative up and running, and make sure that any new power plants built to meet the state's energy needs use the most modern technologies and add as little as possible to the atmosphere's already heavy carbon burden." The paper concludes by saying this is a "tall order" for Spitzer, but most of these initiatives could be accomplished via executive order, thus "skirting an unadventurous Legislature that tends to prefer business as usual."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Drug Paraphernalia Sales Targeted In New York. The Elmira (NY) Star-Gazette (2/20) reports a crackdown on retail stores "selling products that might be used in conjunction with illegal drugs in the city of Elmira appeared to be having an impact Monday. In an informal survey by the Star-Gazette on Monday of seven city convenience and variety stores, only one offered an item that probably has no other use than for inhaling illegal drugs. Last Friday, Elmira Police Chief W. Scott Drake III and a member of the United States Drug Enforcement Administration visited five businesses in the city that were found to be selling drug paraphernalia, including crack and methamphetamine pipes, scales and drug packaging materials."

Report: Gangs Use "Net Banging" To Find Recruits. On its Web site, ABC News (2/19) reports that according to a recent survey by the Justice Department, there "are currently more than 21,000 gangs in the United States. Their membership is 700,000 strong and growing, and they're using the Internet to recruit members. By posting online content that glorifies the thug lifestyle, gangs are using the Web to recruit — some using children as young as 8 years old as part of the online recruiting process, known as 'Net Banging.'"

"Economic Refugees" Said To Be Replenishing Taliban Ranks As Poppies Are Eradicated. In the Wall Street Journal (2/20, A16) Vanda Felbab-Brown writes, "As NATO braces for a spring Taliban offensive in Afghanistan, many in the Bush administration, the Congress and the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime are calling for it to take on a prominent role in combating the narcotics trade. Although this task is meant to help Afghanistan repress the worrisome, if predictable, expansion of its opium economy, it will greatly hamper NATO's effectiveness. NATO's crucial role is to establish security throughout the country -- and not to dilute its focus in eradication and interdiction missions that are presently bound to fail. … Meanwhile, the damage to the crops has generated a new wave of economic refugees to Pakistan, many of whom have been replenishing the ranks of the Taliban."

Scandal Said To Be Putting Plan Colombia In Jeopardy. The Washington Post (2/17) reported Rep. Sander M. Levin (D-Mich.) "said Colombian officials cannot count on easy passage of a free-trade agreement or military assistance, as is currently being provided under a program known as Plan Colombia. 'Colombia F.T.A. cannot pass the Congress, as constructed, and Plan Colombia is in more jeopardy because of these scandals, the infiltration of the paramilitary into the inner workings of the Colombian government,' Levin said." The Post notes that on Thursday, "Sen. Álvaro Araújo Castro, the brother of Foreign Minister Maria Consuelo Araújo, was arrested along with three other senators and a congressman. Authorities said they are investigating links that those lawmakers -- along with a sixth legislator who remains at large -- may have had ties to a paramilitary organization that has terrorized [Colombia] for years while shipping tons of cocaine to U.S. cities."

Police Chiefs Worried About Spread Of Assault Rifles. USA Today (2/20, 1A, Johnson) reports, "Law enforcement agencies across the country have been upgrading their firepower to deal with what they say is the increasing presence of high-powered weapons on the streets." USA Continues, "Scott Knight, chairman of the Firearms Committee of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, says an informal survey of about 20 departments revealed that since 2004 all of the agencies have either added weapons to officers' patrol units or have replaced existing weaponry with military-style arms." USA adds, "Knight, police chief in Chaska, Minn., says the upgrades have occurred since a national ban on certain assault weapons expired in September 2004. The ban, passed in 1994, in part prohibited domestic gunmakers from producing semi-automatic weapons and ammunition dispensers holding more than 10 rounds. … 'This (weapons upgrade) is being done with an eye to the absolute knowledge that more higher-caliber weapons are on the street since the expiration of the ban,' Knight said.He said his own department of about 20 officers is in the midst of determining whether to upgrade its weapons. … Ron Stucker, criminal investigations chief of the Orange County Sheriff's Department in Florida, says the department has been rearming many of its deputies with assault weapons in the past two years. … Stucker says deputies are now 'frequently' encountering assault weapons in local robberies and during simple traffic stops. Weapons seizures in Orlando have increased overall by 26% since 2004."

IMMIGRATION:

Florida Ruling Will Help Foreign Convicts Fight Deportation. The Miami Herald (2/19, Chardy, Weaver) reports, "Owran Green thought he made a good deal when he agreed more than 13 years ago to plead no contest to assault and battery charges in Broward County in exchange for probation and no jail time. … It would be years before he realized his mistake. The Jamaican, now 35, learned from an immigration attorney that his plea renderered him deportable under a decade-old federal law that made expulsion of most convicted criminals mandatory. … But this past fall, the Florida Supreme Court issued a landmark ruling that could help Green and hundreds of other foreign nationals in the same predicament avoid expulsion if they can show they cut their plea deals without being legally warned about deportation." The Herald continues, "The high court's ruling could provide convicted foreigners with another layer of defense against stepped-up efforts by Homeland Security after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to rid the country of immigration violators, particularly those with criminal convictions. … The unanimous Green ruling, issued Oct. 26, has given renewed hope to numerous convicted foreigners now seeking withdrawal of plea deals -- including dozens in Miami-Dade Circuit Court." The Herald adds, "Almost all of the pleas in question were struck in the 1990s, when judges didn't uniformly advise defendants they could be deported by pleading guilty or no contest to charges. Most of those defendants have served sentences and are now seeking to have convictions thrown out to inoculate themselves against possible deportation. … 'It's had a considerable impact in all of our criminal divisions,' said prosecutor Penny Brill, chief of the legal division at the Miami-Dade State Attorney's Office. 'It's now an easier standard for these defendants to meet.' … In Green's case, he sought to withdraw his plea in September 2003, arguing that had he been warned about deportation he would have taken his chances at trial. A judge rejected his petition because no actual deportation proceedings had begun."

Border Violence On The Rise In Arizona. The Washington Post (2/19, A3, Moreno, 690K) reports on the "unusual," according to Alonzo Peña, new US Immigration and Customs Enforcement special agent in charge of Arizona, "recent frequency" of incidents of border violence, "the fact these incidents resulted in deaths and that they occurred in the desert, where the crime scenes are hard to find within the thousands of acres of sand and brush. … Smuggling violence has increased in Arizona during the past six months, the byproduct of a clampdown by federal immigration authorities, Peña said." The US-Mexico border in Arizona "remains the busiest illegal entry point in the country, but the increased concentration of Border Patrol agents and National Guard troops stationed there during the past year has made it harder to cross. In the past 18 months, enforcement operations have been stepped up in Arizona, with strong backing from Gov. Janet Napolitano (D), who declared a state of emergency in Arizona's border counties in 2005 because of illegal immigration."

Illegal Who Testified Against Border Agent Was Given Documents, Money. The Washington Times (2/19, Seper, 88K) reports, "An illegal alien got a 'get out of jail free card' plus US legal documents and monetary compensation from federal prosecutors in exchange for his testimony against a U.S. Border Patrol agent accused of using excessive force during an arrest. Former agent David Sipe, who was convicted and fired, recently won an acquittal at a court-ordered retrial." The Times adds, "A federal appeals court in Texas ordered the new trial, saying prosecutors gave the illegal alien and two others additional inducements not disclosed at the time for their testimony, including Social Security cards, witness fees, permits allowing travel to and from Mexico, living expenses and free use of government phones."

US Asylum Process Said To Remain Inconsistent. The Washington Post (2/19, A18, 690K) says in an editorial that two years ago, "the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom released a report detailing the upsetting inconsistency with which immigration agents and judges treat foreigners seeking asylum in the United States. The study's conclusion: Asylum seekers are often not given a fair chance to argue their cases, putting legitimate claimants -- especially those who can't contact a lawyer -- at risk of being sent back to their countries of origin, where they face retribution from their governments. This month, the commission issued a follow-up that included a report card on the government's progress since the original study. Both the Department of Homeland Security and the Justice Department earned a fair number of D's and F's from the bipartisan group."

Immigrant Entrepreneurs Boost Inner-City Economies. U.S. News and World Report (2/26, Rayasam, 2.03M) reports, "Immigrant entrepreneurs are helping fuel the U.S. economy. Recent studies show not only that immigrants are starting businesses at a faster rate than native-born Americans but that many of those businesses are refreshing neglected inner-city neighborhoods. … It's the kind of pattern that's enlivening immigrant pockets in cities like New York and Los Angeles, according to the Center for an Urban Future."

TAX:

Ebay Opposes Administration Plan To Report Users To IRS. The Financial Times (2/20, Callan) reports, "Ebay is fiercely resisting a Bush administration plan it says will force it to snitch on customers who are not paying tax on billions earned on the popular online auction site." The Times continues, "The Treasury estimates it could collect $2bn in unpaid tax if companies such as eBay reported American users who carry out more than 100 transactions worth at least $5,000 a year to the Internal Revenue Service. … But an eBay spokesperson said: 'We do not believe it is our responsibility to serve as the go-between. We believe that it is the seller's responsibility.' The company pointed out that many users file self-employment and business tax returns based on their eBay income." The Times adds, "Ebay said it would co-operate with IRS investigations into specific persons but would not voluntarily report its customers' sales 'en masse'. … The US measure, planned to come into effect on January 1, 2008, would only affect American users of eBay, but separately this week UK Revenue and Customs warned taxpayers to report income from eBay activity or face penalties."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Senate GOP Outlines Seven-Point Agenda. The Washington Times (2/19, Bellantoni, 88K) reports, "Senate Republicans have pledged to fight for up-or-down votes on President Bush's judicial nominees and to make his tax cuts permanent, but they face an uphill battle in pushing their agenda. Republican leaders have outlined seven issues they plan to highlight in the shadow of the Democratic majority, which has its own priorities and the power to bring them to the floor." Senate Republican Conference Chairman Jon Kyl of Arizona "said his party unanimously agreed on a set of guiding principles and revealed them in advance of forthcoming legislative specifics. … Attempting to make the Bush tax cuts permanent; Supporting Mr. Bush's plan to increase the size of the military; Pushing earmark reform; Expanding domestic oil production and alternative energy research. Another of the seven issues is related to health care. Republicans say they will propose creation of small-business health-insurance plans, expansion of health savings accounts and support for the health care tax plan Mr. Bush promoted in his State of the Union address last month, with the idea 'all Americans can receive quality health care.' … One of the thornier issues at the bottom of the Republican agenda is immigration reform."

Groups Call On Congress To Make CRS Reports Public. The Washington Post (2/19, A17, Williamson, 690K) reports, "Deep inside the Library of Congress, 500 researchers pound out the secret intelligence Congress uses to make law. Legislators request 6,000 Congressional Research Service reports a year, on weapons systems and farm subsidies, prescription prices and energy use. Together, they offer what lobbyists and industry want most: clues to what's next on the Hill. For years, open-government groups have fought to make the reports public, and for years, many lawmakers have kept them under wraps.

Or so they thought." The Post adds, "By insisting on secrecy, Congress instead created a bootleg market for the research. Every day, a small Texas company compiles the reports and sells them to lobbyists, lawyers and others who pay thousands of dollars for a peek at the reports and what they say about the congressional agenda. And it's all legal. … Open-government groups have a problem with that," and they "have fought back by posting every CRS report they can find on their Web sites. But watchdog groups have released only about 10 percent of the total, not enough to reveal the patterns that suggest what Congress might do next."

Walter Reed Aid Director Allegedly Had Conflict Of Interest. The Washington Post (2/20, A1, Priest, Hull, 690K) reports that for the "past three years, Michael J. Wagner directed the Army's largest effort to help the most vulnerable soldiers at Walter Reed Army Medical Center." He was responsible for matching "big-hearted donors with thousands of wounded soldiers who could not afford to feed their children, pay mortgages, buy plane tickets or put up visiting families in nearby hotels." But while "he was being paid to provide this vital service to patients, outpatients and their relations, Wagner was also seeking funders and soliciting donations for his own new charity, based in Texas, according to documents and interviews with current and former staff members. Some families also said Wagner treated them callously and made it hard for them to receive assistance." The medical center has "launched a criminal investigation of Wagner after The Washington Post sought a response to his activities while he ran the Army's Medical Family Assistance Center, a position he left several weeks ago."

Walter Reed Hospital Repairing Outpatient Housing. The Washington Post (2/20, A1, Priest, Hull, 690K) reports Walter Reed Army Medical Center "began repairs yesterday on Building 18, a former hotel that is used to house outpatients recuperating from injuries suffered in Iraq and Afghanistan and that has been plagued with mold, leaky plumbing and a broken elevator." Facility's commander Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman "said Army staff members inspected each of the 54 rooms at the building and discovered that outstanding repair orders for half the rooms had not been completed. He said that mold removal had begun on several rooms and that holes in ceilings, stained carpets and leaking faucets were being fixed." The Post adds Walter Reed, "the Army's premier medical facility, has turned into a holding ground for wounded soldiers during 5 1/2 years of sustained combat. Almost 700 outpatients suffering from physical injuries and psychological problems live on the 113-acre military post or in nearby quarters. Many linger there for 18 months or longer as they move through the Army's numbing bureaucracy."

Younger CIA Employees Chafe At Ban On Personal Media Items. The Washington Post (2/19, D1, Barr, 690K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that at CIA headquarters, "iPods are banned. So are cellphones." Workplace restrictions "like these are among the smaller sacrifices that CIA employees make on behalf of the nation's security. But a wave of new hires at the agency are very, very tech savvy and, it seems, not shy about their interests." Cindy Bower, the CIA's chief of human resources, said, "They are pushing us to change in ways that, from a security perspective, we might not be ready to change. They want to use BlackBerrys, and they've got iPods they want to bring in and listen to music." The Post adds the "new hires also are prodding the agency to improve its information technology systems. 'They want it faster and better,' said Michael J. Morell, associate deputy director and the No. 3 at the agency. 'I think it is a very healthy thing.'" The Post adds, "Perhaps no federal agency is changing as rapidly as the CIA. The terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, shook up an intelligence community that had been downsizing since the end of the Cold War. Since then, recruitment and hiring have become a CIA priority." Forty percent "of the workforce has arrived since Sept. 11, 2001. Of the new hires, 60 percent are under age 30, and 85 percent are under 40. One in six have military experience."

Scalia Said To Wield More Power In Roberts Court. The Los Angeles Times (2/20, Savage, 850K) reports, "It has been two decades in the making, but this is the year Justice Antonin Scalia, the Supreme Court's most outspoken dissenter, could emerge as a leader of a new conservative majority among the justices. Between now and late June, the court is set to hand down decisions in four areas of law -- race, religion, abortion regulation and campaign finance -- where Scalia's views may now represent the majority." The Times adds, "In each of those areas, the retirement of centrist Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and her replacement with Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. figure to tip the court to the right." That "would give 70-year old Scalia the chance to take on a role that has largely eluded him: speaking for the court in major rulings." Scalia, adds the Times, "is not known for seeing shades of gray in legal disputes; instead, he has favored clear rules and broad decisions."

Grassley Warns He May Block Minimum Wage Conference. Roll Call (2/20, Pierce) reports, "In a role reversal, Senate Finance ranking member Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) has warned that he may block a House-Senate conference on the minimum-wage bill unless he is assured his Democratic colleagues will join him in demanding inclusion of a sizable tax-cut package. 'The contours of the deal should be known if details can't be,' a Grassley aide said of his insistence that Democrats agree to pursue a small-business tax package that is much larger than the $1.4 billion House-passed proposal." Roll Call adds, "Anticipating criticism from Democrats, the Grassley aide pointed out that Republicans agreed to 'pre-conference' a large corporate tax package in the 109th Congress — assuring Senate Democrats, for example, that the measure would be revenue-neutral, among other things. Once they secured those promises, Democrats finally allowed the measure to be sent to conference with the House. Before that, Senate Democrats had blocked three votes to end debate on the motion to appoint conferees, the aide said. … Mindful that Grassley could lead a potential filibuster of one of the Democrats' top legislative priorities, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has not ruled out the idea of pre-conferencing the minimum-wage-hike bill, and he has been talking actively with Republicans on how to proceed to conference, said Reid spokesman Jim Manley."

Frank Says Adoption Of Inflation Target Would Be A "Terrible Mistake." The Financial Times (2/20, Guha) reports, "It would be a 'terrible mistake' for the Federal Reserve to adopt any form of inflation target to guide its interest rate decisions, Barney Frank, the Democratic chairman of the House financial services committee, has told the Financial Times." Frank, "whose committee is one of two in Congress charged with oversight of the US central bank, said such a target 'would come at the expense of equal consideration of the other main goal, that is employment.'" Ben Bernanke, "chairman of the Fed, believes that the bank would be better off with a relatively flexible inflation target – one that would be achieved on average, rather than within a specific time, giving maximum latitude to respond to output shocks. However, Fed watchers say that, in order to make any such change, Mr Bernanke would need at least the tacit consent of key figures in Congress."

Women Making Faster Gains Than Men In Job Market. The Wall Street Journal (2/20, Treftz, 2.04M) reports, "Women took on slightly more than half of US jobs created in the first part of the decade and made gains in securing the most lucrative openings. Women posted a net increase of 1.7 million jobs paying above the median salary, while men gained a net increase of just over 220,000 of such positions, according to a Bureau of Labor Statistics report for the years 2000-2005. … Overall, men gained 1,804,000 jobs and women 1,996,000, or 52.5% of the total increase, for the period studied." The Journal adds, "Women outpaced men in obtaining work that pays in the top quarter of all jobs."

Commercial Construction Experiencing Boom. The Christian Science Monitor (2/20, Scherer, 59K) reports, "Residential construction fell 2 percent last year, but private commercial construction rose 16 percent, and public construction was up 10 percent, according to the US Census Bureau. The last time the business was this strong was seven years ago, says Kenneth Simonson, chief economist for the Associated General Contractors. Behind the commercial-construction push is a combination of powerful economic forces: For one, gigantic investment pools… are looking for places to invest. Also, an enormous growth of imports into the United States is spurring a rush to build new warehouse space. Moreover, developers are building new communities that offer environmentally friendly spaces to work and require less commuting time. These complexes also offer nightlife and restaurant options." The Monitor adds, "Even some parts of the country where construction has lagged in the past are experiencing a boom."

Stock Markets Expected To Continue Record Climb. The Wall Street Journal (2/20, C1, Browning, 2.04M) reports, "It is the kind of surprise investors love to get: The economy seems to be just a little stronger than most people expected. Not enough to worry anyone; just enough to push stocks higher Data on items such as fourth-quarter economic growth and consumer spending have come in a tad better than markets expected late last year." As a result, the Dow Jones Industrial Average "has continued its steady rise, and stocks that do better in a strong economy have been among the leaders." On Wall Street, "the mood is downright bullish. … Amid solid growth with minimal inflation worldwide, the world's stock markets are feeding on one another's success."

USA Today (2/20, 1B, Shell, 2.27M), meanwhile, says "the relationship between politics and stock market profitability tends to be most cordial in the year prior to a presidential election. It is that historical statistical quirk that should provide some solace to investors concerned about another calendar-related anomaly on Wall Street: the fact that stocks have not had a 2% pullback since July 14, a span of 149 trading sessions. That uninterrupted uptrend, says Ned Davis Research, lags behind only a correctionless stretch that ended in 1954."

Job Corps Revamps Programs For New Economy. The New York Times (2/20, Eckholm, 1.16M) reports, "As the economy has turned against those with low skills and researchers have questioned the long-term impact of the Job Corps on the lives of its graduates, this remnant of the Great Society is facing an urgent need to reinvent itself." Dr. Esther R. Johnson, a "career executive in the Labor Department with a doctorate in education who took over the corps last March," said, "Once you could go into the Job Corps and get a G.E.D. and go out and make a living. You can't do that anymore." The Times adds, "Dr. Johnson wants the Job Corps to aim higher, helping graduates into careers with a bigger paycheck." To do that "she plans to lengthen the average stay for many graduates beyond the current 11.4 months, improving their reading, math and vocational skills. She also wants trade courses to connect more closely with college programs and emerging industries, and she thinks the corps must double the number of graduates, now just 10 percent, who go on to higher education." Dr. Johnson says this "can be done…within a budget flat-lined at $1.5 billion in recent years, mainly by increasing the rigor of courses while cutting other costs."

Herbert Looks Forward To End Of Bush's Administration. The New York Times' Bob Herbert (2/19) writes, "The essential issue facing the U.S. at this point in our history" is "whether, once the Bush administration has finally and mercifully run its course, the country goes back to being a reasonably peaceful, lawful, constructive force in the world, or whether we continue down the bullying, warlike, unilateral, irresponsible, unlawful and profoundly ineffective path laid out by Bush, Cheney & Co. … I don't think most Americans are up for perennial warfare."

LATimes Criticizes Congressional "Censorship" Of TV Violence. The Los Angeles Times (2/19, 850K) says in an editorial that in response to "a request from lawmakers, the Federal Communications Commission has drafted a report outlining what Congress might do to curb excessively violent programs. Objectionably violent shows, it says, could be banned during the hours that children are most likely to be watching TV (6 a.m. to 10 p.m.), just as indecent programming is." But while there is "plenty of evidence that television shows are more graphically violent than ever, both on cable networks and on free over-the-air TV," simply "noting this problem, however, doesn't prove that government censorship can solve it." What censorship "would do is deter networks from airing valuable but bloody shows that don't quite qualify as news, while generating lawsuits over what inevitably will be inconsistent standards for judging violence on TV." The government "shouldn't be making these calls; parents should."

Historians "Abandon Their Usual Caution" In Judging Bush's Presidency. U.S. News and World Report (2/26, Tolson, 2.03M), in its cover article on "The 10 Worst Presidents," reports, "Is George W. Bush's presidency shaping up to be one of the worst in U.S. history? You hear the question being asked more and more these days. And more and more, you hear the same answer. With Iraq a shambles and trust in the administration declining, it is probably not surprising that 54 percent of respondents in a recent USA Today/Gallup survey said that history would judge Bush a below-average or poor president. … Public opinion is a notoriously fickle beast, of course, which is why historians and other custodians of the long view prefer to reserve judgment until they can speak of their subjects in the past tense. But clearly something about Bush ii has inspired many historians to abandon their usual caution."

Conservative Judges May Be Bush's Lasting Legacy. US News & World Report's "Washington Whispers" column (2/18, Bedard) reports, "The White House is still holding out hope that it will have a chance to name a third justice to the Supreme Court and cement its conservative tilt for generations to come. 'We need one more on the Supreme Court,' says a Bushie who was instrumental in getting Chief Justice John G. Roberts and Associate Justice Samuel Alito aboard. But with Democrats now running the Senate, pushing another conservative through might be hard. … Meantime, the White House is seeking to add 17 more U.S. Circuit Court judges before leaving town in 2009. 'This is our biggest legacy,' says the official. And rightly so: Almost 30 percent of federal judges are Bush picks, he says."

Gonzalez's Tenure At USCIS Said To Ride On Success Of Fee Increase. The Washington Times (2/20, Dinan, 88K) reports though US Citizenship and Immigration Services is "usually thought of as the kinder, gentler arm of immigration," the agency "helps nab an average of five criminals a day, including the occasional murder suspect -- a point that agency Director Emilio Gonzalez underscores when he discusses the USCIS role in the Homeland Security Department." In the year since he took over the agency, Gonzalez "has started a pilot program to test a new naturalized citizenship exam, finished off a backlog of millions of benefit applications and created several offices that would put national security first at the agency. But those who interact most with USCIS say Mr. Gonzalez's tenure will succeed or fail on his latest proposal to increase fees an average of more than 60 percent in order to finish the transformation from a much-maligned 20th-century paper-based bureaucracy into 21st-century streamlined, self-sufficient, services-based enterprise."

Pelosi Taps First Black Woman To Be House Clerk. The Washington Post (2/20, A11, Layton, 690K) reports that at "6 feet 2 inches tall, Lorraine C. Miller cuts a striking figure in the polished hallways of the U.S. Capitol. Last week, the woman with regal bearing gained another, more lasting distinction. She was sworn in as clerk of the House of Representatives, the first African American to hold the seat since it was created in 1789." House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) "tapped Miller for the job, citing her work ethic, knowledge of the Hill and ability to make connections across party lines, in addition to her trailblazer status."

NASA's Renewed Focus On Lunar Exploration Applauded. In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/20, 1.16M) planetary scientist Carolyn Porco writes, "After years of spending our nation's space budget building an orbiting space station of questionable utility, serviced by an operationally expensive space shuttle of unsafe design, NASA has set a new direction for the future of human spaceflight. Once again, we have our sights on the Moon ... and beyond. We are finally, bodily, going to make our way into space, this time to stay." Porco adds that the official plans "call not for flag-planting and grab-a-few-rocks-and-go but, by 2025, a solar-powered, human-tended, continuously inhabited research outpost. … What is not out of the question is our ability to pay to keep the goal front and center. We are now spending in Iraq, in a single month, $9 billion — more than half the annual budget NASA needs to stay on course."

OTHER NEWS:

US Chamber, Center For American Progress To Release Joint Program For Education. The Politico (2/20, Glass) reports that on February 28, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the Center for American Progress "plan to unveil their joint platform for change." The chamber reported a poll of businesses showed 87 percent "said the current No Child Left Behind requirements should extend all the way through high school." The two organizations' presidents Thomas J. Donohue and John D. Podesta will release their platform and also "plan to grade all 50 state education programs, plus that of the District of Columbia, from kindergarten through 12th grade."

Educators Call For More Attention To Character Education. Charles C. Haynes, senior scholar at the First Amendment Center in Washington, and Marvin W. Berkowitz, Sanford N. McDonnell Professor of Character Education at the University of Missouri-St. Louis, write in USA Today (2/20, 13A, 2.27M) in favor of the importance of character education, writing "shouldn't we be paying more attention to the kinds of human beings who do the math and read the books?" The two praise the work of Principal Kristen Pelster of Ridgewood Middle School, in Arnold, Missouri who, along with now former-Principal Tim Crutchley adopted a program of character education resulting in higher academic performance, fewer disciplinary problems "and the student failure rate has dropped to zero."

McCain Says He Supports Overturning Roe Vs. Wade. The AP (2/19, Davenport) reports Sen. John McCain "said Sunday the court decision that legalized abortion should be overturned." McCain told a crowd in South Carolina: "I do not support Roe versus Wade. It should be overturned." McCain "also vowed that if elected, he would appoint judges who 'strictly interpret the Constitution of the United States and do not legislate from the bench.'" The AP adds, "McCain's campaign also announced early Sunday that he had been endorsed by former Oklahoma Gov. Frank

Keating, who had been considering his own bid for the White House, and former Texas Sen. Phil Gramm.

McCain Blasts Rumsfeld At South Carolina Stop. The AP (2/20, Smith) reports Sen. John McCain said "the war in Iraq has been mismanaged for years and former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld will be remembered as one of the worst in history." Speaking to "an overflow crowd of more than 800 at a retirement community near Hilton Head Island, SC," McCain said, "We are paying a very heavy price for the mismanagement — that's the kindest word I can give you — of Donald Rumsfeld, of this war. The price is very, very heavy and I regret it enormously." The AP adds McCain, "the ranking Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee, complained that Rumsfeld never put enough troops on the ground to succeed in Iraq." McCain said, "I think that Donald Rumsfeld will go down in history as one of the worst secretaries of defense in history." The AP adds McCain's "comments were in sharp contrast to McCain's statement when Rumsfeld resigned in November, and failed to address the reality that President Bush is the commander in chief."

Fox News' Special Report (2/19, Garrett) reported Sen. John McCain "pushed for conservative support in South Carolina. Today he bashed the Senate's rare Saturday session to vote on whether to debate a non-binding resolution opposing the president's Iraq troop surge." McCain was shown saying, "It was a charade and a joke and a publicity stunt on the part of the Democrats in the Senate, because they wanted to embarrass the president of the United States, my friends."

McCain Said To Be Following Bush Playbook. On MSNBC's "Hardball" (2/19, Matthews), MSNBC political analyst Howard Fineman said, "The McCain people are following the George W. Bush playbook to the extent they possibly can. The same donors, the same issues, the same at the attitudes all the way down the line. And it is so ironic given where McCain was seven years ago."

Gramm Says McCain Is The Best Leader For Our Times. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (2/20, A17), former Sen. Phil Gramm says, "Today's mortal need is for a leader who trusts our people enough to tell them the truth about the festering domestic problems that have been swept under the rug for a quarter-century. We need a president who can face up to these problems even as he leads an increasingly reluctant country in a war against a dangerous enemy that will follow us home from any battlefield on which we are defeated." Gramm adds, "I believe the man we need to meet the mortal need today is here. He is experienced, but has not lost his common sense or his ability to be outraged. His conservatism is not the result of a studied philosophy, but of common sense and personal observation. His name is John McCain. He might not be the right president for all times, but he is the right president for these times." Gramm cites the budget deficit, free trade, and entitlement reform, among other issues.

More Energetic, Conservative McCain On Display In Iowa. The Washington Post (2/19, A4, Balz, 690K) reports McCain "has shown little of the exuberance of the Republican outsider…in 2000. Now virtually hostage to the success of Bush's Iraq war policy…McCain has appeared subdued, even dour. … But as he campaigned across Iowa this weekend, there were flashes of the old McCain." McCain "staunchly defended his position on the war, decried a Republican Party that he said has lost its way and punctuated question-and-answer sessions with his particular brand of humor. When a man said he was serving in the Marines in Vietnam around the time McCain was being held in a North Vietnamese prison camp, the senator interjected, 'Why didn't you come get me?'" According to the Post, "the differences between 2000 and today were evident. … This time he presents himself as the candidate who can restore core principles to the Republican Party, which he says became intoxicated by power before losing its congressional majorities in the 2006 midterm elections. His message this time is more overtly conservative, and his campaign identifies more openly with the socially conservative wing of the party."

The Politico (2/19, Martin), in an article with a strikingly dissimilar analysis of McCain's weekend campaigning, reports, "This weekend in Iowa, McCain's old ebullience was replaced by a mood that seemed to fluctuate between sober and downright morose as he and the voters he met kept returning to a single topic: Iraq. Nor was the weekend an exception." McCain "deployed his usual mix of corny cracks and jocular repartee with audience members. But the levity was no match for the deeply serious questions that McCain found himself on the receiving end of at his first stop of the day in Des Moines."

Romney Now Supports "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" Policy. The Washington Post (2/19, A4, Solomon, 690K) reports former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney, "who once advocated allowing gays to serve openly in the military, said yesterday that he does not think the Pentagon should change its 'don't ask, don't tell' policy in the midst of the Iraq war. ' 'Don't ask, don't tell' has worked well. We're in the middle of a conflict. Now is not the time for a change in that regard, and I don't have a policy posture as to allowing gays in the military to serve there openly,' Romney…said on ABC's 'This Week.'"

Romney Defends Opposition To Stem Cell Research. The AP (2/20, Jackson) reports Mitt Romney "on Monday defended his opposition to most embryonic stem cell research despite its scientific promise to cure diseases like multiple sclerosis that afflicts his wife, Ann." Romney said in an interview "he was confident that research on adult stem cells and the existing embryonic stem cell lines could eventually provide the medical answers." Romney said, "I believe that science is able to receive the stem cells necessary for research through means that don't represent a serious, moral problem." The AP adds Romney said "his wife would play a prominent role in his campaign for president." Romney said, "Were she not healthy I would not have run. … She is able to manage her disease such that she does not overdo or cause herself physical problem. Were that not the case, we'd have made a different decision. We'd be in the sun somewhere." Romney also "defended his recent decision to join the National Rifle Association, saying that he has always supported the 2nd Amendment and dismissing criticism that his membership amounts to political opportunism." He "defended his decision to vote for Democrat Paul Tsongas in the 1992 Massachusetts Democratic presidential primary." Romney said, "We have an open primary where we can vote for people other than Bill Clinton and I voted against Bill Clinton."

Romney Defends Faith At Florida Event. Fox News' Special Report (2/19, Garrett) reported, "One of McCain's rivals, former Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney, confronts skepticism of a different kind, his Mormon faith. A heckler raised it this weekend in Florida." Unidentified heckler: "You sir, you are a pretender. You do not know the lord. You are a Mormon." Romney: "Let me offer a thought, and that is one of the great things about this great land is we have people of different faiths and different persuasions, and I'm convinced that the nation does need to have people of different faiths, but we need to have a person of faith lead the country." Garrett: "The Mormon issue comes up a lot, and in this case at least, it appears Romney got the better of that encounter. Romney faces pro- choice, and pro-abortion, and pro-life skepticism as well."

NBC Correspondent "Trashes" Romney. On Fox News' "The O'Reilly Factor" (2/19), Bill O'Reilly said, "More evidence that NBC News is now a committed left wing organization. After Republican Mitt Romney announced he was running for president, NBC News correspondent Chip Reid trashed him." Reid was shown saying, "He's barely out of the starting blocks, and I'm going to go right for his knees. No. 1, he's a Mormon. That's something evangelicals have a problem with. No. 2, he's a flip- flopper." O'Reilly added, "All right, he's a flip-flopper. It's hard to believe when you understand that Mr. Reid covers Congress for the NBC Nightly News with Brian Williams. Nice objectivity. The woman giggling with him is Anna Marie Cox, works for TIME magazine, use to edit a Marxist magazine. OK. Ms. Cox did. Now, there was nobody in that discussion sticking up for Romney. Nobody." Fox News analyst Michelle Malkin added, "Well, the Reid clip was remarkable. First, his Tony Soprano pose about going after -- you know, right for...Mitt Romney's knees. Ha, ha, ha. And then you got the giggly Anna Marie Cox, you know, breaking out into laughter over that. And then just the political characterization that is just so out of touch from reality. … I think this was implications for the larger political coverage, leading up to 2008 for sure."

Cohen Says Romney "Thoroughly Counterfeit." In his Washington Post column (2/20, A13), Richard Cohen says, "I have been following the zigs and zags of Mitt Romney, the former Massachusetts governor and now Republican presidential candidate, watching him grow progressively less progressive, sort of making himself up as he goes along. As a result, I surf the Web with trepidation, bracing myself for the story that I fear might be coming: 'Romney Says He Is Not Really a Mormon.'" What's an "ambitious, square-jawed opportunist to do? He might do as he has done in the past and change his position." Cohen cites Romney's change of position on issues such as gay rights, abortion, adding he is "in a class of his own. He used to have fairly reasonable positions on gun control. Within the past year, though, he joined the National Rifle Association -- an admission made under some duress Sunday to George Stephanopoulos on ABC's 'This Week.' ' In fact, to watch Romney on the show was to see a thoroughly counterfeit man."

Obama Said To Be Overtaking Clinton In The South. The Politico's Mike Allen (2/19) writes, "At the annual Jefferson-Jackson Dinner of the Democratic Party of Virginia on Saturday, the Hillary Clinton signs and bumper stickers were free," while "'Obama '08 Gear' was for sale – T-shirt, $20; button, $10; sign, $5. And he had a lot more takers than she did, suggesting he might be making early inroads in a tough region that once was Confederate soil. Party officials say their previous record for the dinner was 1,400 seats. But after" Obama "was announced as the keynote speaker, sales ballooned and the party kept expanding the dinner until tit had space for 3,200 at the Greater Richmond Convention Center. A few hours before the dinner, Gov. Tim Kaine became the first governor outside of Illinois to endorse Obama. Hastings Wyman, founder of the Southern Political Report, "said that while Clinton retains her hold on the African-American establishment, which is crucial in Southern primaries, Obama has the most appeal among younger African-Americans." Larry J. Sabato, director of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia, "says his students 'are nuts about' Obama and that among Democratic students, 'He's the only one they're interested in. He's like Reagan or Kennedy, with an ability to connect with people individually in a large group. Hillary? Get real. She doesn't have that. Whatever 'it' is, he has it.'"

Obama Accused Of Overstating His Community Involvement In His Memoir. The Los Angeles Times (2/19, Wallsten, 850K) reports, "The drama began with a tiny ad in a local newspaper — a notice that asbestos was about to be removed from the management office at Altgeld Gardens, the all-black public housing complex where young Barack Obama worked as a community organizer. … As the 24-year-old mentor to public housing residents, Obama says he initiated and led efforts that thrust Altgeld's asbestos problem into the headlines," but "others tell the story much differently. They say Obama did not play the singular role in the asbestos episode that he portrays in the best-selling memoir, 'Dreams From My Father: A Story of Race and Inheritance.' … 'Just because someone writes it doesn't make it true,' said Hazel Johnson, a longtime Altgeld resident who…began pushing for a variety of environmental cleanups years before he arrived." Rep. Bobby L. Rush "said it was Johnson's work…that sparked the interest of Chicago officials. … While he has not read Obama's memoir, Rush, who has been a political rival of Obama's in recent years, said Johnson's role was so prominent that he was 'offended' by anyone telling the Altgeld story without including her."

Hollywood A-List To Attend Obama Fundraiser. The New York Times (2/20, Halbfinger, 1.16M) reports Tom Hanks "has bought a $2,300 ticket. So have Jennifer Aniston, Eddie Murphy and Denzel Washington. The studio bosses from Universal, Paramount, Disney and 20th Century Fox have all sent checks or faxed their credit card numbers, too." Given the "A-list stars, movie and music moguls, and top Hollywood dealmakers who have sent their R.S.V.P.'s, one would think the man of honor at Tuesday night's benefit at the Beverly Hilton would be getting a lifetime achievement award. But the toast of the evening is" Sen. Barack Obama, "in his first foray to Los Angeles as a declared presidential candidate." It is "hard to say whether the unusual heat behind the evening owes more to interest in Mr. Obama or to the three men who spearheaded the fund-raiser: the DreamWorks co-founders David Geffen, Jeffrey Katzenberg and Steven Spielberg." The "haul is expected to be at least $1 million, making it the first major event here of the presidential campaign. (Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, will get a chance to flex her own Hollywood fund-raising muscles on March 24 at the estate of Ronald Burkle, the supermarket tycoon.)"

Axelrod Optimistic About Campaign's Course. On MSNBC's "Hardball" (2/19, Matthews), Obama strategist David Axelrod says, "Well, I am very encouraged, Chris, by what I see. Everywhere he has gone, and you were down there freezing with us in Springfield, when 15,000 people showed up for his announcement. He has been getting enormous crowds wherefore he goes. And I don't think it is just because of him. And I think he is sensational. But that is not why people are coming. They are coming because they really want to believe again and check back in and change the politics of this country. I think that is very powerful. And so I have a very optimistic feeling about this campaign." Asked how Obama would defeat Sen. Hillary Clinton in a Democratic primary, Axelrod said, "Sometimes it is hard to stop an idea whose time has come. I think people want to turn page, they want to move forward. They are looking to the future. I think Barack Obama represents the future."

WPost Says FEC Should Accept Obama's Plan To Preserve Public Financing. The Washington Post (2/20, A12, 690K) notes in an editorial that Sen. Obama "has asked the Federal Election Commission to rule on whether he could legally collect money for the general election campaign but ultimately decide to take public funding were he to win the nomination and his GOP opponent followed suit." The FEC

"has said it is speeding up its review of Mr. Obama's intriguing proposal, which turns, as a legal matter, on the question of whether the candidate would be deemed to have 'accepted' money he is raising for the general election campaign if he keeps it separate and unused. If the money has been raised but not 'accepted,' Mr. Obama argues, he could still choose to return it and take public financing instead." This "might be a stretch that only a former Harvard Law Review president could love . But as a matter of policy, it could salvage a failing system to promote the aims underlying the law." The FEC "should allow that, and Mr. Obama's rivals in both parties should pledge, if they win the nomination, to help save the system, not destroy it."

Clinton Pollster's Firm Said To Have Potential Conflicts Of Interest. The Washington Post (2/20, A11, Birnbaum, 690K) reports Mark J. Penn "is a man who wears many hats: high-paid political and corporate pollster, chief executive of an international communications and lobbying company, and chief strategist to New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's bid for the Democratic presidential nomination." But Penn's firm, "Burson-Marsteller Worldwide -- with 2,000 employees and $300 million a year in revenue -- owns BKSH & Associates, the major lobbying firm chaired by Charles R. Black Jr. That's right, Black, counselor to Republican presidents, reports to Clinton's top strategist." Burson-Marsteller is "a subsidiary of WPP Group, a London-based advertising and PR giant that owns many of the biggest names on K Street. These include Quinn Gillespie & Associates, Wexler & Walker Public Policy Associates, Timmons & Co., Ogilvy Government Relations Worldwide (formerly the Federalist Group), Public Strategies Inc., Dewey Square Group and Hill & Knowlton." The "range of interests represented by' lobbyists employed by these firms "is a staggering list of corporate America's who's who, with Penn himself a longtime adviser to Microsoft." Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, said, "This is a classic example of how big money has inextricably intertwined the campaign advising and lobbying worlds of modern-day Washington with potential conflicts of interest all over the place."

Reid's Son Joins Clinton Campaign. USA Today (2/19, 4A, 2.27M) reports Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid's son Rory "has signed on as Nevada chairman for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential bid. Rory Reid, 44, is chairman of the Clark County, Nev., Commission and a former chairman of the Nevada State Democratic Party. He will be senior adviser on Western issues, including public lands, resources and conservation, transportation, growth and affordable housing, the New York senator's campaign said in a statement Sunday."

Some Conservatives' Animosity Towards Clinton Has Mellowed. The New York Times (2/19, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) reports, "Back when Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton was first lady, no one better embodied what she once called the 'vast right-wing conspiracy' than Richard Mellon Scaife." Scaife "spent more than $2 million investigating and publicizing accusations about the supposed involvement of Mrs. Clinton and former President Bill Clinton in corrupt land deals, sexual affairs, drug running and murder. But now…Scaife's checkbook is staying in his pocket. Christopher Ruddy, who once worked full-time for Mr. Scaife investigating the Clintons…said, 'Both of us have had a rethinking.' 'Clinton wasn't such a bad president,' Mr. Ruddy said. 'In fact, he was a pretty good president in a lot of ways, and Dick feels that way today.'" According to the Times, "For every conservative who says Mrs. Clinton will feel the wrath of the movement's grass-roots organizers later in the campaign…another expresses doubt that Clinton foes can ever be revved up as they once were."

Krugman Credits Edwards For Saying He Was Wrong To Authorize Iraq War. The New York Times' Paul Krugman (2/19) writes, "Many people are perplexed by the uproar over Senator Hillary Clinton's refusal to say, as former Senator John Edwards has, that she was wrong to vote for the Iraq war resolution. Why is it so important to admit past error? … For the last six years we have been ruled by men who are pathologically incapable of owning up to mistakes. And this pathology has had real, disastrous consequences. The situation in Iraq might not be quite so dire — and we might even have succeeded in stabilizing Afghanistan — if Mr. Bush or Vice President Dick Cheney had been willing to admit early on that things weren't going well or that their handpicked appointees weren't the right people for the job. The experience of Bush-style governance, together with revulsion at the way Karl Rove turned refusal to admit error into a political principle, is the main reason those now-famous three words from Mr. Edwards — 'I was wrong' — matter so much to the Democratic base."

Clinton, Obama Compete For Black Vote In South Carolina. Fox News' Special Report (2/19, Hume) reported, "Democratic presidential candidates are confronting the issue of race. The question is not only whether the country is ready for a black president, but whether black voters are likely to cast their ballots as a block for an African-American candidate." Fox News (Serrie) added, "Democratic presidential hopefuls are courting the black vote in South Carolina, a state where African-American accounted for 49 percent of the vote in the party's last presidential primary." Sen. Hillary Clinton: "I am the candidate with the experience to break the barriers, to win on behalf of the people of our country." Fox added, "Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton held a morning rally at historically black Allen University in Columbia, the same city where Friday Illinois Senator Barack Obama appeared to suggest he was blazing a new trail as an African American presidential candidate." Sen. Obama: Twenty years ago, nobody would have believed this crowd right here in South Carolina." Fox added, "South Carolina voters have mixed reaction on whether race, or for that matter gender, will have an effect on the outcome of the 2008 election."

The New York Times (2/20, Healy, 1.16M) reports Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton "told an audience of black voters on Monday that they would be 'breaking barriers' if they supported her for president in 2008 — deliberately signaling that they could still take pride in making history if they chose a woman over one of their own, Senator Barack Obama of Illinois." It was "a delicately worded pitch — Mrs. Clinton did not mention Mr. Obama by name — and it drew applause. Another remark, that 'anyone can be president,' set off an ecstatic standing ovation." Clinton and Obama "were both in South Carolina this holiday weekend competing for the support of blacks, who cast almost half of the votes in the Democratic primary here in 2004." Clinton's "task here became more complicated last week when one of her prominent black supporters, State Senator Robert Ford of South Carolina, said that nominating Mr. Obama would be a disaster." Ford said, "Every Democrat running on that ticket next year would lose because he's black and he's top of the ticket." The Times adds Obama "said Saturday that history was full of examples of people telling blacks, 'We can't.' He then said that, with black support, he could say to voters, 'Yes, we can.'" The Times adds Mrs. Clinton "also appeared at a tribute Monday in Charleston for the state's most powerful black Democrat, Representative James E. Clyburn, majority whip of the United States House, who also met with Mr. Obama over the weekend."

The Washington Post (2/20, A4, Cillizza, 690K) reports Clinton "courted black voters, considered crucial to securing the Democratic presidential nomination, in a series of campaign stops in South Carolina on Monday in which she cast the 2008 election as a chance to make history." Each of Clinton's "appearances was aimed at projecting her as the candidate best equipped to deal with the hopes and hardships of black voters. She called on state leaders to remove the Confederate flag from the grounds of the State House here, as have several other Democratic candidates. Then, after her town hall event at Allen University -- a historically black institution in Columbia -- she headed south to a gathering in Florence in honor of Mayor Frank Willis." Clinton's visit "came less than 48 hours after Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) campaigned here, and even during Clinton's speech in Columbia word was circulating that Obama had secured the endorsement of Dick Harpootlian, a former state party chairman."

The Politico (2/20, Smith) reports Clinton's "tailored case to a black audience reflected her new directness in talking about herself as a woman and a mother. Former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher reportedly took voice lessons to sound more like a man; Clinton has gone in the other direction since announcing her bid for the presidency, speaking more explicitly about her sex than ever before in her political career. And while the shift has the lofty aim of trying to change national attitudes toward women, it also reflects a cold, strategic reality." Clinton's "explicit embrace of her gender was a choice, and it represents a gamble of sorts" that "appears, so far, to be paying off. In particular, Clinton appears to have managed to avoid a mass defection of African-American supporters to Obama."

Hillary Clinton Denies Buying Black Legislator's Endorsement. The AP (2/20, Davenport) reports Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "on Monday denied that her campaign traded money for an endorsement from one of South Carolina's most influential black politicians." In an interview, Clinton "responded to questions about the consulting contract her campaign negotiated with state Sen. Darrell Jackson, who last week endorsed her candidacy rather than of top rivals John Edwards or Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill." Clinton said, "Senator Jackson was someone who was involved in my husband's campaigns. He was someone we turned to for political advice and counsel and I'm proud to have him on my team." The AP adds, "Soon after the endorsement, Jackson acknowledged that his media consulting firm had negotiated a $10,000 per month contract with Clinton's campaign. Jackson has said he turned down more lucrative contracts from other candidates." Although he "backed Edwards, the former North Carolina senator, in the 2004 Democratic presidential primary, Jackson said he now supports Clinton because she has the best shot of winning the White House."

Questions About Obama's Racial Identity Criticized. In his Washington Post column (2/20, A13), Eugene Robinson says, "Is Barack Obama 'authentically' black? Come on, be real. Is the pope Catholic?" Obama "made his first campaign trip to" South Carolina, "drawing about 3,000 people to a rally in Columbia, the state capital, and 2,000 to a 'town hall meeting' here in the city where I was born and raised. If those who rose early Saturday morning to attend the Orangeburg event constitute a representative focus group, black voters will want to weigh Obama's policy positions against those of the other candidates before deciding whom to support. But they won't spend a lot of time pondering his identity." State legislator Gilda Cobb-Hunter, "an African American," had "no patience for the 'blackness' question that reporters kept asking." Cobb-Hunter said, "People talk as if this is, like, some kind of option for him. … I don't hear the national media questioning Hillary Clinton about being a woman."

Giuliani Said To Be "Nightmare" Candidate For Religious Right. On Fox News' "Your World With Neil Cavuto" (2/19, Cavuto), David Kuo, former deputy director of the Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives said Rudy Giuliani "really is a nightmare candidacy for the religious right. He is extremely popular. He is extremely well-liked. And his candidacy really does expose deep fissures within the religious conservative movement, because, on the one hand, you have a religious conservative leadership that has been around for the last 20 years or so. But, more and more, you have young evangelicals, you have people outside of the sort of religious right mainstream who are looking at his candidacy, and who are very fascinated by it. And, so, it -- you could well see a Giuliani nomination. And that could well bring in sort of a religious right war within the GOP."

Bill Clinton Seen As Potential Senate Replacement For His Wife. The Washington Examiner (2/18, Sammon) reported, "If Hillary Rodham Clinton wins the presidency, some top Democrats would like to see her husband, former President Bill Clinton, appointed to serve out Hillary's unexpired Senate term. 'As a senator, he'd be a knockout,' said Harold Ickes, who was once a top White House aide to Bill Clinton and now gives behind-the-scenes advice to Hillary. … 'President Clinton would excel in the Senate,' said Paul Begala, who helped Bill Clinton get elected and served in the White House as a top aide." The Examiner notes that "so far, speculation about potential successors has focused on New York Attorney General Andrew Cuomo and environmental lawyer Robert F. Kennedy Jr."

Bill Clinton Said To Have Little Interest In Senate. On Fox News' Hannity & Colmes" (2/19), host Sean Hannity said, "With Senator Hillary Clinton making her run for the White House, many supporters are looking at husband Bill to fill her Senate seat if she wins. First-term New York governor Eliot Spitzer, a Democrat, would be forced to appoint a replacement for Hillary. And Clinton supporters are already lobbying for the former President." Columnist Dick Morris added, "Well, I'm not sure he wants to go back to work for a living, Sean. He's having a nice time and I think he would thoroughly enjoy being first husband in the White House. And I think he would want to treat that job expansively. I think the more likely role for him would be kind of like roving ambassador. I think Hillary would use him to tour the world and develop relationships that she needs and to advise her on foreign policy." Morris added that Spitzer is "a very, very good governor with a tremendous future and I think some potential himself to be president. And I think that he's going to want to appoint a protégé."

Richardson Calls On Democratic Candidates To Avoid Intra-Party Attacks. USA Today (2/19, 4A, 2.27M) reports New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson "said he and all other Democratic presidential candidates should sign a pledge not to attack one another. Such a pact would mean 'we will go into a general election stronger,' Richardson said Sunday on CNN's Late Edition.

Parallels Between Decline In Party Fortunes Under Bush, Clinton Noted. Roll Call (2/20, Jacobson) reports that with the National Governors Association winter meeting "set to begin later this week and the 2008 presidential race continuing to simmer, it seems an appropriate time to look at how both former President Bill Clinton and President Bush presided over a significant decline in their own parties' downballot fortunes." For

Clinton, "the biggest drop in gubernatorial, legislative and Congressional seats came in 1994, two years after he was elected, whereas for Bush, it came after six years in office. And generally speaking, the declines in Democratic downballot strength under Clinton were steeper than those the Republicans have suffered under Bush (though if the trends from 2006 continue, the GOP could cumulatively be looking at Clinton-scale losses two years from now)." The "larger-than-life personas of both Clinton and Bush — and their polarizing effect on the electorate — almost certainly contributed to their party's downballot decline."

Biden's Said To Have Gift For Retail Politics. The Politico (2/20, Simon) reports, "Joe Biden is in the 27th minute of his five-minute presentation, but nobody in the church basement" in Ames, Iowa, "has slipped away, nobody is nodding off, nobody is doing anything but following his every word." Biden's mouth "can get him in trouble, but when it is working right, the words drop from his lips like pearls, and nodding heads now spread through the audience like ripples on a pond." Most politicians "love to serve but hate to run, and you can hardly blame them: Running is when you get the least respect. Running is when the voters remind you that you are a job applicant and they are doing the hiring. But Biden, a senator from Delaware, seems to live for campaigning, live for the give and take, live for switching audiences from rapt attention to raucous laughter and back again." Joe Biden is "a glad-hander in the best sense of the word: He looks glad to be grasping each person's hand, looking the person in the eye, answering some question or exchanging some pleasantry." Does it "really matter? Voters appreciate this much effort even if the candidate is faking sincerity."

Anti-War Wing Of Democratic Party Pressuring '08 Candidates. In his Roll Call column (2/20), Morton Kondracke says, "As dangerous as President Bush's record on Iraq may be to Republican presidential candidates in 2008, Democrats also are risking revival of fears that their party is weak on foreign policy." If Democratic candidates "embrace the strategy of Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) to cut off funds for U.S. troops in Iraq, they deserve to be compared to the losers of the past — George McGovern, Jimmy Carter, Walter Mondale, Michael Dukakis and Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.)." Those candidates "lost presidential elections — often by landslides — mainly because voters perceived them as being unreliable in protecting the country from foreign adversaries." This year, "as in the past, the force-averse liberal base of the party is demanding ever-stronger statements and actions in opposition to the Iraq War and party leaders are obliging, with Murtha, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and presidential candidates either obliging or leading the process."

Rush To Reschedule Primaries Could Backfire. The Christian Science Monitor (2/20, Wood, 59K) reports California is "poised to play the first card in what experts say will be a national game of 'reschedule your state's primary.' The stakes: which state can gain significant influence over the presidential nominating process." California's bid "to move its 2008 primary from June to Feb. 5 – already approved by the state Senate and expected to clear the Assembly this week – is intended to force presidential candidates to stump in the Golden State, addressing issues dear to voters here before the contest is all but decided by others. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) has said he will sign the bill." But already, "nine states have tentatively scheduled primaries or caucuses for Feb. 5, and more may pile on as states jockey to meet notification deadlines: May for Democrats, September for Republicans. Among the delegate-rich states considering that date: Illinois, New Jersey, and Texas. Florida has a bill pending that would leapfrog them by moving its primary to Jan. 29." But the "probable outcome of a front-loaded primary schedule is an early winnowing of the candidate field, with Feb. 5 becoming a do-or-die date, and a clipped-back period of time in which voters can assess presidential hopefuls at town halls and in their living rooms." University of Virginia political analyst Larry Sabato said, "California and other states that are trying to play calendar games are apt to find out that their plans backfire. We are courting disaster."

Two House Democrats Refuse DCCC Aid. The Politico (2/20, Kraushaar) reports that despite Democratic "successes in last November's midterm, two rookie Democratic congresswomen already are rejecting financial assistance from their leadership, a striking move aimed at cultivating an independent image for voters back home." KS2 Rep. Nancy Boyda (D) and NH1 Rep. Carol Shea-Porter (D) "have declined to participate in the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee's 'Frontline' program, which helps vulnerable members raise money early and receive logistical support for their re-election bids." Twenty-nine members, "including 24 freshmen, qualified for the program in mid-February." Boyda "would have been a prime candidate for assistance. She represents a solidly Republican district where President Bush received 59 percent of the vote against Sen. John F. Kerry, D-Mass., in the 2004 presidential election." Shea-Porter's decision "to bypass the DCCC program is less surprising. In 2006 the committee backed her primary opponent, Jim Craig, and didn't provide any money for her upset victory over Republican Rep. Jeb Bradley."

Democrats' Opposition To Bush Tax Cuts Could Hurt Them In General Election. The Washington Times (2/19, Lambro, 88K) reports, "Virtually all the Democratic presidential contenders have denounced President Bush's tax cuts and called for raising the rates on wealthier Americans, but Republican strategists say their plan will backfire in the 2008 election. … Every Democrat seeking the presidential nomination who was in Congress at the time voted against the Bush tax cuts and has called for repealing some of the income-tax rate reductions if they are elected president. Most say their tax increases would hit only the very wealthiest Americans earning more than $200,000 a year. Republican tax-cut advocates say: 'Don't believe it.' If the Democrats campaign on raising taxes just for people at the top tax rate, 'it will backfire on them for two reasons,' said economic strategist Cesar Conda, a former chief domestic policy adviser to Vice President Dick Cheney."

The Washington Post's Sebastian Mallaby (2/19, A19) writes, "The last time a Democrat controlled the White House, he defended globalization. He understood that trade creates losers, and he sought to assist them with progressive tax and spending policies. But today's leading Democrats are flirting with the opposite approach. They are forthright in their complaints about trade. But, with the notable exception of John Edwards, they are surprisingly reluctant to propose tax hikes."

Traditional Door-To-Door Iowa Campaigns Seen As No Longer Viable. The New York Times (2/19, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports Iowa "has been celebrated for 30 years for its intimate campaigns where future presidents would perch on living room couches or sit at kitchen tables and take questions from 20 or 30 people late into the night. But it was standing room only on Sunday afternoon at the Grand River Center here, where hundreds of people showed up for a forum with John Edwards. … When Mr. Edwards asked for questions, dozens of hands shot up. Many were still up when he called an end to the meeting. Mr. Edwards's experience has been shared by most of the major candidates on recent visits to Iowa, almost a year before the caucuses. It is evidence of what appears to be the demise of the living room campaign, signaling a potentially profound change in the way presidential campaigns are conducted here, and to a lesser extent in New Hampshire."

Campaigns Establish Headquarters Outside Of Des Moines. USA Today (2/19, 3A, Keen, 2.27M) reports, "Development in downtown Des Moines is forcing some presidential campaigns to locate their offices in the suburbs, ending an era when cheap, temporary headquarters were clustered in the city center."

WSJournal Seeks Greater Oversight Of State AGs. Given recent news about California AG Bill Lockyer, the Wall Street Journal (2/20, 2.04M) says state attorneys general have followed the example of Eliot Spitzer since they "have had a field day using their power to accuse all and sundry of wrong-doing. … State attorney generals have become an unchecked source of government abuse in recent years, combining political ambition with the awesome power to prosecute. They need to be reined in, and a good place to start is by exposing their sweetheart contracts with their trial lawyer friends and campaign contributors."

NYTimes Encourages Spitzer To Reform State Legislature. The New York Times (2/19, 1.16M) editorializes, "Almost everybody who voted for Gov. Eliot Spitzer last year realized that he would not tread lightly. … Nevertheless, those lawmakers seemed stunned when Mr. Spitzer came out slugging after they exhibited some of their lesser instincts. When the governor began openly criticizing individual legislators in their home districts, the Albany crowd went into culture shock. They talked about how Mr. Spitzer was not playing by the rules. They talked about how he was upsetting the political etiquette. Joseph Bruno, the Senate leader, whined to reporters last week that the governor was a 'bully.' Maybe so. But a bully is just what New York needs right now — a governor strong, smart and articulate enough to break up the Albany cartel."

Blair Calls For Tougher UK Gun Laws. The Washington Post (2/19, A14, Jordan, 690K) reports British Prime Minister Tony Blair "announced Sunday that he wanted to lower to 17 the age at which a mandatory five-year sentence could be imposed for illegally possessing a gun. The announcement followed the shooting deaths of three teenagers." Blair said his government "is seeking to overhaul violent crime laws, including adding penalties for gang membership and measures to protect people who testify against gangs."

Cheney Reportedly Unhappy With North Korean Deal. Newsweek (2/26, Hosenball, Wolffe, 3.12M) reports, "Hard-liners already loathe the new deal in which Kim Jong Il's regime has agreed to halt activity at its main nuclear plant in return for emergency oil supplies. John Bolton, who recently departed as U.S. envoy to the United Nations, told NEWSWEEK: 'We violated the principle that we don't reward bad behavior.'." Newsweek adds, "Administration hard-liners appear to have been unable to thwart diplomacy. Former officials close to Vice President Dick Cheney, who asked not to be identified characterizing his views, suggest he does not like the deal but believes there are enough get-out clauses to ensure either that Pyongyang complies or the whole bargain collapses. Cheney had long influenced North Korea policy through powerful bureaucratic allies who battled what they viewed as State Department appeasers. But Bolton, a leading hawk on North Korea, left the administration when Congress refused to confirm him as permanent U.N. ambassador. Robert Joseph, another key hard-liner, is soon to leave his job as State Department under secretary for arms control. Cheney himself may be the last hard-liner. But White House aides, along with the veep's allies (anonymous when discussing the men's relationship), acknowledge that Bush relies far less on Cheney's judgment now than he did earlier in his presidency."

U.S. News and World Report (2/26, Omestead, 2.03M) reports, "Administration officials have insisted they would not reward the North's nuclear 'bad behavior.' But that, hard-line critics complain, is just what the deal does. Paradoxically, their assertion that North Korea had bested the United States is shared by some deal backers. Their complaint: The years of delay allowed Pyongyang to multiply its plutonium stockpile since the crisis erupted in October 2002. Says a former U.S. official, 'We could have done this four years ago and gotten a better deal.'"

Bush, Howard Discuss North Korea, War On Terror. AFP (2/20) reports, "US President George W. Bush spoke with Australian Prime Minister John Howard about the North Korea nuclear deal and the military campaigns in Iraq and Afghanistan, the White House said." Bush "spoke to Howard by telephone as US Vice President Dick Cheney headed to Japan and Australia to discuss their roles in Iraq and Afghanistan and common challenges like China's rise and North Korea's nuclear program." The two "spoke a week after a breakthrough nuclear deal was reached at talks in Beijing between the United States, the two Koreas, China, Japan and Russia." White House National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe said in a statement that Bush and Howard "discussed the recent agreement at the Six Party talks."

North Korean Deal Said To Highlight Cheney's Declining Influence. The Washington Post (2/20, A5, Abramowitz, 690K) reports, "Mistrustful of North Korea and its willingness to keep promises, Vice President Cheney worked hard in President Bush's first term to prevent talks aimed at halting that country's push to develop a nuclear bomb." However, the State Department reached a nuclear agreement with North Korea earlier this month, "a deal that many of the vice president's conservative allies consider foolhardy and that some of his own staff are said to find hard to swallow." But the "contrast underscores the vice president's shifting status in Washington." While "there is no evidence that Cheney's close relationship with Bush has been lessened," there is "also little doubt that the causes he has championed…are being rethought within the Bush administration, according to officials inside the government and experts outside it." The North Korea deal is "only the latest example of a new pragmatism forced on the administration by a series of court decisions, the deteriorating situation in Iraq and -- perhaps most of all -- the Democratic takeover of Congress." Some conservatives see I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's resignation after his indictment in late 2005 "as part of the unraveling of a Cheney network, leaving a void that" Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, "the engineer of the North Korea deal, has exploited."

Cheney To Reassure Japan On Korea Accord. AFP (2/20) reports Vice President Dick Cheney "has headed to Asia with his first scheduled stop in Japan, a key US ally which has voiced increasing concern about the White House's approach on North Korea and Iraq." Cheney will also travel to Australia and Guam. In Tokyo, Cheney will "aim to dispel any worries about the North Korean deal, emphasizing that it is only a good 'first step' towards stripping the regime of its nuclear weapons programs." Japan has "refused to fund the deal…due to an emotionally charged row over Pyongyang's past abductions of Japanese citizens."

Professor Accuses Cheney Of "Snubbing" Japanese Defense Secretary. Philip J. Cunningham, professor at Doshisha University in Kyoto, writes in a Los Angeles Times (2/20, 850K) op-ed that during his upcoming visit to Japan, Vice President Cheney "will snub the defense chief, the very person he would be expected to talk to in a visit focusing on defense and security issues. The message seems to be: Friends don't criticize friends." Cunningham notes that "there was no rational reason for Japan to get entangled in Iraq, and there's even less reason to become involved in Iran. However, Cheney appears bent on whipping up support for a reluctant Japan to continue to follow the Bush administration's lead in the war-torn Mideast. In refusing to meet with the defense minister, Cheney seems to be saying, in effect, that a silent nod to the wise is sufficient."

Burns To Meet With South Korean Official On Accord. AFP (2/20) reports South Korea's deputy foreign minister is traveling to Washington "for talks with US officials on ways to follow up on last week's deal on scrapping North Korea's nuclear program," his ministry said. Shim Yoon-Joe was will hold talks with Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns, Assistant Secretary of State John C. Rood, and deputy NSA Jack D. Crouch.

Zelikow Welcomes Deal As "Successful Test Of Diplomacy." Philip Zelikow, former advisor to Secretary Rice, writes in the Washington Post (2/20, A13, 690K) that the agreement with Pyongyang represents "a successful test of diplomacy." Last week's deal, "skillfully negotiated by Rice and [Assistant Secretary of State Christopher] Hill with their counterparts, delivers a plan for the 'early harvest.' A 'good, initial step' was Rice's careful phrase." But Zelikow warned that "the next two months will show whether the design remains valid. Rice has agreed to a six-party meeting of foreign ministers, including the North Koreans. We will see whether the Bush administration and its counterparts can launch the second stage, when the desired outcomes to be produced from this diplomacy may finally come into view."

ElBaradei Says Nuclear Accord With Iran Unlikely In Short Term. The Financial Times (2/20, A1, Dombey) reports IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei "has not given up hope that the US and Iran will one day sit down and negotiate their differences away, but in the much shorter term his prognosis is bleak." On Tuesday, ElBaradei is "due to certify that Iran has failed to comply with UN demands to halt sensitive parts of its nuclear program," but in an interview with the Times, he said he "will continue to make a last-ditch effort to try to convince them that it is in their interest to find a way to go into negotiations." If that doesn't happen, he warned, "I don't see that it is going to happen overnight, I will have to report negatively."

US Taking Twofold Approach To Tehran. The Wall Street Journal (2/20, A6, Solomon, Dreazen, 2.04M) reports, "As Iran's power in the Middle East grows, the Bush administration is pursuing a two-pronged strategy of directly challenging Tehran in places such as Iraq and Lebanon, while seeking to exploit fissures believed to be emerging in Iran's social and political systems." The strategy includes "military movements to underscore American resolve, as well as financial pressure to drive a wedge between Iran's leaders and the country's merchants." US officials say the strategy "isn't designed to court a war. Still, it is fraught with risks." For example, Iran "could misread or overreact to some American moves." At the same time, "Many Middle East analysts are skeptical about the Bush administration's ability to induce political change in Iran."

Iran Launches Large-Scale War Games. The AP (2/20, Dareini) reports Iran Monday launched "its largest war games in almost a year," two days ahead of a U.N. Security Council deadline for Iran to halt uranium enrichment or face further economic sanctions. State television said the three-day exercise is "the biggest since last March and is taking place in 16 of Iran's 30 provinces," with an estimated 60,000 troops participating in the maneuvers.

Iranian Ships Enter Iraqi Waters. CNN's Situation Room (2/19, 7:26PM) reported, "US military officials are trying to figure out Iran's intentions. CNN has learned that Iranian boats crossed into Iraqi waters at the northern end of the Persian Gulf in the past ten days. The boats sailed near Iraq's off shore oil terminals to gauge the military response. Officials say it was not seen as an aggressive act."

Russia To Slow Work On Iranian Nuclear Plant. The New York Times (2/20, A8, Kramer, 1.16M) reports Russia said Monday "it would slow work on Iran's nearly completed Bushehr nuclear power plant." The move follows a disclosure from Russia that Iran "had not made the last two $25 million monthly payments, in a dispute about whether it could pay in euros instead of dollars," and "added a new twist to the deeply contentious project." The dispute will also "delay, perhaps by a year, any delivery of nuclear fuel to Iran," Russian officials said. The Washington Times/AP (2/20, Isachenkov) runs a similar report.

Increased Demand, Sanctions May Force Iran To Limit Energy Use. The Wall Street Journal (2/20, A1, Spindle, 2.04M) reports Iran "sits on one-tenth of the world's known oil supplies but is using so much energy these days it may start rationing gasoline as soon as next month." The Journal notes that "as the country has grown wealthier selling oil and gas, Iranians have themselves become large consumers of energy. Government subsidies, which make energy nearly free to consumers and businesses, stoke the demand further. At the same time, a combination of Western sanctions and Iranian policies has discouraged foreign investment in oil fields, causing production to stagnate. The result: Iran's oil exports could dry up in as little as a decade, according to some who have studied the situation."

WSJournal Says EU Subsidizing Business Investment In Iran. The Wall Street Journal (2/20, A16, 2.04M) editorializes, "On the record, Europe claims to be as concerned as America about a nuclear-armed Iran. The record also shows, however, that Europe's biggest countries do a booming business with the Islamic Republic. And so far for the Continentals, manna trumps security." The Journal adds, "In the absence of an official embargo against Tehran, private EU companies have sought commercial opportunities in Iran. But the real story here is that these businesses are subsidized by European taxpayers. Government-backed export guarantees have fueled the expansion in trade. That, in turn, has boosted Iran's economy and -- indirectly by filling government coffers with revenues -- its nuclear program. The German record stands out. In its 2004 annual report on export guarantees, Berlin's Economics Ministry dedicated a special section to Iran that captures its giddy excitement about business with Tehran."

Mideast Summit Ends With Little Result. The New York Times (2/20, A8, Cooper, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports a summit sponsored by Secretary Rice between Israeli and Palestinian leaders "meant to start a new peace initiative" ended Monday "with little more concrete than a promise to meet again." Rice and her aides "made it clear that her efforts had been complicated" by the recent decision by Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas to form a unity government with Hamas. She "suggested that if this meeting had not been scheduled beforehand," Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "might not have agreed to meet with Mr. Abbas, whom she praised nevertheless for supporting international and Israeli demands that the Palestinians recognize Israel's right to exist, forswear violence and accept previously negotiated agreements with the Israelis." Although Hamas has not agreed to those requirements, Rice "said she doubted that such a government would come close enough to satisfy the Americans and the Israelis." Following Monday's meeting, Rice read a joint statement, but "neither Mr. Olmert nor Mr. Abbas appeared by Ms. Rice's side as she read the statement, reflecting the tenuous nature of the talks, which appear to be so fragile that no side has even been willing to label them negotiations." However, the commitment from Olmert to meet again with Abbas "is a minor victory" for Abbas, "because it signals that Israel will continue to deal with him despite his unity government plans."

Under the headline "Rice's Mideast Talks Yield Little Except A Promise To Meet Again," the Washington Post (2/20, A10, Kessler, 690K) says the summit "appeared to yield little but a pledge to meet again." Rice's participation in the talks "was intended to signal her deepening commitment to helping resolve the conflict, but the talks demonstrated the difficulties ahead."

The Los Angeles Times (2/20, Ellingwood, 850K) reports in Monday's meeting, the leaders "did not appear to have broached the issues likely to be the most difficult to resolve in reaching a final peace accord, such as borders, the status of Jerusalem and the fate of Palestinian refugees."

The Washington Times (2/20, Mitnick, 88K) says the meeting "produced no immediate breakthroughs but will allow Washington to show its Arab allies it is working to resolve one of the region's toughest problems."

Similarly, the Financial Times (2/20, Morris) says the meeting's outcome "matched its low expectations" as participants "agreed on little more substantial than a willingness to meet again."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/20, Mitnick, 59K) says the "vague language of the summit communiqué reflected the awkward effort to restart negotiations."

The AP (2/20, Gearan) adds, "The prospect of any immediate success here essentially was hijacked by Abbas' surprise announcement last week that he will govern hand-in-hand with the militant group Hamas."

AFP (2/20, Millikin) reports that after the talks, Olmert "insisted Israel would not cooperate with any government that did not meet international demands for peace, while Hamas lashed out at what it labeled US isolationism and 'blackmail.'"

Terrorists Strike At Train In India. ABC World News (2/19, story 3, :35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There was terror in India. The target a symbol of that country's peace process with neighboring Pakistan. Two bombs ignited a fire on a train called the Peace Express, which runs between the two countries. India and Pakistan are rival nuclear powers. Today, leaders in both countries denounced the attack, which killed 66 Indians and Pakistanis. The death toll could have been much higher – the entire train had been booby trapped. But the bombs went off in only two of the cars."

The CBS Evening News (2/19, story 3, :20, Mitchell, 7.66M) noted "leaders of both countries called" the attack "terrorism, but no one has claimed responsibility." Likewise, NBC Nightly News (2/19, story 8, :25, Williams, 9.87M) reported there's "no indication yet of who carried out the attack." The New York Times (2/20, Sengupta, 1.16M), among other major newspapers, also reports the story.

Moscow Warns Warsaw, Prague Over US Missile Shield. The Financial Times (2/20, Buckley, Cienski, Williamson) reports the commander of Russia's strategic missile forces, General Nikolai Solovtsov, Monday warned Poland and the Czech Republic they "could be targeted by Russian missiles if they host elements of the planned US missile defense system." The warning came "as both Warsaw and Prague signaled they were likely to respond positively" to US requests for them to host anti-missile defense bases. Also Monday, Germany "expressed concern about the stand-off over the missile defense project," with Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier "criticizing the US and NATO for not addressing Russia's worries over the system earlier." The Washington Times/AP (2/20, Isachenkov) also reports the story.

US Officials Urged To Avoid "Professions Of Eternal Friendship" Toward Russian Leaders. Anne Applebaum writes in the Washington Post (2/20, A13, 690K) that "Russian politicians still seem to make American politicians grow starry-eyed and lose their bearings. Perhaps it's a secret longing for the glamour of those Cold War summits, for the days when it seemed as if the personal relations between superpower statesmen could ward off the destruction of the entire planet. Or perhaps they put something in the vodka -- sorry, mineral water -- at those elegant Kremlin lunches. Either way, it's time to kick the habit. True, it is perfectly possible that whoever leads Russia after Putin steps down (if Putin steps down) will be a nicer, friendlier person. It is perfectly possible that we will find areas of cooperation with him, just as we sometimes do with Putin. But however friendly and cooperative, however much a 'democrat' he appears to be, I hope we'll avoid the instant professions of eternal friendship."

US, EU Closer To Deal On Transatlantic Trading Zone. The Financial Times (2/20, Bounds) reports, "The US and European Union could set a date for the creation of a transatlantic trading zone at a summit in April, diplomats say. The idea of harmonising rules and regulations between the world's biggest economies to boost growth has gathered momentum since Angela Merkel, German chancellor, embraced it in January." Both sides "have taken up the so-called Merkel initiative as a way of re-invigorating the partnership after tension over Iraq and the Doha trade round." Boyden Gray, US ambassador to the EU, said, "The political commitment is there from the president and members of his cabinet. It is a great opportunity." Gray "said it was likely the objective would be set at the summit but stressed that more work was needed on how it would be achieved."

Natsios Draws Criticism For Remarks On Sudan. In its "Embassy Row" column, the Washington Times (2/20, Morrison, 88K) reports US special envoy to Sudan, Andrew Natsios, "angered the Africa Action network by dismissing the term 'genocide' in connection with the humanitarian crisis in the Darfur region of the African nation." In an address earlier this month at Georgetown University, Natsios said, "The term 'genocide' is counter to the facts of what is really occurring in Darfur." Nii Akuetteh, executive director the Washington-based advocacy group, said Natsios' characterization "denies the reality on the ground and conflicts with numerous statements from the White House and State Department over the past two years."

Kristof Urges Bush To Join Carter's "War On Diseases" That Afflict World's Poor. Nicholas Kristof writes in the New York Times (2/20, 1.16M), "Ethiopia has the largest proportion of blind people in the world, 1.2 percent, because of the combined effects of river blindness and trachoma. As in many African countries, the wrenching emblem of poverty is a tiny child leading a blind beggar by a stick." In "remote places like this, former President Carter, at 82, is leading a private war on disease that should inspire and shame President Bush and other world leaders into joining. It's not just that Mr. Carter's wars have been more successful than Mr. Bush's; Mr. Carter is also rehabilitating the image of the US abroad and transforming the lives of the world's most wretched peoples. … So, President Bush, how about if we as a nation join Mr. Carter's war on diseases that afflict the world's poorest peoples -- and are one reason they are so poor. That's a war that would unite Americans, not divide them. Come on, Mr. Bush, sound the trumpets!"

WSJournal Suggests Argentina Is "Economic Banana Republic." The Wall Street Journal (2/20, 2.04M) editorializes, "Just when you think world economic policy might be moving in a more sensible direction, along comes Latin America. This month's lesson in how not to create prosperity comes from Argentina, which has decided that the way to whip inflation is to throw out inconvenient statistics. Recently the Peronist government of President Nestór Kirchner sacked an official at its National Statistics and Census Institute for refusing to agree to alter the 'methodology' used to calculate inflation in January." As his government "heads into the season of negotiating labor contracts, Mr. Kirchner has an incentive to underestimate inflation. And sure enough, five days after this dismissal, the government released its January inflation number of 1.1%, well below the 1.5% to 2% expected by non-government economists. … Mark it down as one more reason Argentina can't shake its reputation as an economic banana republic."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Draws Link Between Revolutionary War, Struggle Against Terror. USA Today (2/20, 8A, 2.27M) reports, "President Bush honored the 275th birthday of the nation's first president Monday, likening George Washington's long struggle that gave birth to a nation to the war on global terrorism. 'Today, we're fighting a new war to defend our liberty and our people and our way of life,' Bush said in front of Washington's home along the banks of the Potomac River in Mount Vernon, Va." Bush "chose the Presidents Day holiday to make his first visit as president to Mount Vernon. He and first lady Laura Bush helped lay a wreath at Washington's tomb, then the president gave a speech on the lawn of the estate." Bush quipped, "I feel right at home here. After all, this is the home of the first George W." The AP (2/20, Raum) notes Bush said, "As we work to advance the cause of freedom around the world, we remember that the father of our country believed that the freedoms we secured in our revolution were not meant for Americans alone. … Over the centuries, America has succeeded because we have always tried to maintain the decency and the honor of our first president."

Likewise, the Los Angeles Times (2/20, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports Bush "linked the ideals of the first president to the war being fought by the 43rd, saying Washington's goals guided the nation's quest to extend freedom beyond its borders."

The Washington Post (2/20, A5, Jackman, 690K), meanwhile, reports "Bush's remarks consisted mainly of a reflection on Washington's life and impact on the United States, with brief allusions to today's war."

But the New York Times (2/20, Stolberg, 1.16M) reports Bush "implicitly compared himself to his predecessor. 'With the advantage of hindsight, it is easy to take George Washington's successes for granted,' Mr. Bush said after enumerating Washington's achievements as commander of the Continental Army and later as president. But 'America's path to freedom was long and it was hard,' he continued, 'and the outcome was never really certain.'" McClatchy (2/20, Douglas) also says Bush "drew comparisons between America's first wartime president and the current one. He likened Washington's struggles in fighting for and forging democracy to his global war on terrorism."

The Washington Times (2/20, Dinan, 88K) reports, "As he nears the end of his own two terms as president and his Iraq policy faces heavy criticism, Mr. Bush, the 43rd president, seems to take solace in the fact that historians are still digesting the first president's legacy. 'My attitude is, if they're still analyzing No. 1, 43 ought not to worry about it and just do what he thinks is right, and make the tough choices necessary,' he said at a press conference late last year." Bush "clearly has done some of his own analyzing about Washington, praising him several times for being steady as a wartime leader. 'In the end, General Washington understood that the Revolutionary War was a test of wills, and his will was unbreakable,' he said."

Australian Official Says US Will Turn Hicks Over By End Of Year. The New York Times (2/19, Johnston, 1.16M) reports Australian Foreign Minister Alexander Downer said Sunday "that his government had reached a deal to allow David Hicks, who has been held at the American military base in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, for more than five years without trial, to return to Australia by the end of the year." American military prosecutors "have accused Mr. Hicks, 31, an Australian citizen, of attempted murder in violation of the laws of war and providing material support for terrorism. Mr. Hicks, who was captured in Afghanistan in late 2001, is expected to be formally charged soon." Downer said US authorities "had told him that if Mr. Hicks was found guilty by the military tribunal, he would be allowed to serve out his sentence in an Australian prison."

US To Conduct Large-Scale Anti-Terror Exercise On Guam. The Washington Times/AFP (2/20) reports, "The world's biggest anti-terrorism exercise will be held this year on Guam, underscoring the Pacific island's growing importance to Washington, officials said yesterday. Exercise TopOff4 is part of a series of large-scale maneuvers established to strengthen the U.S. ability to respond to terrorist attacks involving weapons of mass destruction." US Coast Guard Commander William Marhoffer said that "TopOff4 'is a domestic counterterrorism exercise. ... It involves the intelligence communities, the Department of Homeland Security, the FBI, the Department of Defense, the U.S. Coast Guard.' The exercise is expected to simulate a maritime terrorist attack."

Madrid Attack Defendant Says Refusal To Be Informant Prompted Arrest. The AP (2/20) reports, "A Moroccan who ran the shop where most of the cellphone cards used to set off the bombs in the 2004 Madrid train attacks were sold said Monday he was implicated in the case as punishment for refusing to be a police informant." Jamal Zougam "denied he was a member of al-Qaeda or other radical Islamic groups, or that he had ever trained in terrorist camps in Afghanistan. He also condemned the Madrid blasts, and said he had never thought of his host country as an enemy." In additional testimony yesterday, bombing suspect Syrian Basel Ghalyoun "acknowledged that he was a friend of Tunisian Serhan Ben Abdelmajid Fakhet and other ringleaders who blew themselves up as police moved to arrest them weeks after the attacks but denied having anything to do with the bombings."

European Terror Investigators Have Wider Powers Than US Counterparts. In a Wall Street Journal (2/20, 2.04M) column, Bret Stephens writes that the Napoleonic Code gives "French investigative magistrate and counterterrorism supremo Jean-Louis Bruguiere" many powers that the Constitution denies to US counter-terror officials. "In the U.S., Mr. Bruguiere's activities would amount to one long and tangled violation of the First, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth and Eighth Amendments to the Constitution. … In France, however, Mr. Bruguiere…is a folk hero." Stephens adds, "All this calls into question the seriousness, if not the sincerity, of European complaints that under the Bush administration the U.S. has become a serial human-rights violator. … When President Bush declared a war on terror after 9/11, it was because he had no other realistic legal alternative. And when the rest of us make invidious comparisons between Europe and America, we should keep our fundamental differences in mind. There is no European 82nd Airborne, and there is no American Jean-Louis Bruguiere."

Trial Of Accused Madrid Train Bombers Broadcast Over Web. The New York Times (2/19, Carvajal, 1.16M) reports that on the "opening day of Spain's trial of 29 men accused in the deadly Madrid train bombings, police officers ringed the maximum-security brick courtroom while a helicopter whirled overhead." But with "the click of a computer mouse, anyone can peek inside the inner sanctum for a glimpse of Spanish judges in black robes with white lace cuffs facing suspects barricaded behind bulletproof glass." That "YouTube-style window has been opened by a high-tech legal services company, Datadiar, which is streaming live coverage of the trial on its Web site, datadiar.com, and posting archived video testimony that began with the appearance on Thursday of the first suspect, Rabei Osman Sayed Ahmed, known as Muhammad the Egyptian" The "rare running view of what stands to be a legal marathon is of keen interest to a nation still haunted by questions about who set off the bombs on March 11, 2004, killing 191 and wounding nearly 2,000 on four commuter trains."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

DHS Ramps Up Nuclear Weapons Detection Efforts. U.S. News and World Report (2/26, Marek, 2.03M) reports, "Nuclear bombs are the rare weapon that can kill hundreds of thousands. And experts say the unleashing of a dirty bomb-a conventional explosive laced with radioactive material-could sicken thousands of people and cause unparalleled economic damage. So it's not surprising that DHS and New York-area authorities are planning an aggressive approach in coming months: They'll surround Manhattan with radiation detectors they hope can sniff out a weapon before it does harm. But it's an ambitious, expensive effort, and critics worry they're going too far, too fast. … Today's detection efforts, however, are limited by technology." The "vast majority" of machines "can't distinguish between harmful and harmless, naturally occurring radiation. Still, DHS's current approach has been quietly gaining speed in the past year."

U.S. News and World Report (2/26, Kingsbury, 2.03M) also reports that in December 1945, Robert Oppenheimer wasquoted as saying, "If you hired me to walk through the cellars of Washington to see whether there were atomic bombs, I think my most important tool would be a screwdriver to open the crates and look. I think that just walking by, swinging a little gadget would not give me the information." US News adds, "Not everyone completely agrees; Department of Homeland Security officials say new state-of-the-art detectors can do a much better job than that. But the basic point is still valid-and alarming."

DHS To Work With States On Chemical Plant Security Concerns. USA Today (2/20, 3A, Hall, 2.27M) reports, "New government rules seeking to thwart terrorist attacks on chemical plants are facing stiff opposition from state leaders, environmentalists and others who say the regulations are flawed, vague and unlikely to protect the public." Sen. Joe Lieberman has wrote to DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff this month saying that the rules, set to take effect in April, "are seriously flawed and could have a very harmful impact." Agency spokesman Russ Knocke "says the department is reviewing the complaints and will work with plant managers, state officials and other groups to address their concerns." USA Today notes that New Jersey Gov. Jon Corzine has complained that the federal rules would weaken "stricter chemical security rules" passed in his state in 2005. However, "Knocke says the nation must have uniform security policies."

Congressional Democrats Urge Tighter Security For Subways. USA Today (2/19, 1A, Hall, 2.27M) reports congressional Democrats "now in charge of homeland security are pushing ahead with legislation to tighten security in the nation's subways and other mass-transit systems." Senate Banking and Urban Affairs committee Chairman Chris Dodd, D-Conn. said, "These are ripe, easy targets. Commuters shouldn't have to play Russian roulette when they get on the train in the morning." USA adds Dodd's panel "has approved legislation authorizing

$3.5 billion over the next three years on transit security. The committee oversees mass transit." Meanwhile, House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Bennie Thompson "says his panel's legislation will mandate more training for transit workers, whistle-blower protection for those who reveal security lapses, increased screening at stations and federal grants for mass-transit security."

NYTimes Calls For Repeal Of Provisions That Ease Declaration Of Martial Law. The New York Times (2/19, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "A disturbing recent phenomenon in Washington is that laws that strike to the heart of American democracy have been passed in the dead of night. So it was with a provision quietly tucked into the enormous defense budget bill at the Bush administration's behest that makes it easier for a president to override local control of law enforcement and declare martial law." The provision, "signed into law in October, weakens two obscure but important bulwarks of liberty." The first, posse comitatus, "is the doctrine that bars military forces, including a federalized National Guard, from engaging in law enforcement." The other "is the Insurrection Act of 1807, which provides the major exemptions to posse comitatus. It essentially limits a president's use of the military in law enforcement to putting down lawlessness, insurrection and rebellion, where a state is violating federal law or depriving people of constitutional rights." There is "a bipartisan bill, introduced by Senators Patrick Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, and Christopher Bond, Republican of Missouri, and backed unanimously by the nation's governors, that would repeal the stealthy revisions. Congress should pass it."

Justice Sought For Japanese Taken From Latin America During WWII. In a n op-ed for the Washington Post (2/19, A19, 690K) Reps. Xavier Becerra and Dan Lungren write, "2,300 people of Japanese descent from 13 Latin American countries who were taken from their homes and forcibly transported to the Crystal City camp during World War II. The U.S. government orchestrated and financed the deportation of Japanese Latin Americans for use in prisoner-of-war exchanges with Japan. Eight hundred people were sent across the Pacific, while the remaining Japanese Latin Americans were held in camps without due process until after the war ended.." The congressmen add, "Further study of the events surrounding the deportation and incarceration of Japanese Latin Americans is merited and necessary. That is why we have introduced H.R. 662, the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Latin Americans of Japanese Descent Act."

Settlement Expected In Hurricane Lawsuits. USA Today (2/19, 1B, Chu, 2.27M) reports, "The first major insurance settlement involving a group of hurricane-damaged homes in Louisiana is in its final stages and could be announced as soon as in a week or two, according to the attorney for the homeowners who sued. The likely multimillion-dollar deal would cover about 165 homeowners insured by Louisiana Citizens -- the state-created insurer of last resort -- in Cameron Parish, where the 2005 hurricanes reduced homes to slabs, says Jennifer Jones, the homeowners' lawyer." Jones "cautioned that the settlement could still be scuttled. But if it succeeds, it could provide a model for resolving hundreds other such cases in the state. The deal would not affect thousands of homes damaged by the New Orleans levee breach after Hurricane Katrina."

Katrina "Voluntourists" Noted. USA Today (2/19, Copeland, 2.27M) reports on Katrina "voluntourists," a "massive wave of volunteers -- half a million, by one estimate -- who have come here from across the nation in the nearly 18 months since Katrina struck. In storm-ravaged Mississippi, their impact has been immeasurable. From Pascagoula in the east to Bay St. Louis in the west, these volunteers have been the one positive constant for residents who have battled through lengthy power outages, mosquito infestations, stuffy FEMA trailers, recalcitrant insurers and an often molasses-slow government bureaucracy."

Many In New Orleans Said To Be Ready To Leave City. The CBS Evening News (2/19, story 9, 2:25, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported that as "a successful Mardi Gras" in New Orleans comes to a close, more than 700,000 tourists are set to leave following Fat Tuesday, and "many of the city's prominent residents may soon be following." CBS (Smith) continued, "A recent study by the University of New Orleans found that nearly a third of the people here say they might be moving in the next two years. For people who stayed after the storm, day-to-day life in the big easy has been anything but. … The homicide rate is one of the highest in the country and 17 officers a month are quitting the police department." City councilman Oliver Thomas was shown saying that living in the city is "a little tougher right now. But it's worth it."

WAR NEWS:

Al Qaeda Attack Against US Outpost In Iraq Raises Alarms. Coverage of yesterday's attack on a US outpost outside Baghdad, reportedly carried our by an Al Qaeda-linked group, is being portrayed as an ominous sign for President Bush's new Iraq strategy. All three networks led with the story, which is also being covered on the front pages of today's major newspapers. ABC World News (2/19, lead story, 2:45, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Part of the President's new plan in Baghdad is to place US forces in a number of outposts in and around the city. One of those outposts, heavily-fortified, occupied by about 100 American troops, came under attack today. Two Americans were killed, 17 wounded. The attack raises new concerns. If the additional US troops now in the city restrict insurgents, will they start attacking outside the city? And it raises the question about whether smaller outposts put America's troops in greater danger." Here's ABC's Miguel Marquez." ABC (Marquez) added, "Explosions thundered throughout Iraq today, as insurgents appeared to mount a surge of their own. … The Al Qaeda group, Islamic State of Iraq, claimed the responsibility for the attack. The claims couldn't be verified. As many as 60 similar bases will eventually house US troops taking part in the surge. They are smaller and less secure than most other US bases." ABC World News (2/19, story 2, 1:40, Gibson, 8.78M) later reported, "Overall, six US troops died in Iraq today, bringing this month's US death toll to 59."

The CBS Evening News (2/19, lead story, 2:25, Mitchell, 7.66M) attributed the attack to "Sunni insurgents," and said they "are responding to the US and Iraqi sweep of Baghdad with some new tactics of their own. They made a direct in-your-face attack today on a US combat base outside Baghdad." CBS (Logan) added, "This was a rare and brazen assault on a US base carried out in broad daylight by gunmen intent on killing and wounding as many American soldiers as possible."

NBC Nightly News (2/19, lead story, 2:05, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There is a strong possibility that we are looking at a big change in the war in Iraq happening right now before our very eyes." NBC (Arraf) added, "Al Qaeda in Iraq has claimed responsibility for this attack," one "US officials are calling coordinated and sophisticated. It was also devastating. … Interior Ministry sources say it happened like this. Two suicide bombers drove their cars to the outer perimeter of a police station used by US forces. That perimeter was protected by concrete blast barriers and barbed wire. They detonated the cars, killing two soldiers at the gates. As other US troops rushed out of the police station a third bomber drove up and detonated his car. A building in the compound collapsed. Then a firefight broke out between US troops and insurgents armed with rocket propelled grenades, sniper rifles and AK-47's. As the fighting raged, American helicopters touched down to evacuate wounded soldiers. Tonight, US troops have sealed the roads in and out of the farming community where for the last few months, the only defense against Sunni insurgents have been the US soldiers attacked today."

NBC Nightly News (2/19, story 2, 2:00, Engel, 9.87M) later reported, "We're seeing foot patrols again in Baghdad that we haven't seen in a long time. More hearts and mind campaign. There are also vulnerabilities. These small bases are not as well protected. What we saw today is that the enemy is trying to probe the weaknesses and look for weaknesses in the new battle plan and it looks like they found at least one. … It is very much a new war. A lot of people say this feels like 2003, that the war is starting again. This is a new battle plan. The battle plan to end the war in Iraq and finally establish some sort of stability."

The New York Times (2/20, Santora, 1.16M) reports the attack "appeared to be part of a renewed drive by insurgents in recent weeks as more American and Iraqi troops flood the streets of Baghdad and thousands of marines head to western Anbar Province to try to stem the violence. Hundreds of Iraqis have died in a recent wave of car bombings in Baghdad and elsewhere." Insurgents "have been able to shoot down more helicopters through coordinated assaults, captured documents suggest, and American and Iraqi military officials say they are concerned that militants are moving to areas where the American troop presence remains thin."

The Washington Post (2/20, A8, Londono, Ricks, 690K) also says "the coordinated frontal attack -- which occurred as hundreds of American soldiers are being deployed to small, similarly vulnerable inner-city posts -- appeared to be a shift toward more aggressive tactics. … Sunni insurgent attacks on U.S. forces have become increasingly sophisticated and effective in recent months." The Los Angeles Times (2/20, Daragahi, 850K) runs a similar report.

The Chicago Tribune (2/20, Janega, 617K) also recounts that "in a sign of the sectarian tensions threatening the country, a Sunni woman appeared on television to say she had been raped by Iraqi national police, most of whom are Shiite. The charge was rejected by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, who called it 'made-up noise.'" Sunnis "have criticized the new security plan, saying they are being unfairly targeted. The Sunni woman's allegation that she was assaulted by three members of the national police fed Sunni apprehensions about 'Impose the Law.'"

Car Bombs Kill At Least 11 In Baghdad. The AP (2/20) reports, "Car bombs killed at least 11 people in Baghdad on Tuesday as militants show increasing defiance to a major security operation in the capital. ... More than 100 people have been killed in the Baghdad area since Sunday, when twin blasts in a market claimed 62 lives. U.S. and Iraqi forces last week launched a massive effort of house-to-house searches and checkpoints around Baghdad to try to cripple extremist factions."

Decline In Number Of Insurgent Attacks Seen As Temporary "Lull." USA Today (2/20, 11A, Dorell, Jervis, 2.27M) reports "the number of extremist attacks in Baghdad has declined over the past two weeks since a new security plan took hold, although the relative lull may be short-lived, the US military said Monday. Bombings on Monday that killed more than 40 Iraqis demonstrated that extremists were still staging attacks aimed at grabbing headlines," but "the overall number of attacks on US and Iraqi troops has fallen, said Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a spokesman for the US military." Gen. David Petraeus, "the new commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, warned last month that it could be late summer before it becomes clear whether the new security plan is working." Mohamed Al Daiyni, "a member of Al Tawafek, the largest Sunni coalition in the parliament, said violence was down because 'all the fighting groups are hiding.' 'If there is any lull in violence, it will be temporary,' Al Daiyni said."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/20, Peterson, 59K) reports "Iraqi and American forces are meeting mixed results – that often vary street by street and day by day – as they struggle to regain control of Baghdad. … Some neighborhoods are seeing tentative early progress in this city of 6 million, where a surge of Iraqi and American forces started last week." The Monitor adds, "Shiite areas controlled by the Mahdi Army, loyal to anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, are meant to be a particular US target because of links with death squads that have been killing dozens of Sunnis a day. Maliki's government, which relies on Mr. Sadr's supporter to rule, is reported to have pushed for Sunni areas to be cleaned up first. Sunni leaders have cried foul."

Marines In Anbar Province Cope With "Daily Grind." The Los Angeles Times (2/20, Perry, 850K) reports, "Rather than charge into battle, most Marines in Iraq's western desert are engaged in nation building on a piecemeal basis, the kind of venture…Bush once publicly disdained. Trained to win quick, decisive victories with firepower and bravery, Marines in Al Anbar province instead face a daily grind. Most never fire their weapons. ... What has changed is not the violence, but the U.S. expectations. ... Now the watchword is that all gains are small and that prevailing here could take years. ... A counterinsurgency operation such as the one in Al Anbar is slow, and gauging its progress is like trying to measure a child's growth on a daily basis, Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer said. Even when there are hopeful signs, they are contradicted by disappointing ones."

Democrats Readying Draft Of War Reauthorization. CNN's Situation Room (2/19) reported, "Democratic sources say the Senate Foreign Relations and Armed Services chairmen are now writing a resolution reauthorizing the war, but limiting US troops in Iraq to a support, not a combat role." In a phone interview from Iraq, Senator Jon Kyl told CNN that limiting the mission there "would be a huge mistake when we are just beginning to execute a new strategy."

On Fox News' "Your World With Neil Cavuto" (2/19, Cavuto), Rep. Tom Davis, an opponent of the Iraq troop surge, said the House resolution passed last week "sends a lot of messages. This is a democracy. And, of course, there is a lot of dissent, even within the Pentagon, about this troop surge. That's why some generals were replaced. … I am afraid that the surge is going to produce more Gold Star moms. … The Iraqis have to step to the plate. And one of the things this resolution did, in my opinion, is, it sends a very strong message to the Iraqis. They are going to have to step up to the plate. And they can't rely on Americans to continue to do this."

House GOP Leaders, Conservatives Activists Target Surge Critics. The Politico (2/20, O'Connor, Kraushaar) reports House Republican leaders "and conservative activists are targeting critics of President Bush's plan to send more combat forces into Iraq -- and some GOP lawmakers are on the hit list." Amid a "mounting campaign in Congress to limit Bush's military options, conservatives led by talk show host Hugh Hewitt have created an advocacy group designed to counter the anti-war MoveOn.org. And its first round of targets will be the 17 GOP lawmakers who voted for last week's Democratic resolution in the House opposing the troop increases." The first member in "the sights of the new Victory Caucus is Rep. Ric Keller, R-Fla., whose district includes Orlando." House Republicans are also "hitting Democrats who represent districts Bush won in hopes of preventing a congressional majority that would restrict money for Afghanistan and Iraq. The GOP is flooding those districts with news releases and e-mails warning that Democrats are undermining U.S. troops." Republicans "claim the campaign already has paid off in South Dakota, where the Sioux Falls Argus Leader ran a column over the weekend highlighting how Democratic Rep. Stephanie Herseth is pinched between party leaders and conservative voters in the state."

Fineman Says Republicans "Caved." On MSNBC's "Hardball" (2/19, Matthews), MSNBC political analyst Howard Fineman said congressional Republicans "are throwing away what little credibility they have. They are giving in to…Bush in his effort to prevent the Congress from doing anything. … [If congressional Democrats] can't get this resolution, how are they going to get one to cut off funding for the troops? Because that is much more dangerous politically. One would have thought that this was pretty much of an easy get for almost all members of Congress. But the White House put on the pressure and the Republicans caved, virtually all of them."

Democrats' Possible Strategies Outlined. E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (2/20, A13, 690K), "Two things are now abundantly clear about the future of US policy toward Iraq. First, majorities in both houses of Congress have lost faith in President Bush's approach to the war. Second, the president will do all he can to resist changing his strategy by trying to split his critics into ineffectual factions. Bush's choice is certainly bad for opponents of the war, but it's also bad for American foreign policy. … For now, the war's opponents are focused on three strategies. One would be to cut off funds for the war, but there is currently no majority in either house for this. A second approach, expected to come from Rep. John Murtha

(D-Pa.), would propose restrictions on troop deployments -- for example, forbidding the redeployment of units that have been home for less than a year and imposing substantial training requirements on the troops who are sent. … A third path, offered by Sens. Joseph Biden (D-Del.) and Carl Levin (D-Mich.), would have Congress revisit its original 2002 Iraq resolution to make clear that the war authorized then (against Saddam Hussein and what turned out to be nonexistent weapons of mass destruction) had nothing to do with putting American troops in the midst of a Muslim civil war now." Rep. Chris Van Hollen "has an additional idea: Opponents of the war need to force full consideration of the original Baker-Hamilton proposals."

Vilsack Calls For Taking US Troops "Out Of Harm's Way." In an interview with CNN's Situation Room (2/19, 5:15PM), Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack said, "Capping the number of troops" in Iraq "is simply maintaining the status quo, staying the course." Instead, he said the US needs "a change of course. We need to take our troops out of harm's way and we need to do it now." Calling the situation in Iraq a "civil war," Vilsack said the war "can only be resolved in a political resolution among the Iraqis themselves. And it's time to transfer responsibility to make those decisions to the Iraqis."

House Vote Unlikely To Impact Bush's Iraq Policy. U.S. News and World Report (2/26, Brush, 2.03M) reports, "Congress has been talking about it for weeks, jousting, posturing, and trading partisan jabs. Last week, the Democrats who control the House of Representatives finally got around to actually voting on President Bush's new policy in Iraq. … While it was a resounding vote of no confidence in the president's plan, it was also just the first of many legislative battles as Congress decides how strenuously to exert its constitutional powers to control funding for the war." According to US News, "the president shows no signs of backing away from his insistence on 'victory.' He hopes that the situation improves and that Iraqi forces can gradually take more responsibility." White House advisers "are clinging to the hope that, in the end, most congressional Democrats won't vote to cut off funds for the troops."

Iran's Quds Force Reportedly Close To US Allies In Iraq. Newsweek (2/26, Dickey, Barry, 3.12M) reports, "The Iranian Special Operations unit called the Quds Force has for years been accused, with or without evidence, of assassinations and terrorist attacks as far away as Argentina. But its specialty is different: striking fear in the hearts of generals. Over the past 25 years, the Quds Force has proved ferociously effective at organizing, training and equipping guerrillas to confront the world's most vaunted armies. Quds played a vital role in creating Hizbullah to fight the Israelis in Lebanon. It supported the legendary Ahmed Shah Massoud against the Russians and his Taliban rivals in Afghanistan. Quds helped the Bosnians hold back the Serbian war machine. And now -- it's in Iraq." Quds "appears to be as close to America's Shiite and Kurdish allies as to splinter groups. … The relationship between the Quds Force and figures like Iraqi President Jalal Talabani or Abdul Aziz al-Hakim of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (both of whom have been received in the White House recently) goes back two decades to the days when only Tehran was aiding Saddam Hussein's enemies."

Reaction To Iranian Weapons Allegations Seen As Evidence Of "Credibility Gap." U.S. News and World Report (2/26, Mulrine, Whitelaw, 2.03M) reports, "It should have been a pretty straightforward case: Shiite militias are using Iranian weapons to kill U.S. soldiers in Iraq. On that, the evidence is clear. But when unnamed officials at a hastily convened briefing in Baghdad went a step further, accusing Iranian officials 'at the highest levels' of funneling a particularly deadly form of roadside bomb to the Shiite militias, it raised more questions than it answered. For one thing, while the analysts laid out detailed evidence that the armor-piercing 'explosively formed penetrators,' or EFPs, originated in Iran, they offered nothing to support the allegation of Iranian government involvement. Confusing matters further, several senior U.S. officials-including the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Peter Pace, Gen. William Caldwell, the chief spokesman for U.S. forces in Iraq, and even President Bush-made a point of walking back from the accusation. … In Washington and other capitals, many were left questioning the allegations and wondering aloud what, exactly, the Bush administration was hoping to achieve." US news adds, "The Bush White House ran smack into a growing credibility gap of its own making -- a hangover from its handling of intelligence regarding Iraq's alleged weapons of mass destruction before the invasion."

State Department, Pentagon Reach Deal On Iraq Reconstruction Jobs. The New York Times (2/20, A6, Shanker, 1.16M) reports the Pentagon and State Department "have worked out a deal to send a small number of military personnel and Defense Department civilians to Iraq for several months until Foreign Service officers and State Department contract workers with specialized skills can fill those jobs," senior officials said Monday. The discussions over filling the posts "had exposed tensions between the military and civilian agencies over how to share responsibilities in carrying out President Bush's new strategy for stabilizing and rebuilding Iraq -- in particular, how to fill hazardous positions in new provincial reconstruction teams." The State Department had asked the Pentagon "to come up with military personnel or civilians to fill about one-third of the 350 new State Department jobs in Iraq. While the numbers involved are relatively small, the debate raised larger issues of whether the government was properly organized to carry out a long-term occupation of a country like Iraq."

Iraq Refugee Plan Faces Bipartisan Opposition. The Washington Times (2/20, Hudson, 88K) reports the State Department's plan to admit 7,000 Iraqi refugees into the United States this year "is meeting with some resistance on both sides of the political aisle." Rep. Tom Tancredo (R) "says the policy flies in the face of US law" and Ohio Gov. Ted Strickland (D) "says refugees are not welcome in his state." However, the program "has the support of key Democrats in the Senate, including Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and Sen. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, who say the United States should contribute $30 million, half the cost of refugee-resettlement worldwide." Sen. Kennedy argues that the US has "a moral responsibility to do all that we can" since "our invasion of Iraq led to this crisis, and we have a clear responsibility to do more to ease it."

Many Iraqis Opposed To Allowing Foreign Involvement In Oil Industry. The Wall Street Journal (2/20, Cummins, Hafidh, Jordan, 2.04M) reports, "Foreign technology and capital are seen as vital to restoring Iraq's crumbling oil industry. But as a draft petroleum law inches its way toward the Iraqi parliament, fresh opposition to the legislation is emerging, underscoring the difficulty that may still lie ahead for any move to invite in international oil companies." US officials and "petroleum experts have been advising Iraqi politicians almost from the start of the American occupation nearly four years ago about how to build a legal framework that would enable foreign oil-field development. International majors have been reluctant to venture into the country until violence subsides and before politicians endorse a law spelling out legal rights and financial terms for foreign firms." The Journal adds, "In its current form, the legislation envisions the re-creation of an Iraqi state oil company, and it gives broad latitude to officials from the country's various regions to encourage foreign investment and development. … The legislation still faces significant political hurdles. Earlier this month, an influential union of oil workers in the country's south said it will oppose the legislation." Also, "the nationalization of the Iraqi oil industry in the 1970s under Saddam Hussein remains a point of pride for many Iraqis, and opposition still runs deep to any hint of foreign interference. Also, opposition has emerged from prominent former Iraqi oil officials, who have recently fled the country's chaos but continue to hold some sway in Baghdad's oil bureaucracy."

North Africa Could Be New War On Terror Front. The New York Times (2/20, Smith, 1.16M) reports from Tunisia, "The plan, hatched for months in the arid mountains of North Africa, was to attack the American and British Embassies here. It ended in a series of gun battles in January that killed a dozen militants and left two Tunisian security officers dead. ... Counterterrorism officials on three continents say the trouble in Tunisia is the latest evidence that a brutal Algerian group with a long history of violence is acting on its promise: to organize extremists across North Africa and join the remnants of Al Qaeda into a new international force for jihad." Experts "say North Africa, with its vast, thinly governed stretches of mountain and desert, could become an Afghanistan-like terrorist hinterland within easy striking distance of Europe. That is all the more alarming because of the deep roots that North African communities have in Europe and the ease of travel between the regions. For the United States, the threat is also real because of visa-free travel to American cities for most European passport holders. The violent Algerian group the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, known by its French initials G.S.P.C., has for several years been under American watch."

Moroccans Lured To Join Insurgency In Iraq. The Washington Post (2/20, A1, Whitlock, 690K) reports from Morocco, "About two dozen men from Tetouan and nearby towns in the Rif Mountains have traveled to Iraq in the past 18 months to volunteer as fighters or suicide bombers, according to local residents and officials. Moroccan authorities said the men were recruited by international terrorist networks affiliated with al-Qaeda that have deepened their roots in North Africa since the invasion of Iraq four years ago. ... Foreign fighters in Iraq account for only a small percentage of the combatants attacking U.S. troops and their Iraqi allies. U.S. military officials and independent analysts peg the number at no more than a few thousand. But as the war drags on, it continues to serve as a powerful rallying tool for radical Islamic networks around the world that have developed recruiting pipelines as far afield as Europe and Southeast Asia. Moroccan authorities said they have identified more than 50 volunteers who have gone to Iraq since 2003, and many more are believed to have made the journey undetected. ... Morocco and its neighbors are finding it increasingly difficult to suppress the militants. Several networks that used to operate independently in North Africa have put aside their differences, united in part by the ongoing violence in Iraq."

Afghan Forces Retake Western Town. The AP (2/20, Shah) reports, "Afghan security forces supported by NATO troops on Tuesday retook a town in western Afghanistan that briefly had fallen to Taliban militants, an official said. About 200 Afghan police and soldiers moved into the remote town of Bakwa in Farah province at 5 a.m. and faced no resistance, said Gov. Muhajuddin Baluch. ... It was the second time this month that the government has lost control of a district in the region." The AP adds, "Meanwhile, a U.S. soldier was killed during combat operations on Monday in the Naray area of eastern Kunar province, the U.S. military said in a brief statement." AFP (2/20) reports the retaking of the town but adds that Taliban members "have been holding the southern town of Musa Qala -- about 150 kilometres (93 miles) east of Bakwa -- for more than two weeks. The authorities say they are waiting for the right time to retake the area. ... Afghanistan's government is unable to establish a presence and maintain authority in vast swathes of the volatile country."

Before that development, the New York Times (2/20, Wafa, 1.16M) reported, "Taliban insurgents seized control of a district in southwestern Afghanistan on Monday as the Afghan police abandoned their post and fled, officials said." The district "is the second to fall into Taliban hands this month, and its capture underlines the precarious hold of the government and NATO troops in the remote districts of southern Afghanistan."

British Troops Destroy Taliban Stronghold. USA Today (2/20, 8A, 2.27M) reports, "British NATO forces destroyed a 'major Taliban headquarters and stronghold' in Garmsir, in Afghanistan's Helmand province, Lt. Col. Rory Bruce said Monday at the British task force headquarters in London." He said "the troops killed a 'significant number' of Taliban fighters and disrupted their command system."

NATO Urged To Focus On Defeating Taliban, Not Combating Narcotics Trade. Vanda Felbab-Brown, a research fellow at the Brookings Institution, writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/20, A16, 2.04M), "As NATO braces for a spring Taliban offensive in Afghanistan, many in the Bush administration, the Congress and the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime are calling for it to take on a prominent role in combating the narcotics trade. Although this task is meant to help Afghanistan repress the worrisome, if predictable, expansion of its opium economy, it will greatly hamper NATO's effectiveness." NATO's "crucial role is to establish security throughout the country -- and not to dilute its focus in eradication and interdiction missions that are presently bound to fail." NATO "does have an important role to play in counternarcotics -- namely, to defeat the insurgency."

Al Qaeda Reportedly Regrouping In Pakistan.

NBC Nightly News (2/19, story 3, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There are new anxieties this evening about what is said to be Al Qaeda's new strength in a remote part of the world where the US has been fighting them since shortly after 9/11. ... Andrea Mitchell reports tonight on the resurgence of Al Qaeda in bin Laden territory." NBC (Mitchell) added, "More than five years after 9/11, US officials say Al Qaeda leaders are back, out of their caves, re-establishing command and control. Setting up small training camps in northwest Pakistan, only half a mile from the Afghan border, unleashing a new generation of terrorists." Maj. Gen. Azhar Ali Shah, Pakistan Army: "It is physically not possible to 100% seal the [Afghan] border." Mitchell: "Another reason for Al Qaeda's resurgence, experts say, the war in Iraq." Prof. Bruce Hoffman, terrorism expert: "They've seen in our entanglement in Iraq, an opportunity, an enormous opportunity to resuscitate themselves, to continue to marshal their forces."

The CBS Evening News (2/19, story 2, 2:05, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Another US soldier was killed today in Afghanistan. President Bush is calling for a NATO troop buildup there for a spring offensive against Al Qaeda. But the terror network apparently is building up its forces as well." CBS (Axelrod) added, "Western intelligence sources say these pictures show Al Qaeda training camps operating in remote areas of Pakistan near the Afghanistan border. After years spent running for their lives, the highest ranking Al Qaeda leaders are now beginning to reassert their command-and-control structure at camps where jihadists are trained and the next large-scale attacks on the West are planned." CBS consultant John Brennan: "Zawahiri is probably having operational engagement with a number of his lieutenants and commanders, so it is a worrisome development." ... Axelrod: "This reemergence of an Al Qaeda threat in the borderlands has prompted President Bush to act. Some 3,200 US troops who are set to come home from Afghanistan have now been ordered to stay."

Pakistan's Ambassador in Washington, Mahmud Durrani, told CNN's Situation Room (2/19, 7:02PM) that "there may be an odd place" where they are hiding out, but "to say they have reestablished themselves and there are a lot of compounds and they're rejuvenated, that is incorrect." The ambassador also "rejects any notion of American forces crossing into Pakistan to go after Al Qaeda, even though they have targeted forces there from the air."

Hoffman Argues For Multipronged Strategy Against Al Qaeda. In the Los Angeles Times (2/20, 850K), op-ed contributor and Georgetown professor Bruce Hoffman writes, "Al Qaeda's stunning resurrection, before the very eyes of American military forces stationed across the border in southern Afghanistan, begs the question of how the most powerful country in the world can launch a six-year, no-holds-barred, global war on terrorism — at great cost to its pocketbook and international standing — only to find the main target of these Herculean efforts still alive and kicking. In retrospect, it appears that Iraq blinded us to the possibility of an Al Qaeda renaissance. ... Pakistan is both the problem and the solution to the most salient terrorist threat still directed against us. Al Qaeda and its Taliban allies could not function without the passive connivance of Pakistani authorities." Hoffman recommends three tactics to defeat Al Qaeda: "Defeating Al Qaeda requires, foremost, that our assessments and analyses be anchored firmly to sound, empirical judgment and not blinded by conjecture and wishful thinking. Second, we need to refocus our attention and efforts on Pakistan and Afghanistan, where, in the months after 9/11, Al Qaeda was indeed on the run. Third, Al Qaeda cannot be defeated by military means alone because it relies on propaganda and radicalization."

Syrian Opposition Leader Says Assad Regime Complicit In Terrorism. Farid N. Ghadry, president of the Reform Party of Syria, writes in today's Washington Times (2/20, 88K), "The Syrian regime is just as complicit as Iran in moving forward hostile activities specifically designed to kill Americans. The evidence is there and widely acknowledged by those in the know, but US political and military leadership have proved hesitant to publicly pursue a tandem case against both Iran and Syria, despite the very prominent linkages that exist between the two in fermenting a wide spectrum of terror operations targeting US forces. … Regional intelligence services and inside sources from within Sunni officer corps opposed to the Assad regime have identified major foreign-fighter training camps in northern Syria and just outside Damascus overseen by Syrian Military Intelligence and run by former Iraqi Ba'athi Generals and senior Saddam Fedayeen commanders. One major foreign fighter camp exists in the Latakia province in northern Syria, a mountainous area replete with Syrian Military Intelligence facilities and wide swaths of ostensibly government property closed to the public." Ghadry adds, "The al Qaeda connection is not that far removed. Arab papers report that the recent movement of large numbers of al Qaeda in Iraq fighters from Syria into Palestinian refugee camps in northern Lebanon and Beirut are sounding alarm bells that the Syrian security services are preparing to use these heavily armed and visibly well-funded cells to launch attacks against the anti-Syrian democratic government of Lebanon."

NYTimes Says Army "Lowering Its Expectations" To Fill Ranks. The New York Times (2/20, 1.16M) editorializes, "To keep filling the ranks, the Army has had to keep lowering its expectations. ... So the Army has found itself recklessly expanding the granting of 'moral waivers,' which let people convicted of serious misdemeanors and even some felonies enlist in its ranks. ... Those who have committed more serious crimes, especially those involving weapons, vehicular homicide or sexual abuse, should generally be denied moral waivers. And those who do qualify for waivers should be monitored, counseled and carefully supervised. The fastest way to drop the rate of moral waivers would be for the Army to rebuild its recently tarnished reputation among less problematic young Americans. That will require an end to involuntarily extended tours of duty and accelerated, multiple redeployments into combat."

Dismissal Of US Attorneys Sparks Continuing Commentary. The Hartford Courant (2/19) editorializes, "A decision by Justice Department officials to fire federal prosecutor Carol C. Lam in San Diego for unspecified performance-related reasons is getting curiouser and curiouser." The Courant continues, "Ms. Lam is among a dozen U.S. attorneys around the country who have been told to resign. Justice Department officials say the firings are for just cause; in Ms. Lam's case at least, the decision appears to be just political. … Ms. Lam headed the investigation into former U.S. Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, a prominent San Diego Republican who pleaded guilty last year to tax evasion, conspiring to commit bribery, wire fraud and mail fraud. Prosecutors say Mr. Cunningham accepted at least $2.5 million in bribes from defense contractors." The Courant adds, "On Tuesday, a San Diego grand jury returned an 11-count indictment against Kyle 'Dusty' Foggo, the CIA's executive director from November 2004 to May of last year. Mr. Foggo is accused of steering business to his friend, Brent R. Wilkes, a California businessman and top Republican fundraiser. … The Cunningham and Foggo probes are pieces of a larger, ongoing investigation into the way lawmakers directed federal contracts toward friends and campaign supporters. … Both inquiries were overseen by Ms. Lam." The Courant concludes, "Her firing appears to have less to do with performance-related deficiency than it does political retaliation by high-level Justice Department officials who may also be attempting to derail an investigation that's potentially embarrassing to other members of Congress and the White House."

In a column for the Seattle Post-Intelligencer (2/20), University of Richmond law professor Carl Tobias writes, "The controversy involving December's forced resignation of U.S. Attorneys, who are the chief prosecutors for six federal districts in the West, has heated up and focused on John McKay, who recently stepped down as the U.S. Attorney for the Western District of Washington." Tobias continues, "On Feb. 6, the Senate Judiciary Committee held a hearing to analyze whether the Department of Justice was sacrificing prosecutorial independence by politicizing U.S. Attorney firing and hiring. Because it is unclear why McKay was forced out, Congress must continue evaluating his departure, and, if he resigned for questionable reasons, it should address them. … The hearing produced certain information, yet it provoked new questions. Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty testified that the resignations were for non-specific 'performance-related' reasons. This prompted an immediate, sharp response from Western District of Washington Chief Judge Robert Lasnik and his colleagues: 'We unanimously agreed that (John McKay) was an absolutely superb U.S. Attorney (and for DOJ) to suggest otherwise is unfair.' He elaborated that local prosecutors and sheriffs and the FBI 'never had the kind of service' in terms of 'cooperation and aggressive handling of cases that they had under McKay's leadership.'" Tobias adds, "The expeditious, thorough, informed response by the Western District judges is extraordinary. Federal judges rarely and with extreme caution publicly address Department of Justice interaction with U.S. Attorneys' offices because of separation of powers concerns and mutual respect. However, this response's unusual nature and its thorough, expert character suggest how deeply the judges feel about McKay's abilities. Moreover, district judges know much about U.S. attorneys' competence, because that office appears daily in the judges' courtrooms. … Lawmakers should continue investigating why John McKay resigned and, if he departed for inappropriate, politically animated reasons, initiate action. … Legislators who agree with those notions must cooperate with others to ascertain why McKay left and adopt any correctives that are required."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Emails Shed Light On Mercury Options Backdating Scheme. The Wall Street Journal (2/19, A4, Boslet, Maremont) reports, "As part of a years-long scheme to backdate stock options at Mercury Interactive Corp., former executives allegedly altered documents, repeatedly changed the dates of some option grants, and sent each other emails discussing the improper practice, according to a court document that has been at the center of a battle over confidentiality in the case." The Journal continues, "In one 2000 email quoted in the court document, filed in state court in California by shareholders suing the former executives, a Mercury finance executive wrote to another official about using 'magic backdating ink' to manipulate the date of an options grant. Another employee whose grant allegedly was backdated was told in an email that 'the stock price drop made us change the grant date' and 'you will be happier with the new price.'" The Journal notes, "In another incident described in the filing, insiders allegedly covered up fax headers on documents to disguise the fact that an options grant was approved by directors long after its purported date. … The court document appears to provide some of the most vivid evidence yet of how options backdating took root and flourished inside a company, depicting a culture of lax controls in which top executives openly discussed how to manipulate the dates of options to make them more favorable to themselves and other insiders. … Mercury was one of the first companies ensnared in the options-backdating scandal, and it previously has admitted that its top executives improperly altered the dates of more than 50 option grants between 1996 and 2002. The Mountain View, Calif., software company, which was acquired by Hewlett-Packard Co. late last year for $4.5 billion, previously restated years of financial results, reducing its pretax income by $566.7 million from 1992 to 2004 -- nearly all because of options-related problems. Most of its top executives from the period in question have left the firm. … Mercury is one of about 140 companies being investigated in a broad federal probe of options backdating. Last week, a former chief executive of Take-Two Interactive Software Inc. and a former general counsel of Monster Worldwide Inc. separately pleaded guilty to options-related criminal charges in New York."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Lawyers In Libby Trial To Make Final Arguments Today. The New York Times (2/19, Lewis, 1.16M) reports, "As lawyers for I. Lewis Libby Jr. make their final argument to the jury on Tuesday, they face the daunting task of raising sufficient doubts about the government's assertion that Mr. Libby lied to a grand jury and federal investigators." Prosecutors "have built a detailed case to support their charges, presenting several plausible witnesses whose testimony conflicts with Mr. Libby's sworn statements. Still, the prosecution has the burden of convincing the jurors of Mr. Libby's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, an imprecise concept that makes the outcome of most complicated criminal trials unpredictable. Peter Zeidenberg, a Justice Department prosecutor, is to begin the summation case for the government. He will be followed by Theodore V. Wells Jr., Mr. Libby's chief defense lawyer." The Times adds, "The stakes are obvious for Mr. Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, who faces five felony charges for allegedly lying during an investigation of who leaked to reporters the name of a C.I.A. operative, Valerie Wilson. But there are significant stakes as well for Mr. Wells and Mr. Fitzgerald.

Libby Evidence Said To Show Cheney's "Free Rein" In Bush's First Term. Under the headline "Trial Spotlights Cheney's Power as an Infighter," the New York Times (2/20, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports, "A picture taking shape from hours of testimony and reams of documents in the trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. shatters any notion that the White House was operating as a model of cohesion throughout President Bush's first term," and "a close reading of the testimony and evidence in the case" reveals "a portrait of a vice president with free rein to operate inside the White House as he saw fit in order to debunk the charges of a critic of the war in Iraq. The evidence in the trial shows Vice President Dick Cheney and Mr. Libby…countermanding and even occasionally misleading colleagues at the highest levels of Mr. Bush's inner circle as the two pursued their own goal of clearing the vice president's name in connection with flawed intelligence used in the case for war." The Times notes, "While others on the White House team were primarily concerned about Mr. Bush, the evidence has shown that Mr. Libby had a more acute concern about his own boss."

White House Officials Tied To Secretive GOP Club Led By Hohlt. Newsweek's Michael Isikoff (2/26) reports, "Testifying last week in the trial of…I. Lewis (Scooter) Libby," columnist Robert Novak "said he'd discussed " Valerie Plame's CIA status "with a lobbyist named Richard Hohlt. … Indeed, Hohlt is such a good source that after Novak finished his column naming Plame, he testified, he did something most journalists rarely do: he gave the lobbyist an advance copy of his column. What Novak didn't tell the jury is what the lobbyist then did with it: Hohlt confirmed to NEWSWEEK that he faxed the forthcoming column to their mutual friend Karl Rove (one of Novak's sources for the Plame leak), thereby giving the White House a heads up on the bombshell to come." Newsweek adds, "Hohlt's more significant role may be his leadership of a secretive social group of GOP heavy hitters and, occasionally, White House officials, who convene to smoke cigars and mull over politics. The group's name: the Off The Record Club. … Rove and White House chief of staff Josh Bolten 'have both attended these meetings on occasion,' says a White House spokesperson."

Possible Defense Strategies For Fumo Examined. The Philadelphia Daily News (2/19, Hinkelman) reports, "When the Feds delivered a hefty 267-page, 139-count indictment against state Sen. Vince Fumo on Feb. 6, they were trying to show they've got the goods on him, a former federal prosecutor said. … But is it really a 'slam dunk' case against the Prince of Philadelphia, who has pleaded not guilty to the charges? … Or are there strategies that Fumo can use to beat the case? … Yes, say defense lawyers and legal experts. This case is winnable for Fumo." The News continues, "Fumo is charged with defrauding the state Senate and a South Philly charity of more than $2 million by using Senate staffers and charity workers for his personal and political benefit. … His lawyer, Richard A. Sprague, calls the indictment malicious and politically motivated, and says the feds didn't appreciate or understand how Fumo's office operates. … Sprague said he didn't want to tip his hand about how he'll defend Fumo, so the Daily News contacted some prominent defense attorneys to see how they might defend the embattled pol. … Here are some strategies they suggested." The News adds, "Delay, delay, delay … A prominent criminal defense attorney and former federal prosecutor said he would do everything he could to keep the case from going to trial. … 'I'd use every legal maneuver I could,' said Carmen C. Nasuti. 'I'd try to get the indictment dismissed, I'd try to get evidence excluded and I'd file as many pretrial motions as I could.' … Nasuti said once the trial starts and evidence is admitted, there are 'little things' that can't be readily explained or easily defended." The News notes, "The O.J. Simpson defense … The feds investigated Fumo for four years, and Sprague has said prosecutors want to 'destroy' Fumo. … Some lawyers said this could be the linchpin of a strategy where the defense tries to paint prosecutors as overzealous or having misplaced enforcement priorities." The News continues, "Fumo as his own best defense … Many white-collar defense lawyers don't want their high-profile clients to testify because it's high-risk and could undermine previous gains they've made with jurors. … But Fumo's situation is different, some say. … 'My own experience is, if you have an engaging client and you know he has a plausible explanation for conduct the government claims is illegal, then put him on the stand," said Jack Meyerson, a former federal prosecutor who prosecuted Fumo in 1980 on fraud charges."

High Court To Revisit Sentencing Guidelines. The New York Times (2/20, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports, "The Supreme Court returns on Tuesday from a monthlong recess to face a daunting and urgent task: explaining what it meant two years ago when it ruled that the federal sentencing guidelines were to be treated as 'advisory,' no longer binding on federal judges." The decision that "dropped that bombshell on the criminal justice system, United States v. Booker, has not penetrated public consciousness in the way that, say, the Miranda decision on the right against self-incrimination did a generation ago. But in its own way, it has been no less revolutionary, creating turmoil in criminal sentencing." The justices "will hear arguments on Tuesday morning in two cases that will provide the latest chapter, although almost certainly not the final one, in the court's continuing and, to many, profoundly unsettling reappraisal of the roles of juries and judges in criminal sentencing."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/20, Richey, 59K) reports, "On one side are those who argue that sentencing judges should be free to adopt or reject the guidelines on an equal footing with several other factors Congress has identified as important sentencing objectives. The key, they say, is that judges rely on reasoned judgment rather than a mechanical guidelines formula to mete out punishments." On the other side are "those who say the guidelines must be afforded an exalted status among sentencing factors since they represent the collective wisdom of the US Sentencing Commission created by Congress. Five of the nation's 12 appeals courts have embraced the former approach, while seven have embraced the latter approach." The Monitor adds, "Specifically, the question is whether appeals court judges should award a presumption of reasonableness to any sentence imposed within the range of the guidelines."

DeVecchio Case Investigator Resigns Over Relationship With Mob Witness. The New York Post (2/19, Celona, 631K) reported, "An investigator for the Brooklyn DA's Office has been forced to resign amid allegations she fell for a jailed mobster -- and hatched a plan to bear his love child, The Post has learned. The 37-year-old prober had been assigned to protect the 'mob associate' while he was being held in secret hotel rooms for interviews about the bombshell corruption case involving ex-FBI agent Lindley DeVecchio, sources said. The sources identified her as Maria Biagini, a 15-year veteran of DA Charles Hynes' office who left her job last week." The Post noted, "She allegedly loosened her prisoner's strings and allowed him to contact his family and take money from relatives. He used the cash to throw dinner parties, attended by his family and the investigator -- all in violation of DA policies, the sources said. After the prisoner was returned to jail, the investigator allegedly wrote him several letters and visited -- which led authorities to uncover their relationship."

FBI Subpoenas Memphis Utility's Records In City Council Probe. WMC-TV Memphis (2/19) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story that "federal agents have subpoenaed records from Memphis Light, Gas and Water concerning City Councilman Edmund Ford's previous utility payments. Sources tell Action News 5 the FBI has interviewed a number of City leaders during the past week and a statement from the public utility confirms that officials there have responded to a subpoena for records. Their interest…revolves around embattled Councilman Edmund Ford, recently indicted on charges he took bribes in exchange for votes." WHBQ-TV Memphis (2/19) noted MLGW counsel Odell Horton "said the company had no idea the FBI agents were coming, but said MLGW cooperated completely. … MLGW said it expects to forward some paperwork to the FBI over the next couple of days. It's not clear if the agents will be returning to MLGW." Meanwhile, City Councilwoman Carol Chumney "said she didn't know about the FBI visit, but she plans to make inquiries into what happened and why she wasn't informed."

The Memphis Commercial Appeal (2/20, Aaronson, 163K) reports Ford "hasn't been paying his power bills -- and federal authorities want to know why." Horton "confirmed that money is owed on the accounts but would not say how much. He refused to disclose the property addresses to which the utility accounts were assigned." The Commercial Appeal notes, "Money has been at the root of the council member's recent legal problems. On Dec. 19, 2006, federal prosecutors indicted Councilmen Ford and Rickey Peete on bribery and extortion charges following an FBI sting starring lobbyist Joe Cooper."

FBI Child Abduction Teams Provide Crucial Support To Local Police. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (2/19, Patrick, 297K) reported Special Agent Dirk Tarpley "is a member of the bureau's 48-member Child Abduction Rapid Deployment Team, a year-old unit designed to rush experienced help to local police dealing with a suspected abduction. Neither Tarpley nor other investigators interviewed for this report would comment on the case against Michael J. Devlin, who has been charged with kidnapping Ben Ownby and Shawn Hornbeck, or the specifics of the investigation. But they are eager to talk about what their new setup offers, saying they hope it causes local authorities to call them more quickly and more often." On the Devlin case, Franklin County Sheriff Gary Toelke "worked closely with the team. 'I couldn't ask for better help than what we got,' Toelke said. 'If this was a member of my own family, I'd want them investigating.'" The Post-Dispatch notes St. Louis SAC Roland Corvington said that "before the formation of the team, each FBI office relied on its own expertise," but "now, specialists arrive in person within hours, drawn from across the region. … Contrary to the FBI's common portrayal on TV, Tarpley said, agents don't come in and take over. 'We're just there to assist,' he emphasized."

Appellate Ruling Could Make Jefferson Conviction More Difficult. The Washington Post (2/20, A11, Birnbaum, 690K) reports the US Court of Appeals for the DC Circuit "has reversed the conviction of a former District police detective in a case that experts believe might make it tougher for the feds to prosecute Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.)." The court voted "7 to 5 on Feb. 9 to overturn the 2002 conviction of Nelson Valdes on three counts of receiving illegal gratuities. Prosecutors said he passed along information from restricted law enforcement databases to an FBI informant who paid him $450." The court ruled "that the gratuities law did not apply to Valdes's conduct -- his use of the databases was not 'an official act' because it did not spur a police investigation." The "same issue hovers around Jefferson," who is "under investigation for allegedly taking cash -- $90,000 of which was famously found in his freezer -- in exchange for using his congressional clout to arrange business deals. Two businessmen have pleaded guilty to giving Jefferson money to promote a company marketing new technology in Africa. But was that promotion an 'official act?'"

Maryland Shopping Center Destroyed After Police Standoff. The Washington Post (2/20, B1, Rucker, Wan) reports, "A gunman entered a liquor store in Frederick yesterday, shot at police, locked himself in the store during a 30-minute standoff and ignited a fire that engulfed and gutted a two-story shopping plaza along one of the Western Maryland city's major commercial corridors, police said." The Post continues, "James Douglas, 29, of Frederick walked into Jim's Liquors at Antietam Village Center about 12:30 p.m., showed the owner a handgun and told him, 'Get out,' Frederick Police Lt. Thomas Chase said. Police said the store's owner, whose name they would not release, called Douglas a frequent customer and knew him by a nickname, 'Menace.' … Nobody else was in the store, Chase said, and the owner left to call police. When two officers pulled up, Douglas fired at least one shot at them through the store's glass door. Police then surrounded the shopping plaza and ordered nearby businesses to lock their doors and windows." The Post adds, "Authorities had not located Douglas last night, and police said it is likely that he died in the fire. Nobody else was injured, Chase said. He added that a search of the liquor store will begin this morning. … Douglas apparently lit boxes of liquor to ignite the blaze, which spread quickly and destroyed all 14 stores in the center, Chase said."

Family Struggles To Understand Son's Role In Utah Rampage. The New York Times (2/20, Stolz) reports from Salt Lake City, "At 1 a.m. last Tuesday, the parents of Sulejman Talovic called the police to report him missing. After watching television news coverage, they feared he might be among those dead or wounded in a shooting rampage at a mall here. One hour later, with the arrival of detectives, they discovered the shocking truth, that their son, 18, was the gunman." The Times continues, "In six minutes on the night of Feb. 12, Mr. Talovic shot nine customers at the Trolley Square mall, killing five and seriously injuring four others. The attack ended when the police shot and killed Mr. Talovic after he refused to surrender his 12-gauge shotgun. … Mr. Talovic's motive remains a mystery, investigators say." The Times adds, "In the week of grief and confusion since the shooting, the Talovic family has been struggling to unearth some explanations. Their reflections, inadequate as they may seem, revolve around a handful of formative experiences: war in his native Bosnia, rejection at school and difficulty in assimilating in the United States, they said Sunday in the living room of his aunt's tidy apartment. … If the public has come to see Mr. Talovic as a deranged killer, the family knew him as a shy and generous boy. … The gunman's aunt, Ajka Omerovic, and his father, who was visibly exhausted, spoke to a reporter just hours after Mr. Talovic's body was cleansed in an Islamic ritual in preparation for its burial in Tuzla, Bosnia, expected later this month, and after days of funerals for shooting victims across the Salt Lake Valley." The Times notes, "The Talovics had no information on how Sulejman had obtained his weapons and ammunition. The police could not be reached to comment on a report in The Salt Lake Tribune that the shotgun had been bought legally at a sporting goods store."

Panel Probes Florida Execution Techniques. The New York Times (2/20, Waddell, Goodnough) reports from Tampa, FL, "A member of Florida's execution team told a panel studying lethal injection protocols on Monday that intravenous lines had been placed properly in the arms of a condemned inmate who took 34 minutes, twice as long as normal, to die." The Times continues, "The man, who testified by phone and whose voice was electronically altered to shield his identity, said he had medical qualifications but would not elaborate. He added that in any event he did not consider the execution a medical procedure. … 'Absolutely nothing is remotely connected with medicine,' the man told the panel, which former Gov. Jeb Bush appointed in December to study whether Florida's lethal injection system could be improved. 'From that point on, the condemned inmate will not leave the chamber alive. It is done as quickly as possible. It is done as humanely as can be done under the circumstances.'" The Times adds, "The man, who identified himself only as 'medically qualified,' was the second member of Florida's execution team to address the panel this month. … On Feb. 9, the lead executioner in the case of Angel Diaz, who took 34 minutes to die, told the panel, 'I have no medical training or qualifications.' … Some witnesses to the execution have said that Mr. Diaz, who was put to death on Dec. 13, gasped and appeared to grimace in pain as the procedure stalled. But state corrections officials have told the panel that he did not voice discomfort or appear to be in pain. … A preliminary medical examiner's report suggested that intravenous needles placed in Mr. Diaz's right and left arms plunged through his veins into tissue, preventing the drugs from quickly entering his bloodstream. An autopsy found a 12-inch chemical burn on Mr. Diaz's right arm and an 11-inch burn on his left." The Times notes, "Mr. Bush halted executions in Florida on Dec. 16, when the preliminary autopsy results came out, and appointed the panel to study lethal injection protocols. The panel is to submit recommendations to Gov. Charlie Crist by March 1."

WPost Questions Shooting Suspect's Status As PG County Officer. The Washington Post (2/20, A12) editorializes, "Cp. Keith Washington, the Prince George's County police officer who shot two unarmed furniture deliverymen in a dispute at his home three weeks ago, one of them fatally, is on administrative leave pending the outcome of an investigation into the incident. That status notwithstanding, he remains certified as a police officer, meaning he is still authorized to carry a weapon issued by the department. Given what is known about his past, and his repeated problems with anger management, you'd think Prince Georgians might justifiably be nervous about that. … But not Jack Johnson, the Prince George's county executive. Mr. Johnson is an old associate and booster of Cpl. Washington's, having hired him first as his driver and then, two years ago, as his deputy director of homeland security, despite public warnings about Cpl. Washington's checkered past, volcanic temper and tendency to turn routine encounters into tempestuous ones. Now that Cpl. Washington has killed one man and badly injured another, Mr. Johnson says the officer will not be returning to his position in the county department of homeland security. Well, that's comforting. Less comforting, however, is Mr. Johnson's prescription -- that Cpl. Washington resume work as a police officer." The Post concludes, "We hope an ongoing investigation will reveal how a dispute over the delivery of a bed set escalated to the point where Cpl. Washington not only brandished a weapon but felt it necessary to pull the trigger again and again. The facts surrounding those shootings are still uncertain: One man is dead; another hasn't yet talked to police, prosecutors or a grand jury; and Cpl. Washington's own account hasn't been heard in public. So we won't prejudge the outcome of the investigation. But it seems fair to wonder whether Mr. Johnson's cavalier prescription -- to send Cpl. Washington back to active duty as a police officer -- is not premature, at the very least."

CIVIL LAW:

Clinton's Brother Faces Renewed Claims In Bankruptcy Case. The Washington Times (2/20, McElhatton, 88K) reports a Federal judge "has reopened a bankruptcy case in which a trustee is demanding that one of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's brothers repay more than $100,000 in purported loans from a carnival outfit whose owner was pardoned by President Clinton." Anthony D. Rodham "received $107,000 in payments from Tennessee-based United Shows of America Inc. before the company went bankrupt in 2002, according to court records." United Shows' owners – "Edgar Gregory Jr. and his wife, Vonna Jo Gregory -- were pardoned by Mr. Clinton in March 2000, despite an objection by the Justice Department. The couple was convicted of bank fraud in 1982 for illegally giving loans to friends. Mr. Gregory died in 2004."

NYTimes Supports Giving FDA Power To Regulate Tobacco Industry. The New York Times (2/19, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "Wall Street analysts may be applauding R. J. Reynolds for introducing a feminized version of its macho Camel cigarette brand, and company executives clearly think they have hit on an innovative marketing strategy. But this new attempt to woo women smokers can only be viewed as another cynical blow to public health. … Bipartisan bills were introduced in both houses of Congress last week to give the Food and Drug Administration needed authority to regulate tobacco products and restrict marketing to young people, consistent with free-speech principles. That may not do much to wean their elders from the habit. But it could stop young women from being entrapped by cynical marketers."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Plaintiffs Often Distanced From SCOTUS Hearings Of Their Cases. The Washington Post (2/20, A3, Barnes) reports from Jacksonville, AL, "Lilly M. Ledbetter says she almost stopped breathing when she heard her name called that day, her eight-year battle over alleged pay discrimination finally reaching the ultimate legal forum, the U.S. Supreme Court. … 'We'll hear argument next in Ledbetter versus Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company,' Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. announced. … The odds are akin to being struck by lightning, having your case plucked from the thousands of others who have vowed, like you, to take the fight all the way to the Supreme Court. And then you find it's not so much about you anymore." The Post continues, "It was the only time that November morning that any of the nine justices spoke Lilly Ledbetter's name. … When she thought back last week on the arguments before the court, she remembered them as not being much about her complaints about Goodyear, or Goodyear's complaints about her. 'Except when my lawyer got up, it [seemed to be] based on changing the law somewhere down the line,' she said. 'That's what it boils down to, I guess. It tends to leave the person out.'" The Post adds, "At a forum late last year, Justices Antonin Scalia and Stephen G. Breyer, usually the court's yin and yang on matters of constitutional interpretation, agreed that that is how it should be. They were asked whether their duty was to provide justice for those who came before the court or simply to interpret the law. … 'The point of the law is to satisfy a human desire for justice,' Breyer explained, but he added: 'You don't necessarily get to that end by simply trying to look for what is the intuitively nicer result in each case.' … Scalia was blunter. 'By the time you get up to an appellate court -- and lawyers ought to learn this -- I don't much care about your particular case,' he said. 'I am not about to produce a better result in your case at the expense of creating terrible results in a hundred other cases.' … A specific Supreme Court decision may contain obvious benefits for the winner -- see George W. Bush, circa 2000. But it can often be an inconclusive way station for the plaintiff, sometimes leading only to additional years of litigation. … Supreme Court cases outlive the individuals who give them a name, and give rise to legal precedents beyond the specific cases. That explains why Ledbetter finds herself supported by a large contingent of women's groups and civil rights organizations that she had never given much thought to – 'The ACLU is supporting me; I don't know how we picked them up' -- and opposed by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the Bush administration."

Voter ID Laws Said To Reduce Minority Turnout. USA Today (2/20, 5A, Wolf, 2.27M) reports voter identification requirements "designed to combat fraud can reduce turnout, particularly among minorities, a new study shows." A study by the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University "shows turnout in 2004 was about 4% lower in states that required voters to sign their name or produce documentation. Hispanic turnout was 10% lower; the difference was about 6% for blacks and Asian-Americans." The study, "presented to the U.S. Election Assistance Commission this month, comes as voter identification requirements are being subjected to increased scrutiny. Two researchers last year told the Election Assistance Commission that they found little evidence of voter fraud at polling places."

Congressional Democrats Call For E-Voting Paper Trails. The Washington Post (2/19, A17, Goldfarb, 690K) reports, "Efforts are intensifying in Congress to pass legislation that would require electronic touch-screen voting machines used in federal elections to provide paper trails that could be checked in the case of a recount. The new momentum is the result of lingering concerns about the machines as the 2008 presidential primaries fast approach, as well as strong support for changes by the new Democratic majority, with Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), chair of the Rules Committee, taking a leading role. … 'Democrats are committed to election-reform legislation that requires all voting machines produce a paper trail,' said Brendan Daly, a spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). The work at the national level echoes moves in many states. Often under pressure from voting-rights groups, 27 states have decided to require paper trails. Last month, Gov. Charlie Crist of Florida went a step further, asking the legislature to pay for replacing touch-screen machines by next year with optical-scan devices, which read paper ballots. Virginia and Maryland are considering similar moves."

New Jersey Civil Union Law Goes Into Effect. The AP (2/20) reports, "Hundreds of gay couples received the same legal protections as married couples early Monday when a law took effect to make New Jersey the third U.S. state to offer civil unions. The civil unions -- which offer the legal benefits but not the title of marriage -- were granted automatically to the hundreds of gay New Jersey couples who have been joined in civil unions or married in other states or nations." New Jersey lawmakers "hastily created civil unions last December, less than two months after a state Supreme Court decision held that gay couples had a right to the same benefits as married couples."

The New York Times (2/20, Barry, 1.16M) says "about a dozen couples visited clerks' offices in New Jersey on Monday, the first day on which people were allowed to submit applications for civil unions, which guarantee all the rights and benefits of heterosexual marriage." New Jersey "is the third state to offer civil unions, following Vermont, which introduced them to rapt national attention in 2000, and Connecticut, which quietly followed suit in 2005."

ANTITRUST:

Sirius To Merge With Rival XM IN $4.57 Billion Deal. The New York Times (2/20, Siklos, Sorkin) reports, "The nation's two satellite radio services, Sirius and XM, announced plans yesterday to merge, a move that would end their costly competition for radio personalities and subscribers but that is also sure to raise antitrust issues." The Times continues, "The two companies, which report close to 14 million subscribers, hoped to revolutionize the radio industry with a bevy of niche channels offering everything from fishing tips to salsa music, and media personalities like Howard Stern and Oprah Winfrey, with few commercials. But neither has yet turned an annual profit and both have had billions in losses. … While there had been speculation of a merger, neither side had engaged in serious negotiations until December, when both companies determined it was in their best interests to complete a deal while the Bush administration was in power, people in the negotiations said." The Times adds, "The companies said yesterday that their $13 billion merger — code-named Project Big Sky by XM — would give consumers a broader range of programming, while eliminating overlapping stations that focus on genres of music. At the same time, they said, they could cut duplicated costs in sales and marketing. … A merger would require antitrust approval from the Justice Department and would have to be considered in the public interest by the Federal Communications Commission."

Bloomberg (2/20, Stern) reports, "Mel Karmazin, chief executive officer of New York-based Sirius, will be CEO of the combined company, and Gary Parsons, chairman of Washington-based XM, will continue as chairman, the companies said today in a statement. … Sirius and XM faced pressure to merge after losing a combined $7 billion to attract subscribers over the past eight years and signing talent including Howard Stern and Oprah Winfrey. The merger will face antitrust scrutiny and must also be approved by the U.S. Federal Communications Commission." Bloomberg adds, "Under the terms of the accord, which the companies describe as a merger of equals, XM investors will receive 4.6

shares of Sirius common stock for each share they own. Shareholders of each will own about 50 percent of the combined radio company."

The Wall Street Journal (2/20, A1, McBride, Berman, Schatz) reports, "Broadcasters said yesterday that they will fight the proposed merger, and FCC Chairman Kevin Martin released an unusually grim statement saying that the two companies will face a 'high' hurdle, since the FCC still has a 1997 rule on its books specifically forbidding such a deal which would need to be tossed. The transaction also requires the Justice Department's blessing." The Journal adds, "Indeed, XM and Sirius may be rushing into a deal because they sense the regulatory terrain will only get tougher. People close to the matter said that the two companies acted because the climate is already changing with the election of a Democratic-controlled Congress. Future developments -- such as the possibility of a Democratic president -- could make it even harder for the proposed merger to pass muster. … In their strategy, the two companies may be subtly acknowledging the risks before them: By conceiving their deal as a merger of equals and declining to say which company name would emerge ascendant, they minimize the business risks should the deal fall through. If, for example, the combined company were to be dubbed Sirius, XM could be vulnerable to a decline in sales during a regulatory review period that could last a year. A person familiar with the negotiations said the two companies have set March 1, 2008, as their 'drop-dead date,' after which either side can walk away if approval is not granted. … The coming regulatory battle is likely to focus on the definition of satellite radio's market. The two companies are expected to argue that the rules established a decade ago, which require two satellite rivals to ensure competition, simply don't apply in today's entertainment landscape."

USA Today (2/20, Lieberman) reports, "The vision of a robustly competitive satellite radio business came crashing to Earth on Monday, as the industry's once bitter rivals — Sirius (SIRI) and XM Satellite Radio — agreed to merge, creating a company valued at $13 billion, including $1.6 billion in debt." USA continues, "Each of the two has created an array of radio channels, and they've amassed more than 13 million subscribers between them but never made a profit. … The announcement also created uncertainty, and provided few answers, for current subscribers and those considering buying one of the services. The two systems are incompatible, and virtually all satellite radios are designed for one and can't receive the other." USA adds, "Sirius CEO Mel Karmazin, who would hold that job at the still-unnamed combined company, sought to reassure consumers. … 'You should assume that we're going to continue for a very, very long period of time to offer the Sirius and XM service,' he says. 'Once this merger is approved, we'll be able to work with receiver manufacturers and chip-set designers to have a next-generation radio that can pick up both services.' … Left unanswered is what will happen to consumers who have one of the current generation of radios once it's time to blend the companies. … In addition to the tech hurdles, the companies will have to get the deal to pass muster with antitrust officials and the Federal Communications Commission. … Congress also might have something to say. Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., who chairs the House Subcommittee on Telecommunications and the Internet, said in a statement, 'The merger of the only two satellite radio companies must be assessed with an eye toward ensuring that it does not have a … deleterious effect on diversity on the dial and localism in radio coverage and reporting.'"

The Washington Post (2/20, A1, Babington, Heath) reports, "If approved by federal regulators, the merger would give all satellite subscribers access to Sirius's Howard Stern, pro football games and NASCAR races, as well as XM's Oprah Winfrey, Major League Baseball and Bob Dylan. … Before XM Satellite Radio Holdings of the District and Sirius Satellite Radio of New York can combine, however, the companies must persuade the Justice Department and Federal Communications Commission that they are complying with antitrust laws, a claim that land-based broadcasters and consumer groups are likely to dispute. XM and Sirius contend that customers have ample audio choices through devices such as iPods and cellphones. … The FCC bars a single company from controlling the satellite radio market, but FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin recently noted that such rules can be changed. Martin said yesterday that the hurdle 'would be high. . . . The companies would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off with both more choice and affordable prices.'" The Post notes, "The merger would be a milestone in the evolution of commercial radio. XM and Sirius, founded in the early 1990s, predicted that enough people would be willing to pay for a wide array of radio choices -- with clear reception, no fundraising appeals and commercial-free music stations -- to allow the providers to turn a profit. … But their bidding war for on-air talent escalated dramatically. Sirius spent $500 million over five years to employ Stern, who earned another $300 million in stock for meeting certain subscriber goals. XM signed Winfrey to a three-year, $55 million contract. Both companies have spent millions of dollars on professional sports deals."

The Washington Times (2/20, Rowland) reports, "Currently, XM has more than 7.6 million subscribers and a market capitalization -- the value of a company based on the stock price multiplied by the number of shares outstanding -- of $3.75 billion, while Sirius has more than 6 million subscribers and a market cap of $5.2 billion. … The rate of subscriber growth has slowed at both companies, which had combined revenue of $1.5 billion last year. XM and Sirius also have drawn the ire of Wall Street for bleeding millions of dollars on competing with each other over the years for high-priced talent."

Sirius CEO Knows Art Of Deal. USA Today (2/20, 2B, Petrecca) reports, "If there's anything that Mel Karmazin knows, it's the art of the deal. … The 63-year-old media executive has spent most of his career expanding the reach — and public profile — of the companies he's run." USA continues, "Since he joined Sirius Satellite Radio in November 2004 as CEO, he's signed big-name talent to create channels such as Martha Stewart Living Radio and Jamie Foxx's The Foxxhole. Now, with the planned XM and Sirius merger, he's slated to take over as CEO of the combined company. … The native New Yorker got his start as a radio ad salesman at WCBS in 1967. He joined John Kluge's Metromedia in 1970, rising to general manager, before leaving in 1981 to become president of Infinity Broadcasting. He became Infinity's CEO in 1988." USA adds, "It was in the 1980s and 1990s at Infinity that he really made his mark — expanding it from a fledgling company to a radio empire, buying up stations around the country, particularly in major markets. … It also was at Infinity that Karmazin first worked with Howard Stern. (Although Karmazin was Stern's boss when both worked for Infinity, he didn't engineer the shock jock's highly publicized move to Sirius. Stern jumped over before Karmazin.)"

More Commentary. The Los Angeles Times (2/20) editorializes, "Federal regulators are notoriously slow to act, yet it took the chairman of the Federal Communications Commission less than half a day to erect a daunting roadblock to the proposed merger of the country's two satellite radio services, XM and Sirius. Within hours of the companies' announcement of their intention to combine operations, FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin reacted, saying that XM and Sirius 'would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off with both more choice and affordable prices.'" The Times continues, "Martin's two-pronged test sets a nearly insurmountable bar. It's hard to argue that 'more choice' results when the only two suppliers of a product combine, or that the merged entity will be deterred from hiking the fees paid by its subscribers (14 million at last count). In addition, when the FCC issued two licenses for a national satellite radio service in 1997, it said that they could not be owned by a single company. … .That said, Martin's statement is inconsistent with the approach the FCC has taken on media consolidation in general. The goal should be to promote choice not in the niche occupied by XM and Sirius but in the general market of audio entertainment. That market is very competitive, particularly among national players." The Times adds, "Anticipating resistance from the FCC, the companies said they would let people subscribe to channels on a more a la carte basis — a favorite cause of Martin's, at least where cable and satellite TV are concerned — and broaden their programming. They also said the combination would lead to less expensive receivers and more advanced services, such as delivering improved traffic and weather reports. The FCC should look at these concessions, declare victory and approve the merger."

Movie Industry Cracks Down On Canadian Pirating. The New York Times (2/19, Austen) reports, "Canada heavily promotes itself as a place to make films. But now it has a more dubious distinction: an analysis by the Motion Picture Association of America has found that 30 to 40 percent of the bootleg DVDs sold in the United States were made by camcorders smuggled into Canadian theaters." The Times continues, "In response, 20th Century Fox Film is considering holding back film releases for the Canadian market, and the film industry in general is calling for stricter Canadian laws. One theater chain has even equipped some its staff with night-vision goggles to better ferret out copiers." The Times adds, "The apparent rise of Canada's illegal film industry stems from several factors. Tighter federal and state laws in the United States covering film piracy have not been matched by similar legislation in Canada. And because most film releases are simultaneous in Canada and the United States, Canadian pirates get a head start relative to their counterparts abroad. … And, finally, even industry officials acknowledge that Canadian pirates offer technically superior work. … The film industry's estimate of how many black market DVDs originate from Canadian multiplexes is not simply a guess. In many release prints, almost unnoticeable identification marks are scattered throughout random frames. … In the United States, federal law as well as 40 state laws can impose harsh penalties for videotaping movies from theater screens, a process known as camming. In Canada, however, it violates copyright laws only if the police can show in court that the camera operator intended to commercially distribute copies of the recording."

Scor Likely To Continue Pursuit Of Converium. The Wall Street Journal (2/20, A3, Mcdonald, Mijuk) reports, "Swiss reinsurer Converium Holding AG spurned a takeover proposal from French rival Scor SA. But the courtship isn't likely over and it may be the first of many this year in the European insurance sector." The Journal continues, "Converium said yesterday its board rejected a proposed offer of three billion Swiss francs ($2.43 billion) made by Scor over the weekend. If merged, the two companies could leapfrog several competitors to become one of the world's five largest reinsurers depending on how it's measured. Reinsurance firms essentially backstop insurance companies' biggest risks in return for a cut of their premiums." The Journal adds, "Scor said it secured a 32.9% stake in Converium and approached the board regarding a proposed offer of 21 francs a share for the rest -- a 12% premium to the stock's closing price Friday. A 33.3% stake would require a formal offer, according to Swiss securities rules. Scor said it is convinced that a tie-up makes sense, so it is unlikely that chatter about a merger between the two will end there. … Scor said a merger with Converium was 'a unique strategic opportunity to create a top five global multiline reinsurer in this time of market consolidation.' … A Converium spokesman noted that Scor's official stake will be filed publicly this week and that Converium remains focused on growth and profitability targets laid out in recent weeks. … The Scor offer could be the first of several in the insurance sector this year. Cost cuts and below-average claims have left many European insurers with billions more than regulators require to back up their policies. At the same time, maturing insurance markets in the U.S. and Europe have lead analysts to expect single-digit premium growth -- particularly in property-casualty coverage -- in coming years. Some players may seek growth by buying up rivals with today's excess cash."

Vulcan To Acquire Florida Rock In Cash-Stock Deal. The Wall Street Journal (2/20, Berman) reports, "Making a long-term wager on the now-faltering construction markets in the U.S. Sunbelt region, Vulcan Materials Co. yesterday said it agreed to acquire Florida Rock Industries Inc. in a cash and stock deal valued at about $4.6 billion." The Journal continues, "Florida Rock makes construction aggregates such as concrete and distributes gravel and sand." The Journal adds, "The total blended cash and stock consideration of $68.03 a share, based on the 4 p.m. price of Vulcan Materials' stock Friday of $111.81 a share, represents a premium of 45% for Florida Rock shareholders based on the company's own 4 p.m. Friday stock price of $46.96. The price is only slightly above Florida Rock's 52-week-high of $66.10. … In an interview, Vulcan Chief Executive Officer Donald M. James said the combined company's largest market will be in public infrastructure, such as highways. … Florida Rock's shares have fallen 17% over the past year, as investors feared booming growth in Florida would taper off as part of a nationwide real-estate slowdown. … The deal, which should close in mid-2007, is expected to be neutral to Vulcan Materials' earnings this year and accretive next year and beyond."

Apple Gets More Time To Respond To iPhone Suit. The Wall Street Journal (2/20, B3) reports, "Apple Inc. was granted more time to respond to Cisco Systems Inc.'s claim that its new iPhone mobile handset infringes on a Cisco trademark." The Journal continues, "Cisco said it agreed to give Apple until tomorrow to file its legal response in the case. The San Jose, Calif., networking company said Apple asked for a second extension after the initial extension ended Thursday, and Cisco complied." The Journal adds, "Cisco filed suit in U.S. District Court in San Francisco on Jan. 10, arguing the Cupertino, Calif., maker of electronic products and computers infringed on a trademark Cisco obtained in 2000 with its acquisition of Infogear Technology Corp. Cisco markets a phone with the iPhone name through its Linksys division. Apple has called the suit 'silly' and says that other products also use the iPhone name, but the companies have been trying to resolve the issue through negotiations."

Justices To Address Reach Of US Patent Laws. The Financial Times (2/20, Waldmeir) reports, "The Supreme Court will on Wednesday test the global reach of US patent law, in a case that could have big implications for new technology industries such as software and biotechnology." The case "concerns whether Microsoft should be liable for damages overseas for infringing a software patent owned by AT&T for the manufacture of synthetic speech. It will test the extraterritorial application of US patent law in the information age at a time when courts around the world are struggling to apply national laws to increasingly globalised economic activity." However, "the court is also being urged to use the case to look at a much bigger issue: the scope of what can be patented in the first place, including software. If the court takes up that issue – a move that is far from guaranteed – it could make an even bigger impact on US patents and incentives for innovation."

Congress Urged To Maintain Patent System. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/20, A17), Laura Peter, general counsel of Immersion Corporation who recently served on a judicial committee on patent litigation reform in Texas, writes, "There is a large risk that Congress may deform the patent system rather than reform it. For in its quest to modernize the antiquated and underfunded system for protecting our inventions, Congress has trotted out an easy target -- so-called 'patent trolls' -- to justify changes that would stifle innovation, benefiting large technology companies at the expense of smaller ones. … 'Patent trolls' are typically companies that buy patent rights from inventors, then receive royalties from other companies who actually use the patents. Inventors get either a single payment, or a share of the royalties. In some cases trolls (like other patent owners) must go to court to enforce their patents; and like any group, some of them use abusive litigation against large technology companies in the hopes of extorting settlements. … But large technology companies often 'troll' themselves, using their own portfolio of thousands (if not tens of thousands) of patents to sue smaller firms financially unable to defend themselves. And when the claims are unmerited or frivolous, this is a rather convenient way to stifle competition." Peter adds, "Thus, it is right to end frivolous trolling, but the right way is through narrow, targeted reform. Unfortunately, some reform proposals cast too wide a net, and would hurt small technology companies' ability to benefit from their own inventions. … First, Congress is considering proposals that would excessively limit the ability of small technology companies to amend pending patent applications known as 'continuation' patents. These patents, however, are a primary way that emerging technology companies protect themselves. … Thus, limiting these patents too much would just reward copycats with resources, and not the innovators." Peter notes, "Second, Congress is considering greatly expanding the ability of large technology companies to challenge smaller companies' patents even after they are issued. … Already, well-funded companies have proved their willingness to pile multiple challenges in multiple proceedings on smaller firms. … Adding yet another battlefront would simply hurt smaller firms, who are often pushed to the brink of bankruptcy defending their rights, without ensuring greater justice. … Finally, these and other proposed reforms would materially increase the costs of filing for patents. This could devastate emerging companies which pour all of their resources into the tools and people needed to turn their ideas into products. They often are not patent-savvy, or cannot afford the huge expense of filing good patents. … So, when you hear about patent trolls, think of Segway (inventors of the two-wheeled, self-balancing transportation device), think of Andre Pavel (the inventor of the Walkman personal stereo), and yes, think of H-P and Apple decades ago. They each were at the forefront cutting-edge technology and had to defend and assert their patents to become what they are today."

Bloggers Promote Net Neutrality Issue. The Washington Post (2/20, D1, Babington, 690K) reports, "Bloggers and other Internet activists made their marks in the past two presidential elections chiefly by building networks of political enthusiasts and raising money for candidates. Now, they are pushing aggressively into policymaking -- and not just over high-profile issues such as Iraq." They are "pressing candidates to back a handful of issues that are obscure to many Americans but vital to those who base their livelihoods on the Internet and track its development." The activists "are also using their new-age technologies for an old-fashioned purpose: making politicians take note of their legislative priorities. One of those is 'net neutrality.'" The issue "has no overtly partisan or ideological dimensions. Yet it is shaping up as a Democratic issue this year, largely because its most fervid advocates are liberal bloggers and other Internet activists who play a big role in the early stages of choosing a Democratic presidential nominee." Every "major Democratic presidential candidate has endorsed net neutrality. The move keeps them in good standing with powerful grass-roots groups, such as MoveOn.org, and costs them little in return -- perhaps a bit of space on campaign Web sites to promote a matter that comparatively few voters might explore." It is "a principle that bars Internet providers, primarily phone and cable companies, from charging higher rates to Web-based firms in return for giving their content priority treatment on the pathways to consumers."

ENVIRONMENT:

Linder Casts Doubt On Global Warming Science. In a Washington Times op-ed (2/19), GOP Rep. John Linder writes that "wise old heads believe that we are going through normal cycles of heating and cooling that we have seen over hundreds of millions of years as the earth heats and cools when the activity of the sun changes. The earth is heated by the sun. The sun is impacted by magnetic forces creating outbursts called sunspots, which increase the heat it imparts. During the coldest period in the Little Ice Age, which ended near the end of the 19th century, sunspots almost completely disappeared for 70 years. The earth cooled." Linder concludes, "Sunspot activity has been declining for a number of years and is expected decline by 40 percent over the next decade. The world is about to enter a cooling period. Be prepared to change your lifestyle."

Scientists Group Says Warming "A Growing Threat." The Washington Post (2/19, A20, Eilperin, 690K) reports, "The board of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, the nation's leading general science organization, yesterday issued a consensus statement declaring global climate change 'a growing threat to society.'" The statement, "released at a town hall meeting of school teachers in San Francisco, marked the first time that the board of the influential AAAS, publisher of the journal Science, has taken a stand on global warming."

New Alaska Governor Pursuing Natural Gas Pipeline Project. The New York Times (2/19, Yardley, 1.16M) reports Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin "wants to become the first Alaska governor to deliver what many others have sought without success: construction of a $30 billion pipeline to transport natural gas from the state's North Slope to markets in the lower 48 states. It is an enormous project that could strengthen Alaska's energy-based economy for decades to come, while also, according to some estimates, supplying 7 percent of the nation's natural gas annually. … Elected by a wide margin after promising to bring 'new energy' and 'transparency' to the pipeline project, Ms. Palin took office in December and immediately backed away from the negotiations that her predecessor, Frank H. Murkowski, had been pursuing with the three major energy companies that control much of the land where gas would be developed. Ms. Palin has long criticized those negotiations as back-room dealings whose extensive incentives and tax breaks would have benefited the energy companies, BP, Exxon Mobil and ConocoPhillips, far more than they would have Alaska."

Paulson Influencing Administration's Environmental Policy. Newsweek (2/26, Wolffe, 3.12M) reports, "He heads Treasury, not the EPA, but Hank Paulson is investing time in making this White House greener. … Paulson is a rare species inside the Bush administration," who "cares deeply about climate change: during his seven-year run as chairman and CEO of Goldman Sachs, the investment bank issued a policy paper backing the science on warming and promoting investment in alternative energy. In recent months Paulson has played a leading role in the administration's debate about energy -- and he's had an impact on environmental policy. It was Paulson who encouraged the former oil executives in the West Wing to embrace ambitious targets to cut by 20 percent the amount of gas Americans are forecast to consume by 2017 (part of the plan outlined in Bush's State of the Union). White House officials portray the policy as a team effort, but identify Paulson as a driver."

NYTimes Urges Spitzer Action On Emissions To "Tip National Debate." The New York Times (2/20, 1.16M) suggests Gov. Spitzer, who built a "formidable environmental record" as attorney general, should "quickly commit himself to establishing ambitious goals for reducing emissions of carbon dioxide from cars, power plants and other industrial sources in New York State, and to writing regulations to achieve those goals." The paper says such a commitment could "tip the national debate and compel Washington to move more quickly," given "persuasive new scientific evidence," progress made by CA Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, and the concerns of a new Democratic Congress. The paper says prior commitments between Schwarzenegger and Pataki "smoothed" the way for Spitzer to "some extent." Spitzer "must help get the regional greenhouse initiative up and running, and make sure that any new power plants built to meet the state's energy needs use the most modern technologies and add as little as possible to the atmosphere's already heavy carbon burden." The paper concludes by saying this is a "tall order" for Spitzer, but most of these initiatives could be accomplished via executive order, thus "skirting an unadventurous Legislature that tends to prefer business as usual."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Drug Paraphernalia Sales Targeted In New York. The Elmira (NY) Star-Gazette (2/20) reports a crackdown on retail stores "selling products that might be used in conjunction with illegal drugs in the city of Elmira appeared to be having an impact Monday. In an informal survey by the Star-Gazette on Monday of seven city convenience and variety stores, only one offered an item that probably has no other use than for inhaling illegal drugs. Last Friday, Elmira Police Chief W. Scott Drake III and a member of the United States Drug Enforcement Administration visited five businesses in the city that were found to be selling drug paraphernalia, including crack and methamphetamine pipes, scales and drug packaging materials."

Report: Gangs Use "Net Banging" To Find Recruits. On its Web site, ABC News (2/19) reports that according to a recent survey by the Justice Department, there "are currently more than 21,000 gangs in the United States. Their membership is 700,000 strong and growing, and they're using the Internet to recruit members. By posting online content that glorifies the thug lifestyle, gangs are using the Web to recruit — some using children as young as 8 years old as part of the online recruiting process, known as 'Net Banging.'"

"Economic Refugees" Said To Be Replenishing Taliban Ranks As Poppies Are Eradicated. In the Wall Street Journal (2/20, A16) Vanda Felbab-Brown writes, "As NATO braces for a spring Taliban offensive in Afghanistan, many in the Bush administration, the Congress and the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime are calling for it to take on a prominent role in combating the narcotics trade. Although this task is meant to help Afghanistan repress the worrisome, if predictable, expansion of its opium economy, it will greatly hamper NATO's effectiveness. NATO's crucial role is to establish security throughout the country -- and not to dilute its focus in eradication and interdiction missions that are presently bound to fail. … Meanwhile, the damage to the crops has generated a new wave of economic refugees to Pakistan, many of whom have been replenishing the ranks of the Taliban."

Scandal Said To Be Putting Plan Colombia In Jeopardy. The Washington Post (2/17) reported Rep. Sander M. Levin (D-Mich.) "said Colombian officials cannot count on easy passage of a free-trade agreement or military assistance, as is currently being provided under a program known as Plan Colombia. 'Colombia F.T.A. cannot pass the Congress, as constructed, and Plan Colombia is in more jeopardy because of these scandals, the infiltration of the paramilitary into the inner workings of the Colombian government,' Levin said." The Post notes that on Thursday, "Sen. Álvaro Araújo Castro, the brother of Foreign Minister Maria Consuelo Araújo, was arrested along with three other senators and a congressman. Authorities said they are investigating links that those lawmakers -- along with a sixth legislator who remains at large -- may have had ties to a paramilitary organization that has terrorized [Colombia] for years while shipping tons of cocaine to U.S. cities."

Police Chiefs Worried About Spread Of Assault Rifles. USA Today (2/20, 1A, Johnson) reports, "Law enforcement agencies across the country have been upgrading their firepower to deal with what they say is the increasing presence of high-powered weapons on the streets." USA Continues, "Scott Knight, chairman of the Firearms Committee of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, says an informal survey of about 20 departments revealed that since 2004 all of the agencies have either added weapons to officers' patrol units or have replaced existing weaponry with military-style arms." USA adds, "Knight, police chief in Chaska, Minn., says the upgrades have occurred since a national ban on certain assault weapons expired in September 2004. The ban, passed in 1994, in part prohibited domestic gunmakers from producing semi-automatic weapons and ammunition dispensers holding more than 10 rounds. … 'This (weapons upgrade) is being done with an eye to the absolute knowledge that more higher-caliber weapons are on the street since the expiration of the ban,' Knight said.He said his own department of about 20 officers is in the midst of determining whether to upgrade its weapons. … Ron Stucker, criminal investigations chief of the Orange County Sheriff's Department in Florida, says the department has been rearming many of its deputies with assault weapons in the past two years. … Stucker says deputies are now 'frequently' encountering assault weapons in local robberies and during simple traffic stops. Weapons seizures in Orlando have increased overall by 26% since 2004."

IMMIGRATION:

Florida Ruling Will Help Foreign Convicts Fight Deportation. The Miami Herald (2/19, Chardy, Weaver) reports, "Owran Green thought he made a good deal when he agreed more than 13 years ago to plead no contest to assault and battery charges in Broward County in exchange for probation and no jail time. … It would be years before he realized his mistake. The Jamaican, now 35, learned from an immigration attorney that his plea renderered him deportable under a decade-old federal law that made expulsion of most convicted criminals mandatory. … But this past fall, the Florida Supreme Court issued a landmark ruling that could help Green and hundreds of other foreign nationals in the same predicament avoid expulsion if they can show they cut their plea deals without being legally warned about deportation." The Herald continues, "The high court's ruling could provide convicted foreigners with another layer of defense against stepped-up efforts by Homeland Security after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to rid the country of immigration violators, particularly those with criminal convictions. … The unanimous Green ruling, issued Oct. 26, has given renewed hope to numerous convicted foreigners now seeking withdrawal of plea deals -- including dozens in Miami-Dade Circuit Court." The Herald adds, "Almost all of the pleas in question were struck in the 1990s, when judges didn't uniformly advise defendants they could be deported by pleading guilty or no contest to charges. Most of those defendants have served sentences and are now seeking to have convictions thrown out to inoculate themselves against possible deportation. … 'It's had a considerable impact in all of our criminal divisions,' said prosecutor Penny Brill, chief of the legal division at the Miami-Dade State Attorney's Office. 'It's now an easier standard for these defendants to meet.' … In Green's case, he sought to withdraw his plea in September 2003, arguing that had he been warned about deportation he would have taken his chances at trial. A judge rejected his petition because no actual deportation proceedings had begun."

Border Violence On The Rise In Arizona. The Washington Post (2/19, A3, Moreno, 690K) reports on the "unusual," according to Alonzo Peña, new US Immigration and Customs Enforcement special agent in charge of Arizona, "recent frequency" of incidents of border violence, "the fact these incidents resulted in deaths and that they occurred in the desert, where the crime scenes are hard to find within the thousands of acres of sand and brush. … Smuggling violence has increased in Arizona during the past six months, the byproduct of a clampdown by federal immigration authorities, Peña said." The US-Mexico border in Arizona "remains the busiest illegal entry point in the country, but the increased concentration of Border Patrol agents and National Guard troops stationed there during the past year has made it harder to cross. In the past 18 months, enforcement operations have been stepped up in Arizona, with strong backing from Gov. Janet Napolitano (D), who declared a state of emergency in Arizona's border counties in 2005 because of illegal immigration."

Illegal Who Testified Against Border Agent Was Given Documents, Money. The Washington Times (2/19, Seper, 88K) reports, "An illegal alien got a 'get out of jail free card' plus US legal documents and monetary compensation from federal prosecutors in exchange for his testimony against a U.S. Border Patrol agent accused of using excessive force during an arrest. Former agent David Sipe, who was convicted and fired, recently won an acquittal at a court-ordered retrial." The Times adds, "A federal appeals court in Texas ordered the new trial, saying prosecutors gave the illegal alien and two others additional inducements not disclosed at the time for their testimony, including Social Security cards, witness fees, permits allowing travel to and from Mexico, living expenses and free use of government phones."

US Asylum Process Said To Remain Inconsistent. The Washington Post (2/19, A18, 690K) says in an editorial that two years ago, "the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom released a report detailing the upsetting inconsistency with which immigration agents and judges treat foreigners seeking asylum in the United States. The study's conclusion: Asylum seekers are often not given a fair chance to argue their cases, putting legitimate claimants -- especially those who can't contact a lawyer -- at risk of being sent back to their countries of origin, where they face retribution from their governments. This month, the commission issued a follow-up that included a report card on the government's progress since the original study. Both the Department of Homeland Security and the Justice Department earned a fair number of D's and F's from the bipartisan group."

Immigrant Entrepreneurs Boost Inner-City Economies. U.S. News and World Report (2/26, Rayasam, 2.03M) reports, "Immigrant entrepreneurs are helping fuel the U.S. economy. Recent studies show not only that immigrants are starting businesses at a faster rate than native-born Americans but that many of those businesses are refreshing neglected inner-city neighborhoods. … It's the kind of pattern that's enlivening immigrant pockets in cities like New York and Los Angeles, according to the Center for an Urban Future."

TAX:

Ebay Opposes Administration Plan To Report Users To IRS. The Financial Times (2/20, Callan) reports, "Ebay is fiercely resisting a Bush administration plan it says will force it to snitch on customers who are not paying tax on billions earned on the popular online auction site." The Times continues, "The Treasury estimates it could collect $2bn in unpaid tax if companies such as eBay reported American users who carry out more than 100 transactions worth at least $5,000 a year to the Internal Revenue Service. … But an eBay spokesperson said: 'We do not believe it is our responsibility to serve as the go-between. We believe that it is the seller's responsibility.' The company pointed out that many users file self-employment and business tax returns based on their eBay income." The Times adds, "Ebay said it would co-operate with IRS investigations into specific persons but would not voluntarily report its customers' sales 'en masse'. … The US measure, planned to come into effect on January 1, 2008, would only affect American users of eBay, but separately this week UK Revenue and Customs warned taxpayers to report income from eBay activity or face penalties."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Senate GOP Outlines Seven-Point Agenda. The Washington Times (2/19, Bellantoni, 88K) reports, "Senate Republicans have pledged to fight for up-or-down votes on President Bush's judicial nominees and to make his tax cuts permanent, but they face an uphill battle in pushing their agenda. Republican leaders have outlined seven issues they plan to highlight in the shadow of the Democratic majority, which has its own priorities and the power to bring them to the floor." Senate Republican Conference Chairman Jon Kyl of Arizona "said his party unanimously agreed on a set of guiding principles and revealed them in advance of forthcoming legislative specifics. … Attempting to make the Bush tax cuts permanent; Supporting Mr. Bush's plan to increase the size of the military; Pushing earmark reform; Expanding domestic oil production and alternative energy research. Another of the seven issues is related to health care. Republicans say they will propose creation of small-business health-insurance plans, expansion of health savings accounts and support for the health care tax plan Mr. Bush promoted in his State of the Union address last month, with the idea 'all Americans can receive quality health care.' … One of the thornier issues at the bottom of the Republican agenda is immigration reform."

Groups Call On Congress To Make CRS Reports Public. The Washington Post (2/19, A17, Williamson, 690K) reports, "Deep inside the Library of Congress, 500 researchers pound out the secret intelligence Congress uses to make law. Legislators request 6,000 Congressional Research Service reports a year, on weapons systems and farm subsidies, prescription prices and energy use. Together, they offer what lobbyists and industry want most: clues to what's next on the Hill. For years, open-government groups have fought to make the reports public, and for years, many lawmakers have kept them under wraps. Or so they thought." The Post adds, "By insisting on secrecy, Congress instead created a bootleg market for the research. Every day, a small Texas company compiles the reports and sells them to lobbyists, lawyers and others who pay thousands of dollars for a peek at the reports and what they say about the congressional agenda. And it's all legal. … Open-government groups have a problem with that," and they "have fought back by posting every CRS report they can find on their Web sites. But watchdog groups have released only about 10 percent of the total, not enough to reveal the patterns that suggest what Congress might do next."

Walter Reed Aid Director Allegedly Had Conflict Of Interest. The Washington Post (2/20, A1, Priest, Hull, 690K) reports that for the "past three years, Michael J. Wagner directed the Army's largest effort to help the most vulnerable soldiers at Walter Reed Army Medical Center." He was responsible for matching "big-hearted donors with thousands of wounded soldiers who could not afford to feed their children, pay mortgages, buy plane tickets or put up visiting families in nearby hotels." But while "he was being paid to provide this vital service to patients, outpatients and their relations, Wagner was also seeking funders and soliciting donations for his own new charity, based in Texas, according to documents and interviews with current and former staff members. Some families also said Wagner treated them callously and made it hard for them to receive assistance." The medical center has "launched a criminal investigation of Wagner after The Washington Post sought a response to his activities while he ran the Army's Medical Family Assistance Center, a position he left several weeks ago."

Walter Reed Hospital Repairing Outpatient Housing. The Washington Post (2/20, A1, Priest, Hull, 690K) reports Walter Reed Army Medical Center "began repairs yesterday on Building 18, a former hotel that is used to house outpatients recuperating from injuries suffered in Iraq and Afghanistan and that has been plagued with mold, leaky plumbing and a broken elevator." Facility's commander Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman "said Army staff members inspected each of the 54 rooms at the building and discovered that outstanding repair orders for half the rooms had not been completed. He said that mold removal had begun on several rooms and that holes in ceilings, stained carpets and leaking faucets were being fixed." The Post adds Walter Reed, "the Army's premier medical facility, has turned into a holding ground for wounded soldiers during 5 1/2 years of sustained combat. Almost 700 outpatients suffering from physical injuries and psychological problems live on the 113-acre military post or in nearby quarters. Many linger there for 18 months or longer as they move through the Army's numbing bureaucracy."

Younger CIA Employees Chafe At Ban On Personal Media Items. The Washington Post (2/19, D1, Barr, 690K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that at CIA headquarters, "iPods are banned. So are cellphones." Workplace restrictions "like these are among the smaller sacrifices that CIA employees make on behalf of the nation's security. But a wave of new hires at the agency are very, very tech savvy and, it seems, not shy about their interests." Cindy Bower, the CIA's chief of human resources, said, "They are pushing us to change in ways that, from a security perspective, we might not be ready to change. They want to use BlackBerrys, and they've got iPods they want to bring in and listen to music." The Post adds the "new hires also are prodding the agency to improve its information technology systems. 'They want it faster and better,' said Michael J. Morell, associate deputy director and the No. 3 at the agency. 'I think it is a very healthy thing.'" The Post adds, "Perhaps no federal agency is changing as rapidly as the CIA. The terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, shook up an intelligence community that had been downsizing since the end of the Cold War. Since then, recruitment and hiring have become a CIA priority." Forty percent "of the workforce has arrived since Sept. 11, 2001. Of the new hires, 60 percent are under age 30, and 85 percent are under 40. One in six have military experience."

Scalia Said To Wield More Power In Roberts Court. The Los Angeles Times (2/20, Savage, 850K) reports, "It has been two decades in the making, but this is the year Justice Antonin Scalia, the Supreme Court's most outspoken dissenter, could emerge as a leader of a new conservative majority among the justices. Between now and late June, the court is set to hand down decisions in four areas of law -- race, religion, abortion regulation and campaign finance -- where Scalia's views may now represent the majority." The Times adds, "In each of those areas, the retirement of centrist Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and her replacement with Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. figure to tip the court to the right." That "would give 70-year old Scalia the chance to take on a role that has largely eluded him: speaking for the court in major rulings." Scalia, adds the Times, "is not known for seeing shades of gray in legal disputes; instead, he has favored clear rules and broad decisions."

Grassley Warns He May Block Minimum Wage Conference. Roll Call (2/20, Pierce) reports, "In a role reversal, Senate Finance ranking member Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) has warned that he may block a House-Senate conference on the minimum-wage bill unless he is assured his Democratic colleagues will join him in demanding inclusion of a sizable tax-cut package. 'The contours of the deal should be known if details can't be,' a Grassley aide said of his insistence that Democrats agree to pursue a small-business tax package that is much larger than the $1.4 billion House-passed proposal." Roll Call adds, "Anticipating criticism from Democrats, the Grassley aide pointed out that Republicans agreed to 'pre-conference' a large corporate tax package in the 109th Congress — assuring Senate Democrats, for example, that the measure would be revenue-neutral, among other things. Once they secured those promises, Democrats finally allowed the measure to be sent to conference with the House. Before that, Senate Democrats had blocked three votes to end debate on the motion to appoint conferees, the aide said. … Mindful that Grassley could lead a potential filibuster of one of the Democrats' top legislative priorities, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has not ruled out the idea of pre-conferencing the minimum-wage-hike bill, and he has been talking actively with Republicans on how to proceed to conference, said Reid spokesman Jim Manley."

Frank Says Adoption Of Inflation Target Would Be A "Terrible Mistake." The Financial Times (2/20, Guha) reports, "It would be a 'terrible mistake' for the Federal Reserve to adopt any form of inflation target to guide its interest rate decisions, Barney Frank, the Democratic chairman of the House financial services committee, has told the Financial Times." Frank, "whose committee is one of two in Congress charged with oversight of the US central bank, said such a target 'would come at the expense of equal consideration of the other main goal, that is employment.'" Ben Bernanke, "chairman of the Fed, believes that the bank would be better off with a relatively flexible inflation target – one that would be achieved on average, rather than within a specific time, giving maximum latitude to respond to output shocks. However, Fed watchers say that, in order to make any such change, Mr Bernanke would need at least the tacit consent of key figures in Congress."

Women Making Faster Gains Than Men In Job Market. The Wall Street Journal (2/20, Treftz, 2.04M) reports, "Women took on slightly more than half of US jobs created in the first part of the decade and made gains in securing the most lucrative openings. Women posted a net increase of 1.7 million jobs paying above the median salary, while men gained a net increase of just over 220,000 of such positions, according to a Bureau of Labor Statistics report for the years 2000-2005. … Overall, men gained 1,804,000 jobs and women 1,996,000, or 52.5% of the total increase, for the period studied." The Journal adds, "Women outpaced men in obtaining work that pays in the top quarter of all jobs."

Commercial Construction Experiencing Boom. The Christian Science Monitor (2/20, Scherer, 59K) reports, "Residential construction fell 2 percent last year, but private commercial construction rose 16 percent, and public construction was up 10 percent, according to the US Census Bureau. The last time the business was this strong was seven years ago, says Kenneth Simonson, chief economist for the Associated General Contractors. Behind the commercial-construction push is a combination of powerful economic forces: For one, gigantic investment pools… are looking for places to invest. Also, an enormous growth of imports into the United States is spurring a rush to build new warehouse space. Moreover, developers are building new communities that offer environmentally friendly spaces to work and require less commuting time. These complexes also offer nightlife and restaurant options." The Monitor adds, "Even some parts of the country where construction has lagged in the past are experiencing a boom."

Stock Markets Expected To Continue Record Climb. The Wall Street Journal (2/20, C1, Browning, 2.04M) reports, "It is the kind of surprise investors love to get: The economy seems to be just a little stronger than most people expected. Not enough to worry anyone; just enough to push stocks higher Data on items such as fourth-quarter economic growth and consumer spending have come in a tad better than markets expected late last year." As a result, the Dow Jones Industrial Average "has continued its steady rise, and stocks that do better in a strong economy have been among the leaders." On Wall Street, "the mood is downright bullish. … Amid solid growth with minimal inflation world-wide, the world's stock markets are feeding on one another's success."

USA Today (2/20, 1B, Shell, 2.27M), meanwhile, says "the relationship between politics and stock market profitability tends to be most cordial in the year prior to a presidential election. It is that historical statistical quirk that should provide some solace to investors concerned about another calendar-related anomaly on Wall Street: the fact that stocks have not had a 2% pullback since July 14, a span of 149 trading sessions. That uninterrupted uptrend, says Ned Davis Research, lags behind only a correctionless stretch that ended in 1954."

Job Corps Revamps Programs For New Economy. The New York Times (2/20, Eckholm, 1.16M) reports, "As the economy has turned against those with low skills and researchers have questioned the long-term impact of the Job Corps on the lives of its graduates, this remnant of the Great Society is facing an urgent need to reinvent itself." Dr. Esther R. Johnson, a "career executive in the Labor Department with a doctorate in education who took over the corps last March," said, "Once you could go into the Job Corps and get a G.E.D. and go out and make a living. You can't do that anymore." The Times adds, "Dr. Johnson wants the Job Corps to aim higher, helping graduates into careers with a bigger paycheck." To do that "she plans to lengthen the average stay for many graduates beyond the current 11.4 months, improving their reading, math and vocational skills. She also wants trade courses to connect more closely with college programs and emerging industries, and she thinks the corps must double the number of graduates, now just 10 percent, who go on to higher education." Dr. Johnson says this "can be done…within a budget flat-lined at $1.5 billion in recent years, mainly by increasing the rigor of courses while cutting other costs."

Herbert Looks Forward To End Of Bush's Administration. The New York Times' Bob Herbert (2/19) writes, "The essential issue facing the U.S. at this point in our history" is "whether, once the Bush administration has finally and mercifully run its course, the country goes back to being a reasonably peaceful, lawful, constructive force in the world, or whether we continue down the bullying, warlike, unilateral, irresponsible, unlawful and profoundly ineffective path laid out by Bush, Cheney & Co. … I don't think most Americans are up for perennial warfare."

LATimes Criticizes Congressional "Censorship" Of TV Violence. The Los Angeles Times (2/19, 850K) says in an editorial that in response to "a request from lawmakers, the Federal Communications Commission has drafted a report outlining what Congress might do to curb excessively violent programs. Objectionably violent shows, it says, could be banned during the hours that children are most likely to be watching TV (6 a.m. to 10 p.m.), just as indecent programming is." But while there is "plenty of evidence that television shows are more graphically violent than ever, both on cable networks and on free over-the-air TV," simply "noting this problem, however, doesn't prove that government censorship can solve it." What censorship "would do is deter networks from airing valuable but bloody shows that don't quite qualify as news, while generating lawsuits over what inevitably will be inconsistent standards for judging violence on TV." The government "shouldn't be making these calls; parents should."

Historians "Abandon Their Usual Caution" In Judging Bush's Presidency. U.S. News and World Report (2/26, Tolson, 2.03M), in its cover article on "The 10 Worst Presidents," reports, "Is George W. Bush's presidency shaping up to be one of the worst in U.S. history? You hear the question being asked more and more these days. And more and more, you hear the same answer. With Iraq a shambles and trust in the administration declining, it is probably not surprising that 54 percent of respondents in a recent USA Today/Gallup survey said that history would judge Bush a below-average or poor president. … Public opinion is a notoriously fickle beast, of course, which is why historians and other custodians of the long view prefer to reserve judgment until they can speak of their subjects in the past tense. But clearly something about Bush ii has inspired many historians to abandon their usual caution."

Conservative Judges May Be Bush's Lasting Legacy. US News & World Report's "Washington Whispers" column (2/18, Bedard) reports, "The White House is still holding out hope that it will have a chance to name a third justice to the Supreme Court and cement its conservative tilt for generations to come. 'We need one more on the Supreme Court,' says a Bushie who was instrumental in getting Chief Justice John G. Roberts and Associate Justice Samuel Alito aboard. But with Democrats now running the Senate, pushing another conservative through might be hard. … Meantime, the White House is seeking to add 17 more U.S. Circuit Court judges before leaving town in 2009. 'This is our biggest legacy,' says the official. And rightly so: Almost 30 percent of federal judges are Bush picks, he says."

Gonzalez's Tenure At USCIS Said To Ride On Success Of Fee Increase. The Washington Times (2/20, Dinan, 88K) reports though US Citizenship and Immigration Services is "usually thought of as the kinder, gentler arm of immigration," the agency "helps nab an average of five criminals a day, including the occasional murder suspect -- a point that agency Director Emilio Gonzalez underscores when he discusses the USCIS role in the Homeland Security Department." In the year since he took over the agency, Gonzalez "has started a pilot program to test a new naturalized citizenship exam, finished off a backlog of millions of benefit applications and created several offices that would put national security first at the agency. But those who interact most with USCIS say Mr. Gonzalez's tenure will succeed or fail on his latest proposal to increase fees an average of more than 60 percent in order to finish the transformation from a much-maligned 20th-century paper-based bureaucracy into 21st-century streamlined, self-sufficient, services-based enterprise."

Pelosi Taps First Black Woman To Be House Clerk. The Washington Post (2/20, A11, Layton, 690K) reports that at "6 feet 2 inches tall, Lorraine C. Miller cuts a striking figure in the polished hallways of the U.S. Capitol. Last week, the woman with regal bearing gained another, more lasting distinction. She was sworn in as clerk of the House of Representatives, the first African American to hold the seat since it was created in 1789." House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) "tapped Miller for the job, citing her work ethic, knowledge of the Hill and ability to make connections across party lines, in addition to her trailblazer status."

NASA's Renewed Focus On Lunar Exploration Applauded. In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/20, 1.16M) planetary scientist Carolyn Porco writes, "After years of spending our nation's space budget building an orbiting space station of questionable utility, serviced by an operationally expensive space shuttle of unsafe design, NASA has set a new direction for the future of human spaceflight. Once again, we have our sights on the Moon ... and beyond. We are finally, bodily, going to make our way into space, this time to stay." Porco adds that the official plans "call not for flag-planting and grab-a-few-rocks-and-go but, by 2025, a solar-powered, human-tended, continuously inhabited research outpost. … What is not out of the question is our ability to pay to keep the goal front and center. We are now spending in Iraq, in a single month, $9 billion — more than half the annual budget NASA needs to stay on course."

US Chamber, Center For American Progress To Release Joint Program For Education. The Politico (2/20, Glass) reports that on February 28, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the Center for American Progress "plan to unveil their joint platform for change." The chamber reported a poll of businesses showed 87 percent "said the current No Child Left Behind requirements should extend all the way through high school." The two organizations' presidents Thomas J. Donohue and John D. Podesta will release their platform and also "plan to grade all 50 state education programs, plus that of the District of Columbia, from kindergarten through 12th grade."

Educators Call For More Attention To Character Education. Charles C. Haynes, senior scholar at the First Amendment Center in Washington, and Marvin W. Berkowitz, Sanford N. McDonnell Professor of Character Education at the University of Missouri-St. Louis, write in USA Today (2/20, 13A, 2.27M) in favor of the importance of character education, writing "shouldn't we be paying more attention to the kinds of human beings who do the math and read the books?" The two praise the work of Principal Kristen Pelster of Ridgewood Middle School, in Arnold, Missouri who, along with now former-Principal Tim Crutchley adopted a program of character education resulting in higher academic performance, fewer disciplinary problems "and the student failure rate has dropped to zero."

McCain Says He Supports Overturning Roe Vs. Wade. The AP (2/19, Davenport) reports Sen. John McCain "said Sunday the court decision that legalized abortion should be overturned." McCain told a crowd in South Carolina: "I do not support Roe versus Wade. It should be overturned." McCain "also vowed that if elected, he would appoint judges who 'strictly interpret the Constitution of the United States and do not legislate from the bench.'" The AP adds, "McCain's campaign also announced early Sunday that he had been endorsed by former Oklahoma Gov. Frank Keating, who had been considering his own bid for the White House, and former Texas Sen. Phil Gramm.

McCain Blasts Rumsfeld At South Carolina Stop. The AP (2/20, Smith) reports Sen. John McCain said "the war in Iraq has been mismanaged for years and former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld will be remembered as one of the worst in history." Speaking to "an overflow crowd of more than 800 at a retirement community near Hilton Head Island, SC," McCain said, "We are paying a very heavy price for the mismanagement — that's the kindest word I can give you — of Donald Rumsfeld, of this war. The price is very, very heavy and I regret it enormously." The AP adds McCain, "the ranking Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee, complained that Rumsfeld never put enough troops on the ground to succeed in Iraq." McCain said, "I think that Donald Rumsfeld will go down in history as one of the worst secretaries of defense in history." The AP adds McCain's "comments were in sharp contrast to McCain's statement when Rumsfeld resigned in November, and failed to address the reality that President Bush is the commander in chief."

Fox News' Special Report (2/19, Garrett) reported Sen. John McCain "pushed for conservative support in South Carolina. Today he bashed the Senate's rare Saturday session to vote on whether to debate a non-binding resolution opposing the president's Iraq troop surge." McCain was shown saying, "It was a charade and a joke and a publicity stunt on the part of the Democrats in the Senate, because they wanted to embarrass the president of the United States, my friends."

McCain Said To Be Following Bush Playbook. On MSNBC's "Hardball" (2/19, Matthews), MSNBC political analyst Howard Fineman said, "The McCain people are following the George W. Bush playbook to the extent they possibly can. The same donors, the same issues, the same at the attitudes all the way down the line. And it is so ironic given where McCain was seven years ago."

Gramm Says McCain Is The Best Leader For Our Times. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (2/20, A17), former Sen. Phil Gramm says, "Today's mortal need is for a leader who trusts our people enough to tell them the truth about the festering domestic problems that have been swept under the rug for a quarter-century. We need a president who can face up to these problems even as he leads an increasingly reluctant country in a war against a dangerous enemy that will follow us home from any battlefield on which we are defeated." Gramm adds, "I believe the man we need to meet the mortal need today is here. He is experienced, but has not lost his common sense or his ability to be outraged. His conservatism is not the result of a studied philosophy, but of common sense and personal observation. His name is John McCain. He might not be the right president for all times, but he is the right president for these times." Gramm cites the budget deficit, free trade, and entitlement reform, among other issues.

More Energetic, Conservative McCain On Display In Iowa. The Washington Post (2/19, A4, Balz, 690K) reports

McCain "has shown little of the exuberance of the Republican outsider…in 2000. Now virtually hostage to the success of Bush's Iraq war policy…McCain has appeared subdued, even dour. … But as he campaigned across Iowa this weekend, there were flashes of the old McCain." McCain "staunchly defended his position on the war, decried a Republican Party that he said has lost its way and punctuated question-and-answer sessions with his particular brand of humor. When a man said he was serving in the Marines in Vietnam around the time McCain was being held in a North Vietnamese prison camp, the senator interjected, 'Why didn't you come get me?'" According to the Post, "the differences between 2000 and today were evident. … This time he presents himself as the candidate who can restore core principles to the Republican Party, which he says became intoxicated by power before losing its congressional majorities in the 2006 midterm elections. His message this time is more overtly conservative, and his campaign identifies more openly with the socially conservative wing of the party."

The Politico (2/19, Martin), in an article with a strikingly dissimilar analysis of McCain's weekend campaigning, reports, "This weekend in Iowa, McCain's old ebullience was replaced by a mood that seemed to fluctuate between sober and downright morose as he and the voters he met kept returning to a single topic: Iraq. Nor was the weekend an exception." McCain "deployed his usual mix of corny cracks and jocular repartee with audience members. But the levity was no match for the deeply serious questions that McCain found himself on the receiving end of at his first stop of the day in Des Moines."

Romney Now Supports "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" Policy. The Washington Post (2/19, A4, Solomon, 690K) reports former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney, "who once advocated allowing gays to serve openly in the military, said yesterday that he does not think the Pentagon should change its 'don't ask, don't tell' policy in the midst of the Iraq war. ' 'Don't ask, don't tell' has worked well. We're in the middle of a conflict. Now is not the time for a change in that regard, and I don't have a policy posture as to allowing gays in the military to serve there openly,' Romney…said on ABC's 'This Week.'"

Romney Defends Opposition To Stem Cell Research. The AP (2/20, Jackson) reports Mitt Romney "on Monday defended his opposition to most embryonic stem cell research despite its scientific promise to cure diseases like multiple sclerosis that afflicts his wife, Ann." Romney said in an interview "he was confident that research on adult stem cells and the existing embryonic stem cell lines could eventually provide the medical answers." Romney said, "I believe that science is able to receive the stem cells necessary for research through means that don't represent a serious, moral problem." The AP adds Romney said "his wife would play a prominent role in his campaign for president." Romney said, "Were she not healthy I would not have run. … She is able to manage her disease such that she does not overdo or cause herself physical problem. Were that not the case, we'd have made a different decision. We'd be in the sun somewhere." Romney also "defended his recent decision to join the National Rifle Association, saying that he has always supported the 2nd Amendment and dismissing criticism that his membership amounts to political opportunism." He "defended his decision to vote for Democrat Paul Tsongas in the 1992 Massachusetts Democratic presidential primary." Romney said, "We have an open primary where we can vote for people other than Bill Clinton and I voted against Bill Clinton."

Romney Defends Faith At Florida Event. Fox News' Special Report (2/19, Garrett) reported, "One of McCain's rivals, former Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney, confronts skepticism of a different kind, his Mormon faith. A heckler raised it this weekend in Florida." Unidentified heckler: "You sir, you are a pretender. You do not know the lord. You are a Mormon." Romney: "Let me offer a thought, and that is one of the great things about this great land is we have people of different faiths and different persuasions, and I'm convinced that the nation does need to have people of different faiths, but we need to have a person of faith lead the country." Garrett: "The Mormon issue comes up a lot, and in this case at least, it appears Romney got the better of that encounter. Romney faces pro- choice, and pro-abortion, and pro-life skepticism as well."

NBC Correspondent "Trashes" Romney. On Fox News' "The O'Reilly Factor" (2/19), Bill O'Reilly said, "More evidence that NBC News is now a committed left wing organization. After Republican Mitt Romney announced he was running for president, NBC News correspondent Chip Reid trashed him." Reid was shown saying, "He's barely out of the starting blocks, and I'm going to go right for his knees. No. 1, he's a Mormon. That's something evangelicals have a problem with. No. 2, he's a flip- flopper." O'Reilly added, "All right, he's a flip-flopper. It's hard to believe when you understand that Mr. Reid covers Congress for the NBC Nightly News with Brian Williams. Nice objectivity. The woman giggling with him is Anna Marie Cox, works for TIME magazine, use to edit a Marxist magazine. OK. Ms. Cox did. Now, there was nobody in that discussion sticking up for Romney. Nobody." Fox News analyst Michelle Malkin added, "Well, the Reid clip was remarkable. First, his Tony Soprano pose about going after -- you know, right for...Mitt Romney's knees. Ha, ha, ha. And then you got the giggly Anna Marie Cox, you know, breaking out into laughter over that. And then just the political characterization that is just so out of touch from reality. … I think this was implications for the larger political coverage, leading up to 2008 for sure."

Cohen Says Romney "Thoroughly Counterfeit." In his Washington Post column (2/20, A13), Richard Cohen says, "I have been following the zigs and zags of Mitt Romney, the former Massachusetts governor and now Republican presidential candidate, watching him grow progressively less progressive, sort of making himself up as he goes along. As a result, I surf the Web with trepidation, bracing myself for the story that I fear might be coming: 'Romney Says He Is Not Really a Mormon.'" What's an "ambitious, square-jawed opportunist to do? He might do as he has done in the past and change his position." Cohen cites Romney's change of position on issues such as gay rights, abortion, adding he is "in a class of his own. He used to have fairly reasonable positions on gun control. Within the past year, though, he joined the National Rifle Association -- an admission made under some duress Sunday to George Stephanopoulos on ABC's 'This Week.' ' In fact, to watch Romney on the show was to see a thoroughly counterfeit man."

Obama Said To Be Overtaking Clinton In The South. The Politico's Mike Allen (2/19) writes, "At the annual Jefferson-Jackson Dinner of the Democratic Party of Virginia on Saturday, the Hillary Clinton signs and bumper stickers were free," while "'Obama '08 Gear' was for sale – T-shirt, $20; button, $10; sign, $5. And he had a lot more takers than she did, suggesting he might be making early inroads in a tough region that once was Confederate soil. Party officials say their previous record for the dinner was 1,400 seats. But after" Obama "was announced as the keynote speaker, sales ballooned and the party kept expanding the dinner until tit had space for 3,200 at the Greater Richmond Convention Center. A few hours before the dinner, Gov. Tim Kaine became the first governor outside of Illinois to endorse Obama. Hastings Wyman, founder of the Southern Political Report, "said that while Clinton retains her hold on the African-American establishment, which is crucial in Southern primaries, Obama has the most appeal among younger African-Americans." Larry J. Sabato, director of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia, "says his students 'are nuts about' Obama and that among Democratic students, 'He's the only one they're interested in. He's like Reagan or Kennedy, with an ability to connect with people individually in a large group. Hillary? Get real. She doesn't have that. Whatever 'it' is, he has it.'"

Obama Accused Of Overstating His Community Involvement In His Memoir. The Los Angeles Times (2/19, Wallsten, 850K) reports, "The drama began with a tiny ad in a local newspaper — a notice that asbestos was about to be removed from the management office at Altgeld Gardens, the all-black public housing complex where young Barack Obama worked as a community organizer. … As the 24-year-old mentor to public housing residents, Obama says he initiated and led efforts that thrust Altgeld's asbestos problem into the headlines," but "others tell the story much differently. They say Obama did not play the singular role in the asbestos episode that he portrays in the best-selling memoir, 'Dreams From My Father: A Story of Race and Inheritance.' … 'Just because someone writes it doesn't make it true,' said Hazel Johnson, a longtime Altgeld resident who…began pushing for a variety of environmental cleanups years before he arrived." Rep. Bobby L. Rush "said it was Johnson's work…that sparked the interest of Chicago officials. … While he has not read Obama's memoir, Rush, who has been a political rival of Obama's in recent years, said Johnson's role was so prominent that he was 'offended' by anyone telling the Altgeld story without including her."

Hollywood A-List To Attend Obama Fundraiser. The New York Times (2/20, Halbfinger, 1.16M) reports Tom Hanks "has bought a $2,300 ticket. So have Jennifer Aniston, Eddie Murphy and Denzel Washington. The studio bosses from Universal, Paramount, Disney and 20th Century Fox have all sent checks or faxed their credit card numbers, too." Given the "A-list stars, movie and music moguls, and top Hollywood dealmakers who have sent their R.S.V.P.'s, one would think the man of honor at Tuesday night's benefit at the Beverly Hilton would be getting a lifetime achievement award. But the toast of the evening is" Sen. Barack Obama, "in his first foray to Los Angeles as a declared presidential candidate." It is "hard to say whether the unusual heat behind the evening owes more to interest in Mr. Obama or to the three men who spearheaded the fund-raiser: the DreamWorks co-founders David Geffen, Jeffrey Katzenberg and Steven Spielberg." The "haul is expected to be at least $1 million, making it the first major event here of the presidential campaign. (Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, will get a chance to flex her own Hollywood fund-raising muscles on March 24 at the estate of Ronald Burkle, the supermarket tycoon.)"

Axelrod Optimistic About Campaign's Course. On MSNBC's "Hardball" (2/19, Matthews), Obama strategist David Axelrod says, "Well, I am very encouraged, Chris, by what I see. Everywhere he has gone, and you were down there freezing with us in Springfield, when 15,000 people showed up for his announcement. He has been getting enormous crowds wherefore he goes. And I don't think it is just because of him. And I think he is sensational. But that is not why people are coming. They are coming because they really want to believe again and check back in and change the politics of this country. I think that is very powerful. And so I have a very optimistic feeling about this campaign." Asked how Obama would defeat Sen. Hillary Clinton in a Democratic primary, Axelrod said, "Sometimes it is hard to stop an idea whose time has come. I think people want to turn page, they want to move forward. They are looking to the future. I think Barack Obama represents the future."

WPost Says FEC Should Accept Obama's Plan To Preserve Public Financing. The Washington Post (2/20, A12, 690K) notes in an editorial that Sen. Obama "has asked the Federal Election Commission to rule on whether he could legally collect money for the general election campaign but ultimately decide to take public funding were he to win the nomination and his GOP opponent followed suit." The FEC "has said it is speeding up its review of Mr. Obama's intriguing proposal, which turns, as a legal matter, on the question of whether the candidate would be deemed to have 'accepted' money he is raising for the general election campaign if he keeps it separate and unused. If the money has been raised but not 'accepted,' Mr. Obama argues, he could still choose to return it and take public financing instead." This "might be a stretch that only a former Harvard Law Review president could love . But as a matter of policy, it could salvage a failing system to promote the aims underlying the law." The FEC "should allow that, and Mr. Obama's rivals in both parties should pledge, if they win the nomination, to help save the system, not destroy it."

Clinton Pollster's Firm Said To Have Potential Conflicts Of Interest. The Washington Post (2/20, A11, Birnbaum, 690K) reports Mark J. Penn "is a man who wears many hats: high-paid political and corporate pollster, chief executive of an international communications and lobbying company, and chief strategist to New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's bid for the Democratic presidential nomination." But Penn's firm, "Burson-Marsteller Worldwide -- with 2,000 employees and $300 million a year in revenue -- owns BKSH & Associates, the major lobbying firm chaired by Charles R. Black Jr. That's right, Black, counselor to Republican presidents, reports to Clinton's top strategist." Burson-Marsteller is "a subsidiary of WPP Group, a London-based advertising and PR giant that owns many of the biggest names on K Street. These include Quinn Gillespie & Associates, Wexler & Walker Public Policy Associates, Timmons & Co., Ogilvy Government Relations Worldwide (formerly the Federalist Group), Public Strategies Inc., Dewey Square Group and Hill & Knowlton." The "range of interests represented by" lobbyists employed by these firms "is a staggering list of corporate America's who's who, with Penn himself a longtime adviser to Microsoft." Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, said, "This is a classic example of how big money has inextricably intertwined the campaign advising and lobbying worlds of modern-day Washington with potential conflicts of interest all over the place."

Reid's Son Joins Clinton Campaign. USA Today (2/19, 4A, 2.27M) reports Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid's son Rory "has signed on as Nevada chairman for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential bid. Rory Reid, 44, is chairman of the Clark County, Nev., Commission and a former chairman of the Nevada State Democratic Party. He will be senior adviser on Western issues, including public lands, resources and conservation, transportation, growth and affordable housing, the New York senator's campaign said in a statement Sunday."

Some Conservatives' Animosity Towards Clinton Has Mellowed. The New York Times (2/19, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) reports, "Back when Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton was first lady, no one better embodied what she once called the 'vast right-wing conspiracy' than Richard Mellon Scaife." Scaife "spent more than $2 million investigating and publicizing accusations about the supposed involvement of Mrs. Clinton and former President Bill Clinton in corrupt land deals, sexual affairs, drug running and murder. But now…Scaife's checkbook is staying in his pocket. Christopher Ruddy, who once worked full-time for Mr. Scaife investigating the Clintons…said, 'Both of us have had a rethinking.' 'Clinton wasn't such a bad president,' Mr. Ruddy said. 'In fact, he was a pretty good president in a lot of ways, and Dick feels that way today.'" According to the Times, "For every conservative who says Mrs. Clinton will feel the wrath of the movement's grass-roots organizers later in the campaign…another expresses doubt that Clinton foes can ever be revved up as they once were."

Krugman Credits Edwards For Saying He Was Wrong To Authorize Iraq War. The New York Times' Paul Krugman (2/19) writes, "Many people are perplexed by the uproar over Senator Hillary Clinton's refusal to say, as former Senator John Edwards has, that she was wrong to vote for the Iraq war resolution. Why is it so important to admit past error? … For the last six years we have been ruled by men who are pathologically incapable of owning up to mistakes. And this pathology has had real, disastrous consequences. The situation in Iraq might not be quite so dire — and we might even have succeeded in stabilizing Afghanistan — if Mr. Bush or Vice President Dick Cheney had been willing to admit early on that things weren't going well or that their handpicked appointees weren't the right people for the job. The experience of Bush-style governance, together with revulsion at the way Karl Rove turned refusal to admit error into a political principle, is the main reason those now-famous three words from Mr. Edwards — 'I was wrong' — matter so much to the Democratic base."

Clinton, Obama Compete For Black Vote In South Carolina. Fox News' Special Report (2/19, Hume) reported, "Democratic presidential candidates are confronting the issue of race. The question is not only whether the country is ready for a black president, but whether black voters are likely to cast their ballots as a block for an African-American candidate." Fox News (Serrie) added, "Democratic presidential hopefuls are courting the black vote in South Carolina, a state where African-American accounted for 49 percent of the vote in the party's last presidential primary." Sen. Hillary Clinton: "I am the candidate with the experience to break the barriers, to win on behalf of the people of our country." Fox added, "Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton held a morning rally at historically black Allen University in Columbia, the same city where Friday Illinois Senator Barack Obama appeared to suggest he was blazing a new trail as an African American presidential candidate." Sen. Obama: Twenty years ago, nobody would have believed this crowd right here in South Carolina." Fox added, "South Carolina voters have mixed reaction on whether race, or for that matter gender, will have an effect on the outcome of the 2008 election."

The New York Times (2/20, Healy, 1.16M) reports Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton "told an audience of black voters on Monday that they would be 'breaking barriers' if they supported her for president in 2008 — deliberately signaling that they could still take pride in making history if they chose a woman over one of their own, Senator Barack Obama of Illinois." It was "a delicately worded pitch — Mrs. Clinton did not mention Mr. Obama by name — and it drew applause. Another remark, that 'anyone can be president,' set off an ecstatic standing ovation." Clinton and Obama "were both in South Carolina this holiday weekend competing for the support of blacks, who cast almost half of the votes in the Democratic primary here in 2004." Clinton's "task here became more complicated last week when one of her prominent black supporters, State Senator Robert Ford of South Carolina, said that nominating Mr. Obama would be a disaster." Ford said, "Every Democrat running on that ticket next year would lose because he's black and he's top of the ticket." The Times adds Obama "said Saturday that history was full of examples of people telling blacks, 'We can't.' He then said that, with black support, he could say to voters, 'Yes, we can.'" The Times adds Mrs. Clinton "also appeared at a tribute Monday in Charleston for the state's most powerful black Democrat, Representative James E. Clyburn, majority whip of the United States House, who also met with Mr. Obama over the weekend."

The Washington Post (2/20, A4, Cillizza, 690K) reports Clinton "courted black voters, considered crucial to securing the Democratic presidential nomination, in a series of campaign stops in South Carolina on Monday in which she cast the 2008 election as a chance to make history." Each of Clinton's "appearances was aimed at projecting her as the candidate best equipped to deal with the hopes and hardships of black voters. She called on state leaders to remove the Confederate flag from the grounds of the State House here, as have several other Democratic candidates. Then, after her town hall event at Allen University -- a historically black institution in Columbia -- she headed south to a gathering in Florence in honor of Mayor Frank Willis." Clinton's visit "came less than 48 hours after Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) campaigned here, and even during Clinton's speech in Columbia word was circulating that Obama had secured the endorsement of Dick Harpootlian, a former state party chairman."

The Politico (2/20, Smith) reports Clinton's "tailored case to a black audience reflected her new directness in talking about herself as a woman and a mother. Former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher reportedly took voice lessons to sound more like a man; Clinton has gone in the other direction since announcing her bid for the presidency, speaking more explicitly about her sex than ever before in her political career. And while the shift has the lofty aim of trying to change national attitudes toward women, it also reflects a cold, strategic reality." Clinton's "explicit embrace of her gender was a choice, and it represents a gamble of sorts" that "appears, so far, to be paying off. In particular, Clinton appears to have managed to avoid a mass defection of African-American supporters to Obama."

Hillary Clinton Denies Buying Black Legislator's Endorsement. The AP (2/20, Davenport) reports Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "on Monday denied that her campaign traded money for an endorsement from one of South Carolina's most influential black politicians." In an interview, Clinton "responded to questions about the consulting contract her campaign negotiated with state Sen. Darrell Jackson, who last week endorsed her candidacy rather than of top rivals John Edwards or Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill." Clinton said, "Senator Jackson was someone who was involved in my husband's campaigns. He was someone we turned to for political advice and counsel and I'm proud to have him on my team." The AP adds, "Soon after the endorsement, Jackson acknowledged that his media consulting firm had negotiated a $10,000 per month contract with Clinton's campaign. Jackson has said he turned down more lucrative contracts from other candidates." Although he "backed Edwards, the former North Carolina senator, in the 2004 Democratic presidential primary, Jackson said he now supports Clinton because she has the best shot of winning the White House."

Questions About Obama's Racial Identity Criticized. In his Washington Post column (2/20, A13), Eugene Robinson says, "Is Barack Obama 'authentically' black? Come on, be real. Is the pope Catholic?" Obama "made his first campaign trip to" South Carolina, "drawing about 3,000 people to a rally in Columbia, the state capital, and 2,000 to a 'town hall meeting' here in the city where I was born and raised. If those who rose early Saturday morning to attend the Orangeburg event constitute a representative focus group, black voters will want to weigh Obama's policy positions against those of the other candidates before deciding whom to support. But they won't spend a lot of time pondering his identity." State legislator Gilda Cobb-Hunter,

"an African American," had "no patience for the 'blackness' question that reporters kept asking." Cobb-Hunter said, "People talk as if this is, like, some kind of option for him. … I don't hear the national media questioning Hillary Clinton about being a woman."

Giuliani Said To Be "Nightmare" Candidate For Religious Right. On Fox News' "Your World With Neil Cavuto" (2/19, Cavuto), David Kuo, former deputy director of the Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives said Rudy Giuliani "really is a nightmare candidacy for the religious right. He is extremely popular. He is extremely well-liked. And his candidacy really does expose deep fissures within the religious conservative movement, because, on the one hand, you have a religious conservative leadership that has been around for the last 20 years or so. But, more and more, you have young evangelicals, you have people outside of the sort of religious right mainstream who are looking at his candidacy, and who are very fascinated by it. And, so, it -- you could well see a Giuliani nomination. And that could well bring in sort of a religious right war within the GOP."

Bill Clinton Seen As Potential Senate Replacement For His Wife. The Washington Examiner (2/18, Sammon) reported, "If Hillary Rodham Clinton wins the presidency, some top Democrats would like to see her husband, former President Bill Clinton, appointed to serve out Hillary's unexpired Senate term. 'As a senator, he'd be a knockout,' said Harold Ickes, who was once a top White House aide to Bill Clinton and now gives behind-the-scenes advice to Hillary. … 'President Clinton would excel in the Senate,' said Paul Begala, who helped Bill Clinton get elected and served in the White House as a top aide." The Examiner notes that "so far, speculation about potential successors has focused on New York Attorney General Andrew Cuomo and environmental lawyer Robert F. Kennedy Jr."

Bill Clinton Said To Have Little Interest In Senate. On Fox News' Hannity & Colmes" (2/19), host Sean Hannity said, "With Senator Hillary Clinton making her run for the White House, many supporters are looking at husband Bill to fill her Senate seat if she wins. First-term New York governor Eliot Spitzer, a Democrat, would be forced to appoint a replacement for Hillary. And Clinton supporters are already lobbying for the former President." Columnist Dick Morris added, "Well, I'm not sure he wants to go back to work for a living, Sean. He's having a nice time and I think he would thoroughly enjoy being first husband in the White House. And I think he would want to treat that job expansively. I think the more likely role for him would be kind of like roving ambassador. I think Hillary would use him to tour the world and develop relationships that she needs and to advise her on foreign policy." Morris added that Spitzer is "a very, very good governor with a tremendous future and I think some potential himself to be president. And I think that he's going to want to appoint a protégé."

Richardson Calls On Democratic Candidates To Avoid Intra-Party Attacks. USA Today (2/19, 4A, 2.27M) reports New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson "said he and all other Democratic presidential candidates should sign a pledge not to attack one another. Such a pact would mean 'we will go into a general election stronger,' Richardson said Sunday on CNN's Late Edition.

Parallels Between Decline In Party Fortunes Under Bush, Clinton Noted. Roll Call (2/20, Jacobson) reports that with the National Governors Association winter meeting "set to begin later this week and the 2008 presidential race continuing to simmer, it seems an appropriate time to look at how both former President Bill Clinton and President Bush presided over a significant decline in their own parties' downballot fortunes." For Clinton, "the biggest drop in gubernatorial, legislative and Congressional seats came in 1994, two years after he was elected, whereas for Bush, it came after six years in office. And generally speaking, the declines in Democratic downballot strength under Clinton were steeper than those the Republicans have suffered under Bush (though if the trends from 2006 continue, the GOP could cumulatively be looking at Clinton-scale losses two years from now)." The "larger-than-life personas of both Clinton and Bush — and their polarizing effect on the electorate — almost certainly contributed to their party's downballot decline."

Biden's Said To Have Gift For Retail Politics. The Politico (2/20, Simon) reports, "Joe Biden is in the 27th minute of his five-minute presentation, but nobody in the church basement" in Ames, Iowa, "has slipped away, nobody is nodding off, nobody is doing anything but following his every word." Biden's mouth "can get him in trouble, but when it is working right, the words drop from his lips like pearls, and nodding heads now spread through the audience like ripples on a pond." Most politicians "love to serve but hate to run, and you can hardly blame them: Running is when you get the least respect. Running is when the voters remind you that you are a job applicant and they are doing the hiring. But Biden, a senator from Delaware, seems to live for campaigning, live for the give and take, live for switching audiences from rapt attention to raucous laughter and back again." Joe Biden is "a glad-hander in the best sense of the word: He looks glad to be grasping each person's hand, looking the person in the eye, answering some question or exchanging some pleasantry." Does it "really matter? Voters appreciate this much effort even if the candidate is faking sincerity."

Anti-War Wing Of Democratic Party Pressuring '08 Candidates. In his Roll Call column (2/20), Morton Kondracke says, "As dangerous as President Bush's record on Iraq may be to Republican presidential candidates in 2008, Democrats also are risking revival of fears that their party is weak on foreign policy." If Democratic candidates "embrace the strategy of Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) to cut off funds for U.S. troops in Iraq, they deserve to be compared to the losers of the past — George McGovern, Jimmy Carter, Walter Mondale, Michael Dukakis and Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.)." Those candidates "lost presidential elections — often by landslides — mainly because voters perceived them as being unreliable in protecting the country from foreign adversaries." This year, "as in the past, the force-averse liberal base of the party is demanding ever-stronger statements and actions in opposition to the Iraq War and party leaders are obliging, with Murtha, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and presidential candidates either obliging or leading the process."

Rush To Reschedule Primaries Could Backfire. The Christian Science Monitor (2/20, Wood, 59K) reports California is "poised to play the first card in what experts say will be a national game of 'reschedule your state's primary.' The stakes: which state can gain significant influence over the presidential nominating process." California's bid "to move its 2008 primary from June to Feb. 5 – already approved by the state Senate and expected to clear the Assembly this week – is intended to force presidential candidates to stump in the Golden State, addressing issues dear to voters here before the contest is all but decided by others. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) has said he will sign the bill." But already, "nine states have tentatively scheduled primaries or caucuses for Feb. 5, and more may pile on as states jockey to meet notification deadlines: May for Democrats, September for Republicans. Among the delegate-rich states considering that date: Illinois, New Jersey, and Texas. Florida has a bill pending that would leapfrog them by moving its primary to Jan. 29." But the "probable outcome of a front-loaded primary schedule is an early winnowing of the candidate field, with Feb. 5 becoming a do-or-die date, and a clipped-back period of time in which voters can assess presidential hopefuls at town halls and in their living rooms." University of Virginia political analyst Larry Sabato said, "California and other states that are trying to play calendar games are apt to find out that their plans backfire. We are courting disaster."

Two House Democrats Refuse DCCC Aid. The Politico (2/20, Kraushaar) reports that despite Democratic "successes in last November's midterm, two rookie Democratic congresswomen already are rejecting financial assistance from their leadership, a striking move aimed at cultivating an independent image for voters back home." KS2 Rep. Nancy Boyda (D) and NH1 Rep. Carol Shea-Porter (D) "have declined to participate in the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee's 'Frontline' program, which helps vulnerable members raise money early and receive logistical support for their re-election bids." Twenty-nine members, "including 24 freshmen, qualified for the program in mid-February." Boyda "would have been a prime candidate for assistance. She represents a solidly Republican district where President Bush received 59 percent of the vote against Sen. John F. Kerry, D-Mass., in the 2004 presidential election." Shea-Porter's decision "to bypass the DCCC program is less surprising. In 2006 the committee backed her primary opponent, Jim Craig, and didn't provide any money for her upset victory over Republican Rep. Jeb Bradley."

Democrats' Opposition To Bush Tax Cuts Could Hurt Them In General Election. The Washington Times (2/19, Lambro, 88K) reports, "Virtually all the Democratic presidential contenders have denounced President Bush's tax cuts and called for raising the rates on wealthier Americans, but Republican strategists say their plan will backfire in the 2008 election. … Every Democrat seeking the presidential nomination who was in Congress at the time voted against the Bush tax cuts and has called for repealing some of the income-tax rate reductions if they are elected president. Most say their tax increases would hit only the very wealthiest Americans earning more than $200,000 a year. Republican tax-cut advocates say: 'Don't believe it.' If the Democrats campaign on raising taxes just for people at the top tax rate, 'it will backfire on them for two reasons,' said economic strategist Cesar Conda, a former chief domestic policy adviser to Vice President Dick Cheney."

The Washington Post's Sebastian Mallaby (2/19, A19) writes, "The last time a Democrat controlled the White House, he defended globalization. He understood that trade creates losers, and he sought to assist them with progressive tax and spending policies. But today's leading Democrats are flirting with the opposite approach. They are forthright in their complaints about trade. But, with the notable exception of John Edwards, they are surprisingly reluctant to propose tax hikes."

Traditional Door-To-Door Iowa Campaigns Seen As No Longer Viable. The New York Times (2/19, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports Iowa "has been celebrated for 30 years for its intimate campaigns where future presidents would perch on living room couches or sit at kitchen tables and take questions from 20 or 30 people late into the night. But it was standing room only on Sunday afternoon at the Grand River Center here, where hundreds of people showed up for a forum with John Edwards. … When Mr. Edwards asked for questions, dozens of hands shot up. Many were still up when he called an end to the meeting. Mr. Edwards's experience has been shared by most of the major candidates on recent visits to Iowa, almost a year before the caucuses. It is evidence of what appears to be the demise of the living room campaign, signaling a potentially profound change in the way presidential campaigns are conducted here, and to a lesser extent in New Hampshire."

Campaigns Establish Headquarters Outside Of Des Moines. USA Today (2/19, 3A, Keen, 2.27M) reports, "Development in downtown Des Moines is forcing some presidential campaigns to locate their offices in the suburbs, ending an era when cheap, temporary headquarters were clustered in the city center."

WSJournal Seeks Greater Oversight Of State AGs. Given recent news about California AG Bill Lockyer, the Wall Street Journal (2/20, 2.04M) says state attorneys general have followed the example of Eliot Spitzer since they "have had a field day using their power to accuse all and sundry of wrong-doing. … State attorney generals have become an unchecked source of government abuse in recent years, combining political ambition with the awesome power to prosecute. They need to be reined in, and a good place to start is by exposing their sweetheart contracts with their trial lawyer friends and campaign contributors."

NYTimes Encourages Spitzer To Reform State Legislature. The New York Times (2/19, 1.16M) editorializes, "Almost everybody who voted for Gov. Eliot Spitzer last year realized that he would not tread lightly. … Nevertheless, those lawmakers seemed stunned when Mr. Spitzer came out slugging after they exhibited some of their lesser instincts. When the governor began openly criticizing individual legislators in their home districts, the Albany crowd went into culture shock. They talked about how Mr. Spitzer was not playing by the rules. They talked about how he was upsetting the political etiquette. Joseph Bruno, the Senate leader, whined to reporters last week that the governor was a 'bully.' Maybe so. But a bully is just what New York needs right now — a governor strong, smart and articulate enough to break up the Albany cartel."

Blair Calls For Tougher UK Gun Laws. The Washington Post (2/19, A14, Jordan, 690K) reports British Prime Minister Tony Blair "announced Sunday that he wanted to lower to 17 the age at which a mandatory five-year sentence could be imposed for illegally possessing a gun. The announcement followed the shooting deaths of three teenagers." Blair said his government "is seeking to overhaul violent crime laws, including adding penalties for gang membership and measures to protect people who testify against gangs."

Cheney Reportedly Unhappy With North Korean Deal. Newsweek (2/26, Hosenball, Wolffe, 3.12M) reports, "Hard-liners already loathe the new deal in which Kim Jong Il's regime has agreed to halt activity at its main nuclear plant in return for emergency oil supplies. John Bolton, who recently departed as U.S. envoy to the United Nations, told NEWSWEEK: 'We violated the principle that we don't reward bad behavior.'." Newsweek adds, "Administration hard-liners appear to have been unable to thwart diplomacy. Former officials close to Vice President Dick Cheney, who asked not to be identified characterizing his views, suggest he does not like the deal but believes there are enough get-out clauses to ensure either that Pyongyang complies or the whole bargain collapses. Cheney had long influenced North Korea policy through powerful bureaucratic allies who battled what they viewed as State Department appeasers. But Bolton, a leading hawk on North Korea, left the administration when Congress refused to confirm him as permanent U.N. ambassador. Robert Joseph, another key hard-liner, is soon to leave his job as State Department under secretary for arms control. Cheney himself may be the last hard-liner. But White House aides, along with the veep's allies (anonymous when discussing the men's relationship), acknowledge that Bush relies far less on Cheney's judgment now than he did earlier in his presidency."

U.S. News and World Report (2/26, Omestead, 2.03M) reports, "Administration officials have insisted they would not reward the North's nuclear 'bad behavior.' But that, hard-line critics complain, is just what the deal does. Paradoxically, their assertion that North Korea had bested the United States is shared by some deal backers. Their complaint: The years of delay allowed Pyongyang to multiply its plutonium stockpile since the crisis erupted in October 2002. Says a former U.S. official, 'We could have done this four years ago and gotten a better deal.'"

Bush, Howard Discuss North Korea, War On Terror. AFP (2/20) reports, "US President George W. Bush spoke with Australian Prime Minister John Howard about the North Korea nuclear deal and the military campaigns in Iraq and Afghanistan, the White House said." Bush "spoke to Howard by telephone as US Vice President Dick Cheney headed to Japan and Australia to discuss their roles in Iraq and Afghanistan and common challenges like China's rise and North Korea's nuclear program." The two "spoke a week after a breakthrough nuclear deal was reached at talks in Beijing between the United States, the two Koreas, China, Japan and Russia." White House National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe said in a statement that Bush and Howard "discussed the recent agreement at the Six Party talks."

North Korean Deal Said To Highlight Cheney's Declining Influence. The Washington Post (2/20, A5, Abramowitz, 690K) reports, "Mistrustful of North Korea and its willingness to keep promises, Vice President Cheney worked hard in President Bush's first term to prevent talks aimed at halting that country's push to develop a nuclear bomb." However, the State Department reached a nuclear agreement with North Korea earlier this month, "a deal that many of the vice president's conservative allies consider foolhardy and that some of his own staff are said to find hard to swallow." But the "contrast underscores the vice president's shifting status in Washington." While "there is no evidence that Cheney's close relationship with Bush has been lessened," there is "also little doubt that the causes he has championed…are being rethought within the Bush administration, according to officials inside the government and experts outside it." The North Korea deal is "only the latest example of a new pragmatism forced on the administration by a series of court decisions, the deteriorating situation in Iraq and -- perhaps most of all -- the Democratic takeover of Congress." Some conservatives see I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's resignation after his indictment in late 2005 "as part of the unraveling of a Cheney network, leaving a void that" Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, "the engineer of the North Korea deal, has exploited."

Cheney To Reassure Japan On Korea Accord. AFP (2/20) reports Vice President Dick Cheney "has headed to Asia with his first scheduled stop in Japan, a key US ally which has voiced increasing concern about the White House's approach on North Korea and Iraq." Cheney will also travel to Australia and Guam. In Tokyo, Cheney will "aim to dispel any worries about the North Korean deal, emphasizing that it is only a good 'first step' towards stripping the regime of its nuclear weapons programs." Japan has "refused to fund the deal…due to an emotionally charged row over Pyongyang's past abductions of Japanese citizens."

Professor Accuses Cheney Of "Snubbing" Japanese Defense Secretary. Philip J. Cunningham, professor at Doshisha University in Kyoto, writes in a Los Angeles Times (2/20, 850K) op-ed that during his upcoming visit to Japan, Vice President Cheney "will snub the defense chief, the very person he would be expected to talk to in a visit focusing on defense and security issues. The message seems to be: Friends don't criticize friends." Cunningham notes that "there was no rational reason for Japan to get entangled in Iraq, and there's even less reason to become involved in Iran. However, Cheney appears bent on whipping up support for a reluctant Japan to continue to follow the Bush administration's lead in the war-torn Mideast. In refusing to meet with the defense minister, Cheney seems to be saying, in effect, that a silent nod to the wise is sufficient."

Burns To Meet With South Korean Official On Accord. AFP (2/20) reports South Korea's deputy foreign minister is traveling to Washington "for talks with US officials on ways to follow up on last week's deal on scrapping North Korea's nuclear program," his ministry said. Shim Yoon-Joe was will hold talks with Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns, Assistant Secretary of State John C. Rood, and deputy NSA Jack D. Crouch.

Zelikow Welcomes Deal As "Successful Test Of Diplomacy." Philip Zelikow, former advisor to Secretary Rice, writes in the Washington Post (2/20, A13, 690K) that the agreement with Pyongyang represents "a successful test of diplomacy." Last week's deal, "skillfully negotiated by Rice and [Assistant Secretary of State Christopher] Hill with their counterparts, delivers a plan for the 'early harvest.' A 'good, initial step' was Rice's careful phrase." But Zelikow warned that "the next two months will show whether the design remains valid. Rice has agreed to a six-party meeting of foreign ministers, including the North Koreans. We will see whether the Bush administration and its counterparts can launch the second stage, when the desired outcomes to be produced from this diplomacy may finally come into view."

ElBaradei Says Nuclear Accord With Iran Unlikely In Short Term. The Financial Times (2/20, A1, Dombey) reports IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei "has not given up hope that the US and Iran will one day sit down and negotiate their differences away, but in the much shorter term his prognosis is bleak." On Tuesday, ElBaradei is "due to certify that Iran has failed to comply with UN demands to halt sensitive parts of its nuclear program," but in an interview with the Times, he said he "will continue to make a last-ditch effort to try to convince them that it is in their interest to find a way to go into negotiations." If that doesn't happen, he warned, "I don't see that it is going to happen overnight, I will have to report negatively."

US Taking Twofold Approach To Tehran. The Wall Street Journal (2/20, A6, Solomon, Dreazen, 2.04M) reports, "As Iran's power in the Middle East grows, the Bush administration is pursuing a two-pronged strategy of directly challenging Tehran in places such as Iraq and Lebanon, while seeking to exploit fissures believed to be emerging in Iran's social and political systems." The strategy includes "military movements to underscore American resolve, as well as financial pressure to drive a wedge between Iran's leaders and the country's merchants." US officials say the strategy "isn't designed to court a war. Still, it is fraught with risks." For example, Iran "could misread or overreact to some American moves." At the same time, "Many Middle East analysts are skeptical about the Bush administration's ability to induce political change in Iran."

Iran Launches Large-Scale War Games. The AP (2/20, Dareini) reports Iran Monday launched "its largest war games in almost a year," two days ahead of a U.N. Security Council deadline for Iran to halt uranium enrichment or face further economic sanctions. State television said the three-day exercise is "the biggest since last March and is taking place in 16 of Iran's 30 provinces," with an estimated 60,000 troops participating in the maneuvers.

Iranian Ships Enter Iraqi Waters. CNN's Situation Room (2/19, 7:26PM) reported, "US military officials are trying to figure out Iran's intentions. CNN has learned that Iranian boats crossed into Iraqi waters at the northern end of the Persian Gulf in the past ten days. The boats sailed near Iraq's off shore oil terminals to gauge the military response. Officials say it was not seen as an aggressive act."

Russia To Slow Work On Iranian Nuclear Plant. The New York Times (2/20, A8, Kramer, 1.16M) reports Russia said Monday "it would slow work on Iran's nearly completed Bushehr nuclear power plant." The move follows a disclosure from Russia that Iran "had not made the last two $25 million monthly payments, in a dispute about whether it could pay in euros instead of dollars," and "added a new twist to the deeply contentious project." The dispute will also "delay, perhaps by a year, any delivery of nuclear fuel to Iran," Russian officials said. The Washington Times/AP (2/20, Isachenkov) runs a similar report.

Increased Demand, Sanctions May Force Iran To Limit Energy Use. The Wall Street Journal (2/20, A1, Spindle, 2.04M) reports Iran "sits on one-tenth of the world's known oil supplies but is using so much energy these days it may start rationing gasoline as soon as next month." The Journal notes that "as the country has grown wealthier selling oil and gas, Iranians have themselves become large consumers of energy. Government subsidies, which make energy nearly free to consumers and businesses, stoke the demand further. At the same time, a combination of Western sanctions and Iranian policies has discouraged foreign investment in oil fields, causing production to stagnate. The result: Iran's oil exports could dry up in as little as a decade, according to some who have studied the situation."

WSJournal Says EU Subsidizing Business Investment In Iran. The Wall Street Journal (2/20, A16, 2.04M) editorializes, "On the record, Europe claims to be as concerned as America about a nuclear-armed Iran. The record also shows, however, that Europe's biggest countries do a booming business with the Islamic Republic. And so far for the Continentals, manna trumps security." The Journal adds, "In the absence of an official embargo against Tehran, private EU companies have sought commercial opportunities in Iran. But the real story here is that these businesses are subsidized by European taxpayers. Government-backed export guarantees have fueled the expansion in trade. That, in turn, has boosted Iran's economy and -- indirectly by filling government coffers with revenues -- its nuclear program. The German record stands out. In its 2004 annual report on export guarantees, Berlin's Economics Ministry dedicated a special section to Iran that captures its giddy excitement about business with Tehran."

Mideast Summit Ends With Little Result. The New York Times (2/20, A8, Cooper, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports a summit sponsored by Secretary Rice between Israeli and Palestinian leaders "meant to start a new peace initiative" ended Monday "with little more concrete than a promise to meet again." Rice and her aides "made it clear that her efforts had been complicated" by the recent decision by Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas to form a unity government with Hamas. She "suggested that if this meeting had not been scheduled beforehand," Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "might not have agreed to meet with Mr. Abbas, whom she praised nevertheless for supporting international and Israeli demands that the Palestinians recognize Israel's right to exist, forswear violence and accept previously negotiated agreements with the Israelis." Although Hamas has not agreed to those requirements, Rice "said she doubted that such a government would come close enough to satisfy the Americans and the Israelis." Following Monday's meeting, Rice read a joint statement, but "neither Mr. Olmert nor Mr. Abbas appeared by Ms. Rice's side as she read the statement, reflecting the tenuous nature of the talks, which appear to be so fragile that no side has even been willing to label them negotiations." However, the commitment from Olmert to meet again with Abbas "is a minor victory" for Abbas, "because it signals that Israel will continue to deal with him despite his unity government plans."

Under the headline "Rice's Mideast Talks Yield Little Except A Promise To Meet Again," the Washington Post (2/20, A10, Kessler, 690K) says the summit "appeared to yield little but a pledge to meet again." Rice's participation in the talks "was intended to signal her deepening commitment to helping resolve the conflict, but the talks demonstrated the difficulties ahead."

The Los Angeles Times (2/20, Ellingwood, 850K) reports in Monday's meeting, the leaders "did not appear to have broached the issues likely to be the most difficult to resolve in reaching a final peace accord, such as borders, the status of Jerusalem and the fate of Palestinian refugees."

The Washington Times (2/20, Mitnick, 88K) says the meeting "produced no immediate breakthroughs but will allow Washington to show its Arab allies it is working to resolve one of the region's toughest problems."

Similarly, the Financial Times (2/20, Morris) says the meeting's outcome "matched its low expectations" as participants "agreed on little more substantial than a willingness to meet again."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/20, Mitnick, 59K) says the "vague language of the summit communiqué reflected the awkward effort to restart negotiations."

The AP (2/20, Gearan) adds, "The prospect of any immediate success here essentially was hijacked by Abbas' surprise announcement last week that he will govern hand-in-hand with the militant group Hamas."

AFP (2/20, Millikin) reports that after the talks, Olmert "insisted Israel would not cooperate with any government that did not meet international demands for peace, while Hamas lashed out at what it labeled US isolationism and 'blackmail.'"

Terrorists Strike At Train In India. ABC World News (2/19, story 3, :35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There was terror in India. The target a symbol of that country's peace process with neighboring Pakistan. Two bombs ignited a fire on a train called the Peace Express, which runs between the two countries. India and Pakistan are rival nuclear powers. Today, leaders in both countries denounced the attack, which killed 66 Indians and Pakistanis. The death toll could have been much higher – the entire train had been booby trapped. But the bombs went off in only two of the cars."

The CBS Evening News (2/19, story 3, :20, Mitchell, 7.66M) noted "leaders of both countries called" the attack "terrorism, but no one has claimed responsibility." Likewise, NBC Nightly News (2/19, story 8, :25, Williams, 9.87M) reported there's "no indication yet of who carried out the attack." The New York Times (2/20, Sengupta, 1.16M), among other major newspapers, also reports the story.

Moscow Warns Warsaw, Prague Over US Missile Shield. The Financial Times (2/20, Buckley, Cienski, Williamson) reports the commander of Russia's strategic missile forces, General Nikolai Solovtsov, Monday warned Poland and the Czech Republic they "could be targeted by Russian missiles if they host elements of the planned US missile defense system." The warning came "as both Warsaw and Prague signaled they were likely to respond positively" to US requests for them to host anti-missile defense bases. Also Monday, Germany "expressed concern about the stand-off over the missile defense project," with Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier "criticizing the US and NATO for not addressing Russia's worries over the system earlier." The Washington Times/AP (2/20, Isachenkov) also reports the story.

US Officials Urged To Avoid "Professions Of Eternal Friendship" Toward Russian Leaders. Anne Applebaum writes in the Washington Post (2/20, A13, 690K) that "Russian politicians still seem to make American politicians grow starry-eyed and lose their bearings. Perhaps it's a secret longing for the glamour of those Cold War summits, for the days when it seemed as if the personal relations between superpower statesmen could ward off the destruction of the entire planet. Or perhaps they put something in the vodka -- sorry, mineral water -- at those elegant Kremlin lunches. Either way, it's time to kick the habit. True, it is perfectly possible that whoever leads Russia after Putin steps down (if Putin steps down) will be a nicer, friendlier person. It is perfectly possible that we will find areas of cooperation with him, just as we sometimes do with Putin. But however friendly and cooperative, however much a 'democrat' he appears to be, I hope we'll avoid the instant professions of eternal friendship."

US, EU Closer To Deal On Transatlantic Trading Zone. The Financial Times (2/20, Bounds) reports, "The US and European Union could set a date for the creation of a transatlantic trading zone at a summit in April, diplomats say. The idea of harmonising rules and regulations between the world's biggest economies to boost growth has gathered momentum since Angela Merkel, German chancellor, embraced it in January." Both sides "have taken up the so-called Merkel initiative as a way of re-invigorating the partnership after tension over Iraq and the Doha trade round." Boyden Gray, US ambassador to the EU, said, "The political commitment is there from the president and members of his cabinet. It is a great opportunity." Gray "said it was likely the objective would be set at the summit but stressed that more work was needed on how it would be achieved."

Natsios Draws Criticism For Remarks On Sudan. In its "Embassy Row" column, the Washington Times (2/20, Morrison, 88K) reports US special envoy to Sudan, Andrew Natsios, "angered the Africa Action network by dismissing the term 'genocide' in connection with the humanitarian crisis in the Darfur region of the African nation." In an address earlier this month at Georgetown University, Natsios said, "The term 'genocide' is counter to the facts of what is really occurring in Darfur." Nii Akuetteh, executive director the Washington-based advocacy group, said Natsios' characterization "denies the reality on the ground and conflicts with numerous statements from the White House and State Department over the past two years."

Kristof Urges Bush To Join Carter's "War On Diseases" That Afflict World's Poor. Nicholas Kristof writes in the New York Times (2/20, 1.16M), "Ethiopia has the largest proportion of blind people in the world, 1.2 percent, because of the combined effects of river blindness and trachoma. As in many African countries, the wrenching emblem of poverty is a tiny child leading a blind beggar by a stick." In "remote places like this, former President Carter, at 82, is leading a private war on disease that should inspire and shame President Bush and other world leaders into joining. It's not just that Mr. Carter's wars have been more successful than Mr. Bush's; Mr. Carter is also rehabilitating the image of the US abroad and transforming the lives of the world's most wretched peoples. … So, President Bush, how about if we as a nation join Mr. Carter's war on diseases that afflict the world's poorest peoples -- and are one reason they are so poor. That's a war that would unite Americans, not divide them. Come on, Mr. Bush, sound the trumpets!"

WSJournal Suggests Argentina Is "Economic Banana Republic." The Wall Street Journal (2/20, 2.04M) editorializes, "Just when you think world economic policy might be moving in a more sensible direction, along comes Latin America. This month's lesson in how not to create prosperity comes from Argentina, which has decided that the way to whip inflation is to throw out inconvenient statistics. Recently the Peronist government of President Nestór Kirchner sacked an official at its National Statistics and Census Institute for refusing to agree to alter the 'methodology' used to calculate inflation in January." As his government "heads into the season of negotiating labor contracts, Mr. Kirchner has an incentive to underestimate inflation. And sure enough, five days after this dismissal, the government released its January inflation number of 1.1%, well below the 1.5% to 2% expected by non-government economists. … Mark it down as one more reason Argentina can't shake its reputation as an economic banana republic."

TERRORISM NEWS:

NY Man Accused Of Wanting To Fund Terror (MH)

The Miami Herald, February 17, 2007

NEW YORK - A businessman was charged Friday with secretly trying to pass along thousands of dollars to buy night vision goggles and other equipment for a terrorist training camp in Afghanistan.

Abdul Tawala Ibn Ali Alishtari, 53, of Ardsley, was accused in Manhattan federal court of financing terrorism and material support of terrorism.

The indictment said he accepted an unspecified amount of money between June and December to transfer $152,000 that he believed was being sent to Pakistan and Afghanistan to support an Afghanistan terrorist training camp.

The indictment also charged him with scheming to defraud investors by obtaining millions of dollars for a "Flat Eletronic Data Interchange" and promising high guaranteed rates of return.

Alishtari, also known as Michael Mixon, was scheduled to make an initial court appearance Friday afternoon. It was not immediately clear who would represent Alishtari in court, where he was born, or whether any money actually reached terrorists.

'TERROR' $$ MAN CHARGED (NYPOST)

The New York Post, February 17, 2007

A Westchester businessman and purported peace activist was nabbed by the feds for allegedly plotting to funnel more than $150,000 to terrorists at training camps in Afghanistan and Pakistan.

DOJ_NMG_0134027

Abdul Tawala Ibn Ali Alishtari, an American-born Moroccan from Ardsley, was ordered held without bail yesterday for agreeing to send $152,000 overseas to pay for night-vision goggles and other equipment for terrorists during an FBI sting operation.

The accused terror buyer was nabbed by the FBI Thursday and charged with providing material support to terrorists, as well as money-laundering and wire-fraud charges, which carry a maximum of 95 years in prison.

Prior to his arrest, Alishtari, 53, also known as Michael Dixon, had agreed to cooperate with law enforcement. But the deal fell through before he provided substantial assistance, according to a source close to the case.

Alishtari also is accused of swindling millions of dollars in a bogus Bronx-based loan program.

Defense lawyer David Greenfield entered a not guilty plea on behalf of Alishtari and declined further comment.

Alishtari drew media attention in 2003 for launching an annual movie project in Florida called Global Peace Film Festival.

The self-described activist has also posted poetry on numerous Web sites advocating peace and radical Muslim ideology, as well as personal pledges to dedicate his time and money to stopping child slavery, fraud and violence.

Ardsley Businessman Accused Of Aiding Terrorists (WPJN)

By TIMOTHY O'CONNOR, THE JOURNAL NEWS

White Plains Journal News, February 17, 2007

NEW YORK - An Ardsley businessman was accused yesterday of trying to funnel $152,000 to terrorists for night vision goggles at a training camp in Afghanistan.

Abdul Tawala Ibn Ali Alishtari, 53, of 472 Ashford Ave. was arrested in New York City by agents with the Joint Terrorism Task Force of the FBI and New York City Police Department. An indictment was unsealed yesterday in U.S. District Court in New York charging Alishtari, who claims to be a banker, with financing terrorism, material support of terrorism, money laundering, wire fraud and conspiracy.

Federal prosecutors accuse Alishtari of accepting a payment to transfer $152,000 for an unidentified party with the understanding that the money was going to be used to fund terrorist training in Pakistan and Afghanistan. Alishtari also is accused of scamming millions of dollars from investors through a phony loan investment program called "Flat Electronic Data Interchange."

A woman who answered the phone at Alishtari's home yesterday and identified herself as his wife cried when informed of the charges against her husband. She said she last saw him Thursday when he left in a cab for a business meeting. FBI agents later raided the family's home, she said, without telling her why they were there.

"My husband is innocent," she said and declined further comment.

On his blog and on an MSN group titled "atalishtarispeeches," Alishtari calls himself a "conservative Republican" and a "Reagan Republican" devoted to peace, dedicated to halting child slavery as well as "Internet fraud, violence and online scams hurting innocent children, women, and families so help me God."

He blames past problems with Flat Electronic Data Interchange, which has an office in the Bronx, on an unnamed convicted financial fraud artist. Alishtari says he now heads a company called IDPixie LLC that purports to offer identity theft protection solutions. He also claims to be a two-time recipient of the National Republican Congressional Committee's New York state Businessman of the Year award. He says he founded the Global Peace Film Festival. Efforts to reach Nina Streich, the festival's director, were unsuccessful.

Federal authorities released few details about how the case against Alishtari started. The indictment makes no mention of an undercover operative or a cooperating witness. It is unclear whether the case was based on a sting operation.

The indictment charges that Alishtari arranged for the transfer of $152,000 in funds that "he believed were being sent to Pakistan and Afghanistan to be used to support a terrorist training camp in Afghanistan." He is accused of transferring $25,000 from a bank account in New York to one in Montreal as part of the scheme.

Alishtari was arraigned before a federal magistrate in Manhattan and ordered held without bail. He faces up to 95 years in prison if convicted. His lawyer, David Greenfield, did not return calls seeking comment.

Feds Say He Helped Fund Terror Camps (NYDN)

New York Daily News, February 17, 2007

A Westchester County peace advocate has been charged with sending $152,000 to overseas terror camps to pay for night-vision goggles, Manhattan federal prosecutors said yesterday.

Abdul Tawala Ibn Ali Alishtari, 53, of Ardsley, was accused of providing material support for terrorists in a five-count indictment handed up yesterday.

Late last year, Alishtari agreed to transfer $152,000 that he knew would be used to fund terror camps in Afghanistan and Pakistan, prosecutors said. And from 1998 to 2004, he allegedly scammed millions from investors by guaranteeing high returns - returns that didn't materialize.

Alishtari, who posts free-form peace poetry on the Internet, is also accused of money laundering for allegedly transferring $25,000 from a New York bank to one in Montreal, knowing that the money was going to terrorists, prosecutors said.

MAN FACES TERROR SUPPORT CHARGES. A Westchester County man was arrested Friday on charges he attempted to send more than $150,000 to a terrorism training camp in Asia so that night vision equipment could be purchased, officials said. Abdul Tawala Ibn Ali Alishtari, 53, was charged in a six count indictment unsealed Friday in Manhattan federal court with attempted material support of terrorism and other charges. He was ordered held without bail. The indictment accused Alishtari, whose country of origin and citizenship weren't disclosed, with attempting last year to transfer $152,000 that he believed was being sent to Pakistan and Afghanistan to support a terrorism training center. The indictment said that the money was to be used to purchase equipment such as night vision goggles. Alishtari, who officials said lives in Ardsley, also was charged in the indictment with trying to launder $25,000 in cash by sending it to Canada to help terrorism. The indictment also accused Alishtari, known also as "Michael Mixon," with running a massive investment fraud from 1998 to 2004 that caused millions of dollars in losses. - ANTHONY M. DESTEFANO

PINK HOUSE GANG LEADER CONVICTED. The leader of Brooklyn's Pink Houses gang faces life in prison after being convicted Friday on conspiracy and extortion charges. Larone Graham, 37, was convicted on eight of 12 counts in federal court in Central Islip. The jury deliberated for more than a week and also acquitted him of a robbery charge and three counts of firearms possession. In addition to conspiracy and extortion, Graham was convicted of a weapons charge and one count of using explosives during the commission of a felony. U.S. District Judge Joanna Seybert will sentence Graham on May 11. Graham was accused of running a crew of thieves who robbed jewelry stores, a Manhattan clothing store, a Brooklyn cigarette wholesaler and a drug dealer. The robberies, which began in December 2003 and continued until January 2005, often involved pistol-whipping employees whose hands were bound with plastic ties, prosecutors said. Two robberies occurred on Long Island and others took place in every New York City borough except Staten Island. In one incident, Graham ordered the abduction of a rival, Jamel Thompson, who was suspected of taking more than his fair share of the $2.5 million stolen by the gang. Prosecutors said Thompson was taken to Rockaway Beach, where a Pink Houses member used a pistol to fire point-blank shots at him. Thompson survived and testified against Graham. Defense attorney Bruce Barket of Garden City said he was "saddened but not surprised" by the verdict, adding he was pleased that Graham was acquitted on four counts. Barket said he plans to appeal. - CARL MACGOWAN

B'KLYN JURY INDICTS COP'S HUSBAND. The husband of a cop was indicted Friday by a Brooklyn grand jury in the attempted murder of city police Officer Andrew Suarez in Park Slope, officials said. Jose Rivera, 31, was charged with attempted murder in the first and second degree and attempted assault in the incident last Saturday, according to Brooklyn District Attorney Charles Hynes. Suarez was shot while in an unmarked police car on Sixth Avenue and Prospect Place. He was wounded in the attack but has been released from the hospital. According to Hynes, after Rivera pulled up next to a Suarez's car the officer pulled out his badge and asked Rivera if he was lost. It was then that Rivera pulled out a gun and fired, hitting Suarez, Hynes said in a prepared statement. Officials said that the other cops in the car with Suarez returned fire and struck Rivera's car several times as it drove away. Rivera's wife, Officer Jacqueline Melendez-Rivera, is suspected of trying to hide her husband's bullet-riddled car. She was charged with obstructing governmental administration, hindering prosecution and tampering with physical evidence. Melendez-Rivera, 37, was not indicted Friday and is free on bail. Her husband is being held without bail, said a spokesman for Hynes. If convicted of the most serious charge of attempted murder, Rivera faces a maximum 25 years to life in prison. - ANTHONY M. TWO PEDESTRIANS STRUCK BY CITY BUS. Two women were struck by a city bus in midtown Friday, but did not suffer life-threatening injuries, police said. The 10 a.m. accident occurred when the bus was trying to make a left turn onto First Avenue, from East 40th Street. The bus driver hit the brakes when he saw a pedestrian motioning toward him, police said, but by then two women, ages 25 and 27, already had been struck. One suffered a fractured leg, while the other was less seriously hurt. They were in stable condition at Bellevue Hospital Center. Police said both the driver and the pedestrians had the green light and that the driver did not see the women. No charges were filed or summonses issued. - ROCCO PARASCANDOLA

Family Says Inmate's Hunger Strike Not Near End (AP)

By Estes Thompson

AP, February 17, 2007

Raleigh | A former Florida university professor who has stopped eating in prison to protest his treatment sounds fine and doesn't intend to give up his nearly monthlong hunger strike, his wife said Friday.

Sami al-Arian, 49, pleaded guilty last year to conspiring to help a Palestinian terror group by making and receiving contributions.

Al-Arian stopped eating Jan. 22 after federal officials told him he had to testify before a grand jury about Muslim charities in northern Virginia that had helped finance his think tank in Tampa, Fla. He had been held in contempt before for not appearing before a grand jury in Alexandria, Va.

During his strike, Al-Arian is drinking just four glasses of water a day. His daughter Laila said earlier in the week he had lost 30 pounds since he stopped eating and that he hit his head after fainting Tuesday.

Al-Arian was moved this week from a jail in Warsaw, Va., to the Federal Medical Facility at Butner, about 22 miles north of Raleigh.

A former University of South Florida computer engineering professor, al-Arian wants to be released so he can leave the United States, his wife said in a telephone interview Friday.

"We worry about Sami, but at the same time we try to do our best to get him out of this whole situation," Nahla al-Arian said during an interview.

Nahla al-Arian traveled with supporters from Florida this week to Washington to see Florida representatives and plead al-Arian's case.

One supporter, Lois Price, who said she met the al-Arians through a United Church of Christ in Tampa, said al-Arian "believes in the American system and justice for all people."

Al-Arian contends his guilty plea relieves him of any obligation to cooperate with the government. Two federal judges have ruled he must testify.

Prosecutors have accused al-Arian of being an active member of the terrorist group Palestinian Islamic Jihad, which has carried out suicide bombings against Israel. He was acquitted of some charges and the jury was hung on others following a six-month trial in 2005. Al-Arian entered his guilty plea in April.

This is at least the second hunger strike for Al-Arian. He started one shortly after he was arrested in February 2003 and continued for 140 days, his supporters say.

Milan Court Indicts 26 Americans In Abduction (WP)

CIA Operatives May Be Tried in Absentia

ROME, Feb. 16 -- An Italian judge gave approval Friday for what will be the first overseas criminal trial of CIA officers involved in a covert counterterrorism operation, as a court in Milan indicted more than two dozen Americans on charges of kidnapping a radical Muslim cleric four years ago.

After a judicial hearing that lasted two months, the court handed down indictments against 25 CIA operatives, a U.S. Air Force lieutenant colonel and five Italian spies who are accused of grabbing an imam, Osama Mustafa Hassan Nasr, off the street and stuffing him into a white van as he walked to noonday prayers Feb. 17, 2003. Nasr was taken from Milan to his native Egypt, where he claims he was tortured in prison for more than three years.

The trial is scheduled to open June 8 and will challenge the legality of a long-standing CIA practice known as "extraordinary rendition," in which terrorism suspects are secretly abducted and taken to other countries for interrogation. None of the American defendants is in custody, nor are they expected to appear in court. Prosecutors said they will be tried in absentia.

Arrest warrants against the CIA operatives were obtained in 2005. A judge approved the indictments Friday after the judicial hearing and a lengthy criminal investigation that retraced in minute detail how the CIA put together the kidnapping plot.

The CIA and the State Department declined to comment on the indictments. "This is an issue that is before the judiciary in Italy," State Department spokesman Tom Casey said.

It is the second case in which criminal charges have been filed against CIA officers for illegally abducting a terrorism suspect. German prosecutors in Munich issued arrest warrants last month for 13 CIA operatives suspected of kidnapping a Lebanese German man, Khaled el-Masri, in the Balkans in December 2003 and taking him to Afghanistan. He was released five months later after the CIA realized they had grabbed the wrong man.

In addition, the Swiss government announced this week that it had approved a criminal investigation into the use of Switzerland's airspace to fly Nasr from Italy to a U.S. military base in Germany after his abduction.

He was put on another CIA-chartered plane to Cairo soon afterward.

The Milan prosecution team, headed by investigating magistrate Armando Spataro, has asked the Italian government to file a request with the U.S. Justice Department for extradition of the 26 American defendants. The request has already been refused once, by Roberto Castelli, then Italy's justice minister. But it is being reconsidered by a new Italian government that came to power last year.

The indictment publishes the names of the 25 CIA operatives, including the CIA's former Rome station chief Jeffrey Castelli and former Milan substation chief Robert Seldon Lady, who are accused of conspiring with the Italian military intelligence agency, known as Sismi.

Most of the CIA operatives named in the indictments had been using undercover aliases; prosecutors said they do not know the operatives' true identities and acknowledged that it is unlikely they will be found or brought to Italy to stand trial.

A former Sismi director, Gen. Nicolo Pollari, has also been charged.

Arianna Barbazza, a Milan lawyer who has been appointed to represent several of the U.S. defendants, said she and other defense attorneys in the case had been unable to contact their clients. She said it was highly unlikely that the United States would respond to an extradition request, even if the Italian government decided to make one.

Barbazza said the trial will probably reveal more about the Italian spies and their agency, "because it will attempt to verify whether Sismi was aware beforehand of the kidnapping."

Matilde Sansalone, who represents the CIA's former Rome station chief and two other Americans, said the apparent decision by the CIA operatives not to hire their own lawyers "demonstrates a specific choice to not participate in the proceedings."

Sansalone said she and other defense lawyers would not contest Nasr's abduction but would argue that there is insufficient evidence to find individual defendants guilty.

Nasr was released this week by an Egyptian court after spending nearly four years in prison. He is staying with his family in Alexandria, Egypt, and is considering filing a civil lawsuit against the Italian and U.S. governments, according to a Cairo lawyer, Montasser al-Zayat, who has worked on his behalf.

DOJ_NMG_0134031

Attorneys involved in the case said it was unlikely Nasr would return to Milan to testify in the trial; he faces arrest in Italy on terrorism-related charges that were filed after his abduction. Sansalone said the outcome of the trial could change if Nasr does testify, however.

This week the Italian government also asked the country's constitutional court to determine whether investigators overstepped their legal authority by ordering wiretaps of the Italian spies' telephone calls. A ruling in the government's favor could be a setback to the prosecutor's case.

Americans To Stand Trial In Rendition Case (FT)

By Tony Barber

Financial Times, February 17, 2007

An Italian judge on Friday ordered 25 alleged CIA agents and the former head of Italy's military intelligence service to be put on trial on charges of kidnapping an Egyptian imam in Milan and spiriting him abroad in February 2003.

The trial will be the first criminal prosecution of people alleged to have been involved in the US Central Intelligence Agency's controversial abductions of terrorist suspects after the attacks on the US of September 11 2001.

It also presents a fresh problem for US-Italian relations, already dogged by disputes over the planned expansion of a US military base in north-eastern Italy and the ability of Italy's centre-left government to keep Italian forces fighting under Nato auspices in Afghanistan.

Caterina Interlandi, the Milan judge who ordered the trial, set June 8 as the date for the start of the proceedings.

The case concerns Osama Mustafa Hassan Nasr, also known as Abu Omar, who prosecutors say was kidnapped on a Milan street, bundled into a van, driven to a US airbase at Aviano, flown to another US base in Germany and then taken to Egypt for interrogation.

Among those accused are 26 Americans, all but one alleged to be CIA agents, and Nicolò Pollari, the former head of Italy's military intelligence service, whom the government removed from his post last November.

None of the Americans is believed to be in Italy at present, and it appears improbable that any will show up voluntarily for the trial. Their court-appointed lawyers say they are not even in contact with their clients.

From the point of view of the US and Italian governments, however, the case has the potential to throw an unwelcome light on the degree to which Italy co-operated with the CIA kidnapping policy, known as the "rendition programme".

The centre-left government of Romano Prodi, prime minister, is unwilling to meet prosecutors' demands to seek the extradition of the Americans so that they appear in court in Milan.

The kidnapping of Mr Nasr occurred one month before the US-led invasion of Iraq, when Silvio Berlusconi, the centre-right opposition leader, was prime minister. He prided himself on being a devoted ally of the US but says his government was not involved in the abduction.

Mr Pollari has likewise denied responsibility for the kidnapping and told the court in a pre-trial hearing last month that he had "opposed any illegal actions" that may have taken place in connection with Mr Nasr.

Americans Indicted In Cleric's Abduction (WT/AP)

By Colleen Barry, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 17, 2007

MILAN, Italy -- An Italian judge indicted 25 suspected CIA agents and a U.S. Air Force lieutenant colonel yesterday in the purported kidnapping and torture of an Egyptian cleric who had been under investigation for recruiting Islamist fighters.

The indictment paves the way for Italy to try the Americans, along with five Italians, in June in the first criminal trial over the CIA's extraordinary rendition program.

But prosecutors think that many of the American names in the indictment are aliases, and even if Italy requests the Americans' extradition -- a move that would strain U.S.-Italian relations -- it is unlikely that the agents, who have all left Italy, would be turned over for prosecution.

All the U.S. agents have court-appointed attorneys, who say they have had no contact with their clients. In Italy, defendants can be tried in absentia.

DOJ_NMG_0134032

The CIA did not comment yesterday on the case, which has put an uncomfortable spotlight on intelligence operations and increased U.S.-European disagreement over combating terrorism.

Prosecutors say five Italian intelligence officials worked with the Americans to abduct Osama Moustafa Hassan Nasr from a Milan street on Feb. 17, 2003.

Mr. Nasr was purportedly taken to the Aviano Air Base near Venice and then flown to the Ramstein Air Base in southern Germany and onward to Egypt, where he was held for four years and, his attorney said, tortured. He was freed earlier this week by an Egyptian court that ruled his detention was "unfounded."

The Swiss government this week approved prosecutors' plans to investigate the flight that purportedly took Mr. Nasr over Swiss airspace from Italy to Germany. And a German prosecutor recently issued arrest warrants for 13 persons in connection with the purported CIA-orchestrated kidnapping of a German citizen.

Italian prosecutors say the operation was a breach of their country's sovereignty that compromised Italy's own anti-terrorism efforts.

Mr. Nasr, who had the status of political refugee in Italy, was under investigation for terrorism-related activities at the time of his abduction, and Milan prosecutors issued a warrant for his arrest more than two years after he disappeared from Milan, while he was in Egyptian custody.

All but one of the Americans have been identified as CIA agents, including the former Milan station chief Robert Seldon Lady and former Rome station chief Jeffrey Castelli. The other is Air Force Lt. Col. Joseph L. Romano III, who was stationed at the time at Aviano.

Among the Italians indicted by Judge Caterina Interlandi was the former chief of military intelligence, Nicolo Pollari, and his former deputy, Marco Mancini. Mr. Pollari has denied any involvement by Italian intelligence.

Italy Indicts 26, Many From C.I.A., In '03 Abduction (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

ROME, Feb. 16 —An Italian judge indicted 26 Americans on Friday, most of them C.I.A. officers, in what will become the first trial of the American program of secretly whisking away terror suspects. Italy's former top spy was also indicted.

Despite the indictment, issued by a judge in Milan, it is unlikely that any of the Americans, one of whom is an Air Force colonel, will ever face trial here. The trial is expected to take place in June.

The indictments came in connection with the case of a radical Egyptian cleric, Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr. The cleric, known as Abu Omar, disappeared near his mosque in Milan on Feb. 17, 2003, and said he was kidnapped.

He was freed this week from jail in Egypt, where he says he was taken and tortured.

The indictment marked a turning point in Europe, where anger is high at the American program of "extraordinary renditions," an aggressive policy of seizing suspected terrorists on foreign soil and interrogating them at secret locations in a third country.

Though the Italian indictment is the first in which such a case was ordered to trial, this week the Swiss government approved an investigation into the flight that was said to have carried Mr. Nasr from Italy to Germany, through Swiss airspace. The flight reportedly then went from an American air base in Germany to Egypt.

Late last month, a German court issued an arrest warrant for 13 people suspected of involvement in the kidnapping in Macedonia of a German citizen of Lebanese descent. There are also investigations into extraordinary renditions in Portugal and Spain.

In the meantime this week, a European Union parliamentary committee issued a detailed report into what it said were "at least" 1,245 secret C.I.A. flights in Europe, some of them involving extraordinary renditions. The report, which awaits approval by Parliament, is particularly sensitive because it suggested forcefully that a number of governments knew of the flights.

"We believe there has been either active collusion by several E.U. governments or turning a blind eye," one member of the European Parliament, Baroness Sarah Ludford of Britain, said this week.

All the operatives, who included the top two C.I.A. officials in Italy at the time, have left the country. A spokesman for the C.I.A. declined to comment on the indictment, and an American government official said that no extradition requests had been received from Italy for those charged. If Italy did seek extradition, there seems little chance the Bush administration would agree.

Here in Italy, the possible complicity of the government of Silvio Berlusconi, the prime minister at the time, is one of the most difficult issues in the case. Among the Italians indicted Friday were Nicolo Pollari, who until earlier this year was Italy's chief of military intelligence, and his former deputy, Marco Mancini.

Mr. Pollari has denied responsibility, saying he cannot defend himself because he would need to use evidence classified as state secrets. The suggestion is that officials outranking Mr. Pollari gave approval for the kidnapping. "We are very disappointed by the decision of the judge, being convinced that the lack of proof and the acquisition of documents covered by secrets of state demonstrates Pollari's innocence," Mr. Pollari's lawyer, Tittal Madia, said, according to the newspaper Corriere della Sera.

The case has snarled Italian politics with several complications. This week, the government of Prime Minister Romano Prodi asked the Constitutional Court to review whether the prosecutor in Mr. Nasr's case, Armando Spataro, overstepped his bounds by wiretapping the phones of Italian agents.

On Friday, Mr. Spataro said in a statement that he "astonished" by the government's move, saying he had followed all the laws in gathering evidence.

Meanwhile, a member of Mr. Prodi's government, Antonio Di Pietro, minister of infrastructure and a former corruption prosecutor, criticized the government for not having requested the extradition of the officers.

Mr. Prodi's government has not said whether it will make such requests. But the issue looms as one more source of conflict between Italy and the United States.

While both American and Italian officials say the relationship remains solid, it has been tested in recent months on several fronts. A big demonstration is being planned on Saturday in Vicenza, in northern Italy, where the Americans have asked to enlarge an existing air base, and Italian officials have recently criticized American actions in Iraq, Lebanon and Somalia.

Earlier this month, an Italian court ordered an American soldier to stand trial for the death in Iraq of Nicola Calipari, an Italian secret service agent killed in 2005 while securing the release of a kidnapped Italian journalist. The soldier is unlikely to be extradited to Italy.

Judge Orders Padilla Jail Personnel To Testify (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

MIAMI, Feb. 16 -- Officials at the Navy brig where terrorism suspect Jose Padilla was held for 3 1/2 years as an enemy combatant were ordered Friday to testify at a hearing to determine his psychological competency, a ruling that allows the defense to press its claims that sensory deprivation and torture in confinement have rendered the alleged al-Qaeda operative unfit to stand trial.

The ruling marks one of the few times since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks that officials responsible for the jail conditions and interrogations of terrorism suspects have been called to testify, and it is the first time in the Padilla case.

Federal prosecutors objected strenuously to allowing the testimony, arguing that the focus of the competency hearing should be on Padilla's psychological state, which they believe is adequate, and not necessarily on what past events might have caused post-traumatic stress disorder, as defense attorneys allege.

During a hearing Friday, U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke grew tired of the government's objections.

"The only thing that comes to mind is: 'Methinks the lady doth protest too much,' " she told prosecutors.

Cooke ordered four people to appear at a hearing scheduled for Thursday: Sandy Seymour, who was technical director at the brig; Craig Noble, brig psychologist; Mike Reheuser, a Defense Department attorney; and Andrew Cruz, a brig social worker.

Joanne Mariner, counterterrorism director at Human Rights Watch, said the ruling is significant because while complaints of mistreatment from terrorism suspects have been frequent, it is rare that officials knowledgeable about their confinement have been called to testify.

"This could provide official confirmation of prisoner accounts of abuse," she said. "If they confirm elements of his story, it would have enormous credibility with the public."

After he was arrested in 2002, Padilla was considered so dangerous that he was held without charges at the Navy brig -- a so-called "enemy combatant" accused of plotting a radiological "dirty bomb" attack and later of conspiring with al-Qaeda to blow up apartment buildings with natural gas.

After more than three years at the brig, he was transferred to the civilian legal system, where he faces charges of conspiring to commit murder, kidnapping and other violent acts in the name of Islam. The trial is scheduled for April.

Padilla, 36, and his attorneys have claimed that while incarcerated at the brig in Charleston, S.C., he was forced to stand hooded in painful stress positions, given a drug as a "truth serum," subjected to noxious odors that made his eyes and nose run, and forced to endure sleep deprivation, extreme cold, and harsh lights.

He told a psychologist that at the brig that he sometimes begged his guards not to put him in "the cage," but he would not say what went on there. The conditions of his incarceration have rendered him unable to assist in his own defense, his attorneys said.

"When approached by his attorneys, he begs them, 'Please, please, please' not to have to discuss his case," according to psychiatrist Angela Hegarty, who interviewed him for 22 hours.

A Bureau of Prisons psychologist has found Padilla competent to stand trial, and prosecutors argue that by relating his claims of torture to his attorneys, Padilla has shown his psychological competence to assist in his own defense. But the court-appointed psychologist from the Bureau of Prisons, Rodolfo Buigas, did not interview Padilla, who refused to cooperate. Instead, Buigas talked with brig officials and others about Padilla's behavior.

Florida: Padilla Lawyers Can Question Officials (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

Lawyers for Jose Padilla, seeking to prove he is unfit to stand trial, won the right to question government personnel who observed him at a Navy brig and a federal detention center. Judge Marcia Cooke of Federal District Court in Miami ordered eight Defense Department and Justice Department officials to appear for questioning at Mr. Padilla's competency hearing next Thursday. The eight were previously interviewed for a United States Bureau of Prisons report that prosecutors cite as evidence that Mr. Padilla is mentally competent. Mr. Padilla, a 36-year-old American citizen accused of being an operative for Al Qaeda, is scheduled to go on trial April 16.

Military Justice Goes AWOL (NYT)

By Stephen Budiansky

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

Leesburg, Va.

THIS week President Bush issued a final executive order authorizing military commissions to begin trying suspected terrorists. Under rules drafted by the Pentagon last month, the commissions would be permitted to sentence defendants to imprisonment or even death on the basis of hearsay or coerced testimony.

This lack of basic legal protections provided by civilian courts or courts-martial has brought condemnation at home and abroad as an abandonment of this nation's historic commitment to liberty and the rule of law.

Yet when military commissions — an American invention — were first instituted 150 years ago, they were hailed around the world as an advance for humanity and principles of justice.

The occasion was the Mexican-American War, the first time the United States Army had been involved in an extended military operation beyond the country's borders. In 1846 Gen. Winfield Scott's forces were ordered to seize Mexico City to bring an end to the fighting. Scott immediately foresaw that, as an occupation commander, he would be facing a huge problem of maintaining order both among the Mexicans in the territory he controlled and among his own troops in a foreign land.

The traditional view of the laws of war held that an occupying army could do anything, the legal maxim being "Inter arma leges silent": In time of war, the laws are silent. As a result, the phrase "martial law" was widely seen by Americans as synonymous with sheer tyranny. People recoiled at the notion of a military officer administering law over a civilian population, even an enemy population.

In Congress, many members denounced martial law and inter arma leges silent as a holdover of a barbaric past. Scott asked President James K. Polk for a clarification of his authority as occupation commander. The president ducked the issue.

So Scott issued his own order. In February 1847, he published General Orders No. 20, which enumerated ordinary recognized civilian crimes and created the military commission to try them.

Scott's motive was equal parts necessity (maintaining public order) and shrewd politics (appealing to the Mexican population to cooperate with his forces). In place of arbitrary and raw power and summary justice at gunpoint, a system of impartial courts gave Mexicans the assurance that they would be treated fairly.

Scott in particular wanted to impress upon the civilians the contrast between American justice and the lawlessness they had endured when the Mexican forces led by Gen. Antonio López de Santa Anna rode through their villages, looting, raping and killing.

By the same token, Scott used military commissions to try — and punish — American soldiers who had committed crimes, including rape and theft, against local citizens. This, too, was not lost on the populace.

General Orders No. 20 became the spark that ignited an international revolution in thinking about martial law. It established for the first time the principle that an occupation commander was subject to a higher legal authority, same as civilian government. It became the model for orders promulgated during the Civil War that established military commissions and guided federal occupation commanders in their administration.

These later orders reiterated the revolutionary principle that martial law did not mean arbitrary power or tyranny over an enemy; rather, as a panel of officers who drafted the key Civil War era order on martial law declared, it was exactly the opposite. Far from signifying military oppression, the panel stated, martial law would be "strictly guided by the principles of justice, honor, and humanity — virtues adorning a soldier even more than other men, for the very reason that he possesses the power of his arms against the unarmed."

It is a measure of how far we have come as a nation — and in values at one time widely held — that military commissions, once seen as a great stride forward for American principles of justice and the rule of law, will now for ever after be associated with the abridgement of rights.

And it is a cruel insult to American military honor that where the nation once saw its military as called to an even higher duty in administering justice — because of the special place honor and duty hold for the soldier — it has now turned to the military as a way to shirk the American tradition of "justice, honor and humanity."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Port Authority Now Accepts Dubai Deal, Easing Debate (NYT)

By Ken Belson

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

A day after two United States senators called the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey greedy and obstructionist, the agency signed off on a deal that would let DP World, a Dubai-based port operator, sell its leases to A.I.G. Global Investment Group.

In return for its consent, the Port Authority will receive $10 million from A.I.G. to help pay for an overpass that will make it easier for trucks to deliver containers from the company's terminal to train lines. A.I.G. also agreed to spend more than $40 million to improve operations at its terminal at the Port of Newark.

The agreement was somewhat of a compromise by the Port Authority, which had asked for $30 million to cover investments it had made on behalf of DP World and a $50 million commitment from A.I.G. to spend on the port.

The deal all but closes a politically charged debate over which companies should run port terminals in the United States and in particular the New York area. DP World, the port operator owned by the royal Maktoum family of Dubai, United Arab Emirates, inadvertently set off a firestorm last year when it bought P&O Ports North America, a British company that operated ports in New York, New Jersey, Philadelphia and elsewhere.

Concerned about security at the ports, members of Congress demanded that DP World sell to an American firm its leases to operate terminals in six cities in the United States. In December, DP World and A.I.G. Global Investment Group, an arm of the American insurance giant, reached an agreement estimated at more than a billion dollars.

Five other port authorities, including those in Philadelphia and Miami, had consented to the handover without any financial conditions.

DP World and A.I.G. called the request for compensation by the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey unprecedented and unreasonable.

Fearing the deal might fall apart, two United States senators, Charles E. Schumer of New York and Robert Menendez of New Jersey, who opposed Dubai's ownership, accused the authority of standing in the way and of trying to extract money from the companies unfairly.

"I'm glad the Port Authority finally came to its senses," Mr. Schumer said of the compromise. "It's a good deal for all the companies involved, the New York port and the security of the nation. It took a while, but it's a fair settlement."

The Port Authority said its requests, while unprecedented, were not unreasonable. The $10 million that A.I.G. will pay upfront covers about half the cost of the overpass that will reduce the time it takes for containers to get to trains. The $40 million to be invested over the life of the lease will also raise the value of A.I.G.'s terminal, the authority said.

Officials at the Port Authority wanted that commitment because they worried that A.I.G., which has never operated port terminals, might simply resell its lease in a few years for a profit.

According to sources involved in the negotiations, A.I.G. had told the authority that its plans included investing more than $40 million anyway.

The deal could close as early as mid-March if all regulatory approvals are received.

"We ended up with something we wanted to get done: a contribution to a public investment and a commitment to the long-term health of the port," said Stephen Sigmund, a spokesman for the Port Authority.

Dubai Ports Clears Snag To Selling U.S. Holdings (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

Six major U.S. port operations will come under U.S. ownership after Dubai Ports World cleared a final, $50 million hurdle Friday, to end a year-long political conflict over security at the nation's cargo terminals.

DP World, based in United Arab Emirates, agreed in December to sell its U.S. ports operations to AIG Global Investment Group, following months of criticism that the UAE firm couldn't be trusted running the security-sensitive shipping apparatus.

That deal suddenly foundered this week when the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which must consent to the sale, asked the two companies for tens of millions of dollars in cash and future infrastructure work at the Port Newark Container Terminal.

The business brinkmanship led two U.S. senators on Thursday to dub the Port Authority's demands greedy, and threaten political payback if the agency didn't back down.

Late Friday, officials said they had struck a deal to resolve the impasse, with AIG agreeing to make more than $40 million of infrastructure improvements, as well as a direct payment of $10 million to the Port Authority.

DP World Poised To Clear Hurdle (FT)

By Christopher Grimes

Financial Times, February 17, 2007

DP World was set on Friday night to clear a final hurdle to unloading its six US port assets to AIG, the US insurer, after satisfying last-minute – and potentially deal-breaking – demands made by the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey.

The deal comes a day after two US senators lashed out against the Port Authority for demanding $84m in payments before transferring the lease of the Port Newark Container Terminal to AIG.

DOJ_NMG_0134037

The senators, Chuck Schumer of New York and Robert Menendez of New Jersey, led last year's bitter political fight that forced the Dubai-based DP World to sell off the assets.

The senators argued last year that allowing DP World to run the ports would jeopardise national security.

The group agreed in December to sell the $1bn-plus port assets to AIG, satisfying the politicians' desire for a US-based operator.

This week, it emerged that the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey wanted AIG to pay millions in cash and future infrastructure improvements before agreeing to a deal.

The authority also wanted payments to cover improvements it had made at the container terminal in the last year.

Sen Schumer said on Thursday that the authority's demands amounted to a "ransom fee" and threatened not to back future requests if it persisted with its demands.

Mohammed Sharaf, chief executive of DP World, said the group had never faced a similar demand elsewhere in the world.

He said if the Port Authority had persisted with the demands, the group would be willing to walk away from the deal. Transfer of four of the other US terminals – Miami, New Orleans, Philadelphia and Tampa, Florida – had been made without the addition of such fees.

On Friday night, the groups said they reached an agreement in principle that would allow the deal to move ahead. Ports America, the AIG unit, said it would spend at least $50m in capital improvements at the Newark terminal, including $10m for new rail infrastructure.

"We're pleased that we've reached an agreement that both protects our public investment and helps ensure that AIG is a long-term partner in the health and growth of the ports," a Port Authority spokesman said.

Mr Schumer praised the deal last night, saying that the Port Authority had "come to its senses".

AIG Spokesman Chris Winans said in a statement: "We are extremely pleased that we could work with the Port Authority and DP World to reach a beneficial outcome in the acquisition of the Port Newark Container Terminal."

Driver's License Emerges As Crime-Fighting Tool, But Privacy Advocates Worry (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

BOSTON, Feb. 12 — On the second floor of a state office building here, upstairs from a food court, three facial-recognition specialists are revolutionizing American law enforcement. They work for the Massachusetts motor vehicles department.

Last year they tried an experiment, for sport. Using computerized biometric technology, they ran a mug shot from the Web site of "America's Most Wanted," the Fox Network television show, against the state's database of nine million digital driver's license photographs.

The computer found a match. A man who looked very much like Robert Howell, the fugitive in the mug shot, had a Massachusetts driver's license under another name. Mr. Howell was wanted in Massachusetts on rape charges.

The analysts passed that tip along to the police, who tracked him down to New York City, where he was receiving welfare benefits under the alias on the driver's license. Mr. Howell was arrested in October.

At least six other states have or are working on similar enormous databases of driver's license photographs. Coupled with increasingly accurate facial-recognition technology, the databases may become a radical innovation in law enforcement.

Other biometric databases are more useful for now. But DNA and fingerprint information, for instance, are not routinely collected from the general public. Most adults, on the other hand, have a driver's license with a picture on it, meaning that the relevant databases for facial-recognition analysis already exist. And while the current technology requires good-quality photographs, the day may not be far off when images from ordinary surveillance cameras will routinely help solve crimes.

Critics say the databases may therefore also represent a profound threat to privacy.

"What is the D.M.V.?" asked Lee Tien, a lawyer with the Electronic Frontier Foundation and a privacy advocate. "Does it license motor vehicles and drivers? Or is it really an identification arm of law enforcement?"

Anne L. Collins, the Massachusetts registrar of motor vehicles, said that people seeking a driver's license at least implicitly consent to allowing their images to be used for other purposes.

DOJ_NMG_0134038

"One of the things a driver's license has become," Ms. Collins said, "is evidence that you are who you say you are."

The databases are primarily intended to prevent people from obtaining multiple licenses under different names. That can help prevent identity theft and stop people who try to get a second license after their first has been suspended.

"The states are finding hundreds of cases of fraud each year in each state," said J. Scott Carr, executive vice president of the Digimarc Corporation, which says it has sold biometric technology to motor vehicle departments in seven states and has a role in the production of more than two-thirds of all driver's licenses in the United States.

But the databases can also be used for law enforcement purposes beyond detecting fraud.

A page concerning Mr. Howell, printed out from the "America's Most Wanted" Web site, is taped to the wall of the investigators' office here. It is a kind of trophy.

"It's always exciting when you get a hit and you're getting someone really bad off the streets," said Maria Conlon, a facial-recognition specialist at the Registry of Motor Vehicles. "That's when everyone's morale goes up."

Most of the work is less glamorous. The analysts' main job is to check roughly 5,000 new driver's license photographs every day against the database. A computer algorithm that takes into account about 8,000 facial data points does a rough cut, and analysts examine potential matches, rejecting the vast majority.

That computers alone cannot do the job does not surprise Richard M. Smith, an expert in digital security. "It's probably one of the more inaccurate biometrics," Mr. Smith said, referring to facial-recognition technologies.

After computers narrow the field of potential matches, Ms. Conlon and her colleagues get to work.

"We don't look at hair," Ms. Conlon said. "We do look at lips, noses, ears."

Scars and tattoos can be useful, but what seem to be birthmarks are often passing blemishes. Some people make it easy by wearing the same clothes, though they are seeking licenses under different names. They have, Ms. Conlon said, "a registry outfit."

The program, in place since April, has yielded more than 1,000 apparent fraud cases referred to the state police. Other potential matches identified by the computers and confirmed by analysts have turned out to be clerical errors where, for instance, the wrong information was attached to a person's photograph. In the six months ending in January, analysts found 157 twins among the images flagged as potential matches.

The database's second function, as a resource for law enforcement agencies, is growing in popularity. Police chiefs from around the state e-mail digital photographs for comparison with the database, sometimes several times a day.

And other uses are not hard to imagine. Coroners have on three occasions sent over photographs of dead people they could not identify. The analysts struck out, perhaps because of the quality of the images.

"To make it work at all," Mr. Smith said, "you have to have good control of camera angle and lighting." Passport and driver's license photographs, along with mug shots, are ideal.

Other sorts of images are not useful — yet. "A video surveillance camera is probably not going to give it to you," Mr. Smith said.

In time, though, the combination of facial recognition and other information — from financial records, mobile phones, automobile positioning devices and other sources — may do away with the ability to move anonymously through the world, Mr. Tien, the privacy advocate, said.

"The real question with biometrics," he said, "is that they are part of a cluster of technologies that will allow for location tracking in both public and private places."

The case against Mr. Howell fizzled last week. He had been charged with invading a home at gunpoint in Dorchester in August 2002 and holding three people captive for hours, repeatedly raping one of them. He fled after being released on bail, said Jake Wark, a spokesman for the district attorney's office, leading to his inclusion on the television show's most-wanted list.

But after Mr. Howell was caught through his license photo, the prosecutors re-examined their case. In the intervening years, the victims disappeared, and prosecutors think they may have left the country. Without their testimony, prosecutors concluded, there was no way to take the case to trial. Prosecutors formally abandoned the case on Friday, and they let Mr. Howell go.

"He is in the wind right now," Mr. Wark said.

WAR NEWS:

House Rebukes Bush On Iraq (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

17 Republicans Join 229 Democrats in Opposing Deployment of More Troops

Capping four days of passionate, often angry debate, the House yesterday delivered President Bush its first rebuke since the Iraq war was launched nearly four years ago, voting 246 to 182 to oppose the administration's planned deployment of 21,500 additional combat troops to Iraq.

Seventeen Republicans voted with all but two Democrats to approve a resolution that expresses support for U.S. combat forces but opposes the additional deployments. Democrats portrayed the vote as a bipartisan slap at the White House, but Republican leaders kept GOP defections below even their most optimistic estimates, as the debate crescendoed to a dramatic close yesterday.

Although the measure is nonbinding, proponents and opponents delivered outsized predictions of the vote's consequences. Democrats asserted that it will begin to turn the political tide so decisively that the president will have no choice but to begin bringing U.S. forces home, while Republicans warned darkly that the House has emboldened murderous Islamic terrorists at the expense not only of American lives but also of America's way of life.

"Our enemies will be the only ones satisfied by this debate," warned Rep. Eric Cantor (Va.), the Republicans' chief deputy whip. "They will have received all the political rhetoric they require to convince their followers that complete victory is at hand."

But House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said that the resolution's passage "will signal a change in direction in Iraq that will end the fighting and bring our troops home safely and soon."

The Senate plans to hold an unusual weekend session today to vote on whether to proceed with a debate on the House-passed resolution. Although the resolution is merely an expression of lawmakers' views, Pelosi and other House Democrats have vowed to impose conditions on their support for Bush's war-funding request. Those stipulations could curtail troop deployments and alter the course of U.S. involvement in Iraq.

Bush did not publicly comment on the House vote, but White House press secretary Tony Snow said in a statement: "The president believes that the Congress should provide the full funding and flexibility our Armed Forces need to succeed in their mission to protect our country."

Some liberals and conservatives dismissed the House resolution as merely a symbolic gesture and said that Democratic leaders should have resorted to binding legislation if they were serious about stopping the troop buildup. But House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) said that Bush would have vetoed such a bill, with no possibility of an override. The nonbinding resolution is not dependent on the president's signature.

"What the president cannot veto is the opinion of the Congress of the United States, the judgment of the Congress of the United States, the counsel of the Congress of the United States," Hoyer added, pounding on a lectern after the vote. "Let us hope that the commander in chief hears this counsel."

If anything, the Republicans were even more dramatic, as they concluded a debate that sent 393 of the House's 434 members -- 221 Democrats and 172 Republicans -- to the floor over a grueling 44 hours and 55 minutes.

House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) called the vote "the first step down a very treacherous path, a path that if followed will endanger Americans for decades to come."

As Pelosi delivered her closing remarks in the House chamber, Republican leaders abandoned the floor and crossed the Capitol to appear with their Senate counterparts and denounce what they called the Democrats' "slow-bleed strategy" for the war.

Still, House Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) noted, yesterday's House vote marked the first time Republicans in significant numbers have broken with Bush on the war. The 17 dissidents included longtime GOP foes of the war, such as Reps. Walter B. Jones (N.C.) and Ron Paul (Tex.), but also low-key backbenchers such as Reps. Timothy V.

DOJ_NMG_0134040

Johnson (Ill.) and Fred Upton (Mich.), staunch conservatives such as Reps. Bob Inglis (S.C.) and Howard Coble (N.C.), and moderates who usually stick with the leadership, such as Reps. Mark Steven Kirk (Ill.) and Phil English (Pa.).

Locally, Reps. Thomas M. Davis III (Va.) and Wayne T. Gilchrest (Md.) voted for the resolution, along with all of Maryland's and Virginia's Democrats.

Just two Democrats, Reps. Jim Marshall (Ga.) and Gene Taylor (Miss.) voted against the measure.

In contrast, a two-day debate in June over a pro-Bush Iraq war resolution drafted by House Republicans ended with 42 Democrats joining the Republicans. Just three Republicans broke rank then.

On Oct. 10, 2002, the House voted 296 to 133 to authorize Bush to go to war with Iraq, with 81 Democrats joining 215 Republicans to pass the measure.

GOP leaders said they did not pressure any of their members in yesterday's vote, nor did they count votes ahead of time. But behind the scenes, "there was tremendous pressure from the White House," said Davis, who added that he was bombarded with facts and information sheets pressing for a "no" vote.

A senior Republican lawmaker said that, at the start of the week, the GOP leadership expected to lose upward of 50 members, but that number dropped into the mid-30s by the middle of the week. After Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) went public with his plans to curtail troop deployments, the number dropped down into the teens, settling at 17 by the vote on Friday.

"I think Murtha absolutely exposed them for what they are," Cantor said. The longer the debate went on, he said, the more GOP leaders felt that their side was firming up against the resolution. "Murtha's announcement did it for us," Cantor added. "There was clearly a significant shift in the debate."

With public opinion turning firmly against the war, the Democrats believe they were in a no-lose situation politically. Rep. Chris Van Hollen (Md.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, reiterated a well-worn attack line when he said that Republicans had "rubber-stamped the president's failed policies in Iraq."

"There are a lot of people who clearly didn't get the message that the American people sent in the last election," he said. "Every constituent has a right to know where their members stood on this issue, and every constituent will know."

Democrats in the Senate face a similar political dynamic. Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) said yesterday that most Republicans will block a debate on the House-passed resolution until they are guaranteed a vote on a resolution opposing any effort to cut off funding for the war. He predicted that Democrats will muster nowhere near the 60 votes they would need today to move to a debate on the resolution opposing additional troop deployments.

Many Republicans will not bother to show up in the rare Saturday session. Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) will be campaigning for president in Iowa. A Democratic counterpart, Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.), will be campaigning in South Carolina.

Democratic aides said that will only mean another round of newspaper headlines proclaiming that Republicans are blocking a debate on the war.

"Let us be clear," Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said, "anyone voting 'no' tomorrow is voting to give the president a green light to escalate the war."

House Votes Against Troop Surge In Iraq (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, February 17, 2007

The Democratic-led House yesterday voted against President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq, a nonbinding but symbolic action that Republicans said is defeatist and a step backward in the war on terrorism.

"Today we have had an historic victory for the American people," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, who voted against the war in 2002.

The 97-word resolution, which opposes sending 21,500 more troops to Iraq, passed 246-182. The vote was preceded by 44 hours and 55 minutes of debate over four days. Seventeen Republicans voted for the measure, and two Democrats voted against it.

The president's spokesman said the resolution won't change Mr. Bush's plan, adding that early signs of its success would leave those who voted for the resolution having to explain themselves later.

DOJ_NMG_0134041

"Members of Congress have taken their own gamble here. They're gambling on failure -- some members, at least," White House press secretary Tony Snow said.

The White House is downplaying yesterday's House vote -- and one planned for today in the Senate on another Iraq war resolution -- arguing that the more important votes were last month's Senate confirmation of Army Gen. David H. Petraeus to command U.S. forces in Iraq andan upcoming vote on an emergency spending bill to fund the war on terrorism.

Meanwhile, House Republican leaders are vowing to defeat Democratic plans to begin slowly choking off funding for the war. Democrats intend to introduce legislation next month that they hope will limit the president's use of money in the supplemental war-funding request.

House Minority Whip Roy Blunt, Missouri Republican, said the resolution "is clearly the first step toward defunding the troops and the war against Islamic totalitarianism."

Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, said Thursday that he hopes to require certification for adequate training and equipment for any deployed troops, and to place caps on how long those troops can serve and be enlisted.

"They won't be able to do the deployment," said Mr. Murtha, who voted in favor of authorizing the war.

House Minority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, denounced the plan "to eliminate funding for our troops that are in harm's way."

Democrats insist the best way to "support the troops" is to take them out of what they say is a civil war in Iraq.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman, California Democrat, who voted for the war, said it "has weakened our fight against al Qaeda. In fact the war has enhanced the group's recruitment."

Republicans insist that Iraq is a hard but necessary fight against terrorists and insurgents backed by Iran and Syria, and that the conflict is part of the country's broader fight against terrorism.

The four-day debate, in which 392 of 434 House lawmakers participated, came to a dramatic conclusion yesterday afternoon.

Republicans sent Rep. Sam Johnson of Texas, a prisoner of war in Vietnam for almost seven years, to the House floor as their last speaker.

"Let my body serve as a brutal reminder that we must not repeat the mistakes of the past," said Mr. Johnson, 76. "We must not cut off funding for the troops."

Republicans gave Mr. Johnson a two-minute standing ovation and were joined by the smattering of Democrats in the chamber.

Rep. Ike Skelton of Missouri closed the debate for the Democrats. Mr. Skelton, who voted to authorize the war, said that sending more troops "will embroil [them] more deeply in a sectarian conflict [that] cannot be won militarily."

Immediately after the resolution passed, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, sent out a release that said the Senate "must join the House and vote on the escalation."

Mr. Reid has taken the unusual step of bringing senators in for a weekend vote today on closing off amendments to an anti-surge resolution identical to the House bill.

Democrats say Republicans are avoiding an up-or-down vote on the surge, but Republicans say they want to vote on alternative resolutions, one of which would guarantee no funding cuts for the military.

"Senate Republicans want a vote in support of funding for the troops," said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, who said he expects to defeat Mr. Reid's attempt to stifle debate on other resolutions.

A Divided House Denounces Plan For More Troops (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny, Michael Luo

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 16 — A sharply divided House of Representatives passed a resolution on Friday formally repudiating President Bush's decision to send more than 20,000 new combat troops to Iraq.

The rare wartime rebuke to the commander in chief — an act that is not binding, but that carries symbolic significance — was approved 246-to-182, with 17 Republicans breaking ranks to join all but two Democrats in supporting the resolution.

DOJ_NMG_0134042

Passage was never in doubt, but the debate, lasting full days and much of three nights, brought nearly every member to the floor to declare, briefly but often vehemently, where they stood on a short, resolution affirming support for the troops but denouncing Mr. Bush's new approach to the war.

"We owe our troops a course of action in Iraq that is worthy of their sacrifice," said Speaker Nancy Pelosi, a California Democrat. "Today, we set the stage for a new direction in Iraq."

With 392 members speaking, the debate lasted twice as long as when Congress voted in 2002 to authorize the use of force against Iraq.

And it illustrated how the partisan divide over the war has deepened. While Democratic leaders had purposefully written the resolution to attract a bipartisan following, the number of Republicans who joined them was only about half of what some Democrats had predicted.

"Republicans may have lost the vote on this nonbinding resolution," said Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the Republican minority leader. "But we won the debate."

The Senate is expected to consider Saturday whether to move toward a vote on an Iraq resolution, but there, enough Republicans are expected to hold ranks to block the Democrats' approach, at least for now. In political terms, the resolution carries weight because of public sentiment, particularly from voters who placed Democrats in control of Congress.

Several historians compared its significance to the repeal by Congress in 1971 of the Gulf of Tonkin resolution authorizing the Vietnam War. That vote did not halt the conflict as members of Congress approved continued financing for two more years.

The House resolution stood out, historians said, because it criticized a specific battlefield tactic proposed by the president. It also could set the stage for a more consequential clash with the White House if Congress begins exercising broader power and authority in an effort to bring the war to a close, possibly by restricting financing.

"Never before in our history has Congress attempted to control or restrict strategic battlefield decisions," Representative Peter T. King, Republican of New York, said. "It is wrong as a matter of policy and it will come back to haunt us for years to come."

The deliberations represented the third major Iraq debate in four years, but with Democrats controlling Congress, the rules, tone and outcome changed. Republicans were not allowed to offer their own alternative proposal, but they forcefully defended the president and his policy.

Now, questions of financing the conflict loom large for Democrats in Congress. The White House and Republicans pre-emptively accused the party of starting along a path to cut financing for the troops, a suggestion Democratic leaders denied. But some of their rank and file are pressing for exactly that.

On Friday afternoon, as the debate neared an end, people seated in the gallery applauded when Ms. Pelosi praised the fortitude of American forces. Lawmakers and spectators rose as she called for a moment of silence to honor the more than 3,100 United States troops who have died in Iraq since the conflict began.

The resolution specifically stated Congress's disapproval of the president's plan to deploy more than 20,000 troops to Iraq, which Mr. Bush outlined in a speech on Jan. 10. But through more than 45 hours of deliberations, the debate grew far beyond the context of the resolution.

The arguments grew familiar as the hours marched past, with lawmaker after lawmaker rising to address what was typically a nearly empty chamber. Democrats argued that Americans should not referee a civil war, that previous efforts to pour more troops into Iraq had failed and that diplomatic measures were the only way out of the crisis.

Republicans, meanwhile, sought to portray the war in Iraq as a key battleground in a titanic global struggle against militant Islam and criticized the resolution as a slap in the face for troops on the battlefield. Failure in Iraq, they said, would lead to widespread instability in the region.

"What we're doing with this resolution is not a salute to G.I. Joe," said Representative Phil Gingrey, a Georgia Republican. "It's a capitulation to Jihadist Joe."

The White House, reacting to the vote, turned its attention to what many assume will be the next fight: the president's spending request for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0134043

"The president," Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said, "believes that the Congress should provide the full funding and flexibility our armed forces need to succeed in their mission to protect our country."

Even before the House voted at midafternoon, senators had already started to speak about the resolution in their chamber. The Senate has been locked in a stalemate over Iraq for two weeks, but Democratic leaders are seeking to put Republicans on the record during a brief Saturday session.

Senator Jon Kyl of Arizona, the chairman of the Republican Conference, dismissed the significance of the weekend vote, which is on a procedural question, and announced that he and Senator Bob Corker, Republican of Tennessee, were flying to Baghdad instead. Two Democrats scheduled to take the trip canceled.

Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, planned to miss the vote to campaign in Iowa. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton planned to break away from campaigning in New Hampshire to vote.

Iraq has dominated this session of Congress. While Democrats are broadly aligned against the war, there is little unity on the next step. Some lawmakers seek to cut financing and cap troop levels while others propose delving into war strategy.

"There is a long tradition of Congressional dissent during wartime, but I don't know that it's ever formalized itself the way this is shaping up," said the associate Senate historian, Donald Ritchie. "Taking a stand in opposition to a commander in chief's decision on a war policy, that's unusual."

After the vote, Democratic leaders painted their victory as an expression of public outrage at the war and a sign that the new Congress intends to challenge the president. "It's the first time he has had a review of his policy, rather than a rubber stamp," said Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the Democratic Caucus.

Representative Boehner, the Republican leader, said the Iraq debate highlighted the intentions by Democrats to begin reducing financing of the war, which he described as "a slow-bleed policy that cuts off funding and reinforcements for our troops in harm's way."

Representative John P. Murtha, a Pennsylvania Democrat who oversees defense appropriations, has said he would seek to block new deployments by requiring troops to meet a series of conditions and training guidelines. A day before the vote, he presented his plan in a 24-minute broadcast on MoveCongress.org, a Web site dedicated to ending the war.

Democratic lawmakers and senior aides said they believed Mr. Murtha's appearance could have kept some Republicans from supporting the resolution, fearful of being linked to the antiwar coalition.

But for all the attention paid to the symbolic resolution, it remains an open question whether it will have much immediate effect.

"It is very hard to change war policy from Capitol Hill," said Representative David R. Obey, a Wisconsin Democrat and chairman of the Appropriations Committee. "We won't have a real solution on Iraq until Republicans walk down to the White House and say, Mr. President, the jig is up, this is a bad direction and you need to rethink what you're doing."

Partisanship Marks House Vote Against Troop Surge (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON — The House on Friday renounced President Bush's decision to send more U.S. troops to Iraq, the first official challenge by the new Democratic majority on Capitol Hill to his management of the war.

The nonbinding resolution expressing disapproval of the troop buildup passed 246-182 largely along party lines, with 17 Republicans joining 229 Democrats to back the rare wartime rebuke of a commander-in-chief. Voting against it were 180 Republicans and two Democrats.

The sharp partisan split was a disappointment to Democratic leaders who had hoped for more GOP support and lessened the vote's political impact.

Still, it marked a milestone in the declining public support for the nearly four-year war and signified the growing Democratic determination to press for a de-escalation of the U.S. involvement in the military conflict.

"Today, in a loud voice, the Congress of the United States have said to the president, `Mr. President, we need a new direction in Iraq'," said House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md.

DOJ_NMG_0134044

During this week's four-day debate on the resolution, lawmakers of both sides of the argument characterized it as a first step toward a more concrete Democratic push to change Bush's course in Iraq. An effort already is under way in the House to attach strings to the latest White House funding request for the war, a move aimed at delaying -- and perhaps thwarting -- much of the new troop deployment.

Democrats warned the president to take heed. "If need be, Congress will end this war -- with binding legislation," said Rep. Allan Mollohan, D-W.Va., a senior member of the House Appropriations Committee.

Democrats gained control of the House and Senate in last fall's election due in a large part to voter disaffection with the war. The Senate will meet in a rare Saturday session for a vote on whether their chamber will take up the House resolution.

Bush has said he intended to ignore the message sent by the House measure, though he has expressed concern about Congress taking further action that would limit his stewardship of the war.

Following the House vote, the White House issued a statement saying that Bush ordered the troop buildup "because he, like most Americans, believed the existing situation in Iraq was unacceptable."

It also noted that Congress will have the opportunity to "show its support for the troops" by approving his request for $93 billion in additional war funding, with most of the money targeted for Iraq.

Republicans were gearing up for the new fight, portraying the symbolic resolution as the opening gambit in a "slow-bleed" strategy that would cut off funding for troops in harm's way.

Several GOP lawmakers pressed that case in arguing against the measure on Friday. House Minority Whip Roy Blunt, R-Mo., criticized the resolution as the start of "an all-too-binding spiral toward defeat in a fight that we cannot afford to lose."

The two-sentence resolution first states that "Congress and the American people will continue to support and protect" U.S. forces serving in Iraq, phrasing that Democrats hoped would undercut attacks that they were undermining the troops.

The second sentence says Congress "disapproves of the decision" Bush announced in a nationally televised speech Jan. 10 to add 21,500 troops to the 135,000-plus already in Iraq.

GOP leaders considered it a victory to limit defections to 17 of their 201 members. Still, discontent within a GOP caucus that once provided near lock-step support for Bush's Iraq policies was evident in the debate leading up to the vote. In their floor speeches, several GOP lawmakers distanced themselves from the troop increase and said they doubted it would quell the violence in Iraq, even as they announced their intention to oppose the resolution.

In a typical comment, Rep. Roscoe Bartlett, R-Md., said Friday he was voting against the measure "not because I believe that the (troop) surge will be helpful, but rather because I believe that a yes vote will send the wrong message to our enemies and might send the wrong message to our troops."

Democratic leaders asserted that they were pleased with the GOP support the resolution garnered.

"This is the first time you've had a break in the Republicans' blind support for a policy that has led us into a blind alley," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., chairman of the House Democratic Caucus.

But the difficulties facing Democrats in influencing Bush's war strategy likely will be apparent Saturday as the Senate meets to try to move forward with a debate on the House resolution.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., has been trying for weeks to engage the chamber in a discussion on the troop-increase plan. Reid said Friday, "Americans deserve to know whether their senator stands with the president and his plan to deepen our military commitment in Iraq."

In the Senate, however, the minority party has more tools than in the House to keep an issue from coming up, and Republicans have succeeded in blocking Reid's efforts.

GOP Senate leaders have opposed allowing the debate on the troop increase to proceed because Reid has refused to permit a vote on an alternative Republican resolution aimed at waylaying moves to cut military funding.

"There's no question that the Democrats in the House and Senate intend to tie the president's hands when it comes to the conduct of war in Iraq," Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., said Friday. "That's why we want a vote in the House and Senate that says ... the United States Congress will not cut funding for our troops in harm's way."

During the House's four days of often heated debate, 392 of the chamber's 434 members spoke (there is one vacancy). Many of the lawmakers sprinkled their speeches with quotations from President Lincoln, Napoleon and other historical figures.

DOJ_NMG_0134045

The resolution's opponents contended it would embolden America's enemies and demoralize U.S. troops. They also repeatedly assailed Democrats for failing to offer an alternative to Bush's plan in Iraq, a fight they said was a crucial front in the larger war on terrorism.

Friday's vote was in stark contrast to earlier votes on the war when the House was under Republican rule. In 2002, the House voted 296-133 to authorize the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq.

House Rebukes Bush Iraq Plan 246-182 (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Breaking with President Bush over the war in Iraq, 17 Republicans joined House Democrats in approving a resolution rejecting the administration's decision to add more than 21,000 new combat troops by May.

Though largely symbolic, the 246-182 vote opens a new chapter in the Iraq debate that will force grittier fights this spring and summer, testing Mr. Bush's powers as commander in chief against Congress's control of the funds he needs for the war.

"As even the president acknowledges, we retain the power of the purse and we will have ample opportunity to exercise that power," said Rep. Alan Mollohan (D., W.Va.). "It is a last call for us to work together ... on ending this war. It is the last call for the president to come back to the people."

White House allies in the Senate expect to stall action on the nonbinding measure in a rare Saturday session called by the Democratic leadership. But the Republican defections and new Democratic unity underscore how much the political landscape has changed in the past year.

Eight months ago, only three House Republicans opposed a similar resolution supporting the war effort and warmly praising the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. By comparison, even Republicans who stood with the president in this week's debate were often critical of Mr. Maliki and leery of committing more U.S. forces.

The White House was pleased to hold down its losses to 17 -- lower than some earlier predictions. But the counterweight is that since November's elections, the president has faced an almost solid wall of Democratic skepticism toward his military tactics. Last June, 42 House Democrats supported the administration-backed resolution; yesterday only two -- from Georgia and Mississippi -- sided with the White House.

As a result, the four days of debate foreshadowed the tough slog ahead unless lawmakers and Mr. Bush can reach some consensus. Republicans hammered home the argument that passage of the resolution could damage the morale of troops in Iraq. Invoking memories of Vietnam, the party chose to close debate with an emotional appeal by Rep. Sam Johnson (R., Texas), an Air Force veteran and former POW from that war.

"The pain inflicted by your country's indifference is tenfold that inflicted by your ruthless captors," Mr. Johnson said to a standing ovation.

Reflecting on the fight ahead, Speaker Nancy Pelosi questioned if Mr. Bush "is moveable in terms of the course of action he wants to take militarily," but said she hoped the House vote would make him more "open to a truly robust initiative" to find a diplomatic and political settlement to the fighting.

The California Democrat said the Republicans were using a "stale" argument in accusing the Democrats of not supporting the troops in the war. But as Congress reasserts itself, she said both lawmakers and the White House had to recognize each other's role.

The first test will be a $93.4 billion emergency spending request for the war that the House Appropriations Committee must consider three weeks from now. Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.), the bill's manager, said he is going to give the military "all the money they want" and more than the administration's request for readiness. But Mr. Murtha will also recommend adding restrictions that could slow the troop increase and make it harder to maintain the higher troop levels once the 21,000 have been added.

He said he believes he can get this bill out of the House committee but acknowledged that his ideas will face tougher sledding in the Senate. "It's very, very hard," he said. But Mr. Murtha, a Vietnam veteran like Mr. Johnson, already is looking ahead to the next round when the massive 2008 defense bill must be debated. "I think in the '08 bill, we're going to start looking at benchmarks," he said, and if those goals aren't met, it could then lay the groundwork for the beginning of a U.S. withdrawal.

House Rejects Troop Surge Plan (CHIT)

By Bay Fang, Naftali Bendavid

Chicago Tribune, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Rebuking President Bush on a war that enjoyed great support at its outset but has become deeply unpopular, the House went on record Friday opposing Bush's plan to add 21,500 troops in Iraq, with 17 Republicans joining all but two Democrats in voicing their disapproval.

The nonbinding resolution, approved on a 246-182 vote, was Congress' most forceful action yet to challenge Bush's conduct of the war after November's congressional elections, in which the Democrats were catapulted to a majority in both houses of Congress, largely by the public's growing frustration with the Iraq conflict.

Even some of the strongest opponents of the resolution voiced little faith Friday in Bush's escalation strategy, stressing instead the importance of backing the troops, supporting the commander-in-chief and showing steadfastness in fighting terrorism.

The White House and Republican House leadership had worked feverishly over four days of debate this week to stem defections from the GOP side, concerned about the political impact if a large majority of lawmakers opposed the president. Republican leaders also complained that Democrats did not allow them to offer alternative resolutions more supportive of the president.

But Democrats, confident that the public is with them on Iraq, argued that the war has been misguided and poorly executed and that sending the additional troops would only produce more American deaths without turning the tide of what has become a bitter civil war.

The president had no immediate comment on the House action. His spokesman said Bush was too occupied with other duties to watch the proceedings on television.

The rhetoric on the House floor Friday was emotional, sweeping and at times agonized, with orators on both sides speaking of honoring the dead, staying true to the nation's mission and respecting the Constitution. In a chamber that often sees a lone congressman addressing an empty chamber, many seats were filled, and particularly eloquent speeches were met with standing ovations. It was perhaps the closest Congress had come in three decades to the impassioned debates that animated the nation during the Vietnam War.

"The stakes in Iraq are too high to recycle proposals that have little prospect for success," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California, in a rare speech from the House floor. "The passage of this legislation will signal a change in direction in Iraq that will end the fighting and bring our troops home."

Rep. Sam Johnson, a Texas Republican who served seven years as a prisoner of war in Vietnam, was equally impassioned as he wrapped up the debate, during which 390 of 434 lawmakers spoke. "Now it's time to stand up for my friends who did not make it home, and for those who fought and died in Iraq already," Johnson said in opposing the resolution. "We must not cut funding for our troops. We must stick by them." He ended his remarks with a salute.

Rep. Patrick Murphy (D-Pa.), one of five new congressmen who are war veterans, talked about having to drive a Humvee with no doors down what was known as "Ambush Alley" in Baghdad.

"Half those names on the Vietnam [Memorial] wall are there after the civilian leadership in our country knew that it was strategically a mistake to stay there," he said. "But they didn't have the courage to stand up. This Congress is showing the courage to stand up."

Potentially adding to the power of the rebuke, the Senate plans to debate a measure identical to the House resolution Saturday. Republican leaders will try to block that vote with procedural moves, but the Senate action raises the possibility of a unified congressional response to a military move the White House considers the province of the executive branch.

One outspoken supporter of the deployment, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), characterized the Senate action as a "partisan stunt." The presidential contender was in Chicago and told reporters he intended to keep his campaign schedule in Iowa rather than return to the capitol for the debate.

"I think it's an insult to the public and our soldiers to pretend we're discharging our responsibilities to them when all we're doing is debating a meaningless, meaningless resolution," McCain said.

DOJ_NMG_0134047

The House vote portends a larger battle next month, when Bush's request for a $93 billion supplemental Pentagon spending measure will come before Congress. Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), who heads the subcommittee that oversees military spending, said he plans to offer legislation that will put such strict standards on deployments—requiring that troops spend one year at home between combat tours, for example—that Bush will have no choice but to start bringing troops home.

"They won't be able to continue," the former Marine said in a Webcast on an antiwar site. "They won't be able to do the deployment."

Republican critics said that Friday's vote was a purely political statement and that the smaller-than-expected number of Republican defections meant a compromised victory for Democrats.

"This was a political vote that gave members who wanted to be on the record that they didn't support the war, to be on the record," said Rep. Bill Young (R-Fla.), who held Murtha's post on the House panel until January.

Nevertheless, the vote marked the completion of a dramatic turnaround from the fall of 2002, when the House acquiesced, 296-133, to Bush's request to authorize military action in Iraq.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) said, "There have been over a half a dozen votes in the United States Congress that have rubber-stamped the president's policy in Iraq. This is the first vote in a four-year war that rejected the policy."

In The House: Four Days Of Warnings, Reason And Rising Voices On Iraq (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 17, 2007

'For the most part, the tenor of the debate rose to the occasion,' Pelosi said after about 45 hours of Iraq speeches.

WASHINGTON — The House debate this week on the war in Iraq was marked by emotional commentaries and dire warnings about the costs of escalating the U.S. commitment or reducing it. On Friday, the deliberations ended with a new element: an audience.

During most of the four days consumed by the rhetorical face-off, lawmakers filed into a mostly empty House chamber to deliver their speeches. A sprinkling of aides and a few other members of Congress looked on, though frequently they were chatting among themselves or thumbing their BlackBerrys.

The mood and the interest level changed on Friday, however, as the House neared its vote on the resolution opposing President Bush's deployment of more troops to Iraq. The measure, though nonbinding, was viewed by both sides as fraught with significance.

Democrats and Republicans alike crowded the chamber by midafternoon to cheer their sides during the final appeals for votes. Spectators waiting to enter the third-floor public galleries lined the halls and the marble stairs.

Lawmakers on both sides of the issue said their votes were important. For some, the issue was personal.

That was evident when Rep. Patrick Murphy (D-Pa.), an Iraq combat veteran, countered GOP assertions that Democrats were undermining troop morale.

"We are the troops" said Murphy, 33, his voice rising and his face suddenly flushed. "Friends that we served with when we deployed are … saying, 'Thank God one of our own is standing up and speaking truth to power.' "

It was also evident when 76-year-old Sam Johnson (R-Texas), a prisoner of war in Vietnam for almost seven years, shuffled to the floor on his cane three times during the week to speak against the resolution.

"I know what it does to morale and mission success," to have Congress express disapproval of a war effort, Johnson, whose body is twisted from years of beatings and confinement in leg irons, said Friday.

"Moms and dads watching the news need to know that the Congress will not leave their sons and daughters in harm's way without support," he continued. "Let my body serve as a brutal reminder that we must not repeat the mistakes of the past."

Johnson was the next-to-last of 392 lawmakers who spoke in the debate that began early Tuesday afternoon. As he finished, fellow Republicans in the now-crowded chamber rose to applaud him for a full two minutes. Johnson hauled himself up from his chair and shook his fist in acknowledgment.

Some Democrats briefly joined the ovation. Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), who as chairman of the House Armed Service Committee gave his party's last speech, paid him homage at the start of his remarks.

DOJ_NMG_0134048

On Friday, after a total of 44 hours and 55 minutes of debate, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) declared that "for the most part, the tenor of the debate rose to the occasion."

As lawmakers filed out of the chamber after the vote, some rushing to catch planes to their districts, many said they believed they had participated in a historic event.

Rep. Timothy J. Walz (D-Minn.) a former Army National Guardsman who served in Afghanistan and who rooms in Washington with Murphy, said he was "thankful" for the chance to vote for the resolution.

He said that Rep. Tom Lantos (D-Burlingame) had told him, "There is nothing nonbinding about the vote of a U.S. congressman representing his or her district in that sacred chamber, especially on an issue as important as a war."

Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.) took a few minutes to explain why he viewed the vote as a "successful failure."

The number of Republicans — 17 — who joined with virtually all of the House Democrats to pass the resolution was below some expectations for GOP defections. That kept the tally below the two-thirds threshold that would be needed to override a presidential veto of future war-related legislation.

"The real battle is coming, and Republicans have laid a foundation to defend funding for the troops," Pence said.

Congress Flexes Its Muscles On Iraq (NSDY)

By Timothy M. Phelps, Craig Gordon

WASHINGTON -- To its proponents, Friday's Iraq vote in the House was the historic answer to the embarrassments of 1964 and 2002, when Congress overwhelmingly approved wars in Vietnam and Iraq that would become unpopular.

To its opponents, the nonbinding statement of disapproval of the president's war plan was at best a meaningless gesture, at worst a terrible precedent or even a solace to America's enemies.

Scholars saw it as major shift in a trend that had lately seen Congress dominated on such issues by the presidency.

"People will look back in history and see it as the first step in an effort by Congress to limit the commander-in-chief powers of this president," said James Thurber of American University, an authority on Congress and the presidency.

"It's similar to the early steps with regard to Vietnam," he said. "It's not the same as setting timelines and cutting money, but I think those things are likely to come unless there is a significant change on the ground in Baghdad."

"It's enormously consequential because there's been no debate [about Iraq] before," said Ross Baker, an expert on Congress and the presidency at Rutgers University. "It's a reasonable place to start."

"What we're talking about at this stage is a battle over public opinion," Baker said. "It's a declaration of one of the four parts of the federal government that there's dissatisfaction with the war."

To be sure, Friday's vote was merely symbolic and doesn't limit President George W. Bush's ability to carry out the war as he sees fit. But coming a little more than a year after a near-unanimous reaffirmation of the war in the House, it was a stunning rebuke to Bush, signifying just how isolated he and the Republicans are in pursuing a course of adding troops in Iraq.

"It seems like he's ready to go ahead against his own Chiefs of Staff, top generals and the American people," not to mention of majority in Congress, Thurber said.

Bush this week worked to downplay the significance of the vote, saying in effect that the Democrats were within their rights to go on record as they saw fit as long as they didn't meddle with war funding. But some experts saw the vote as an important victory for new Democratic House Speaker Nancy Pelosi.

"Pelosi really did pull this one off as well as could be expected," said Stephen Hess, a presidential scholar at George Washington University. "She got it down to a message you could read on the head of a pin -- 'support the troops, oppose the surge.'"

Rep. Steve Israel (D-Huntington), who voted in favor, said the vote Friday was the "mirror image of the Gulf of Tonkin resolution" on Vietnam in 1964.

"For the first time the House of Representatives has sent the administration a bipartisan statement of policy that their war plans should be changed and I think that it's significant as a matter of policy today and as a matter of historical context."

DOJ_NMG_0134049

But Rep. Peter King (R-Seaford) said that as far as he knew, it was the first time Congress had "ever legislated against a particular battlefield strategy. To me its a very bad precedent."

King, and outside experts, said the fact that only 17 Republicans voted for the resolution was a disappointment to the Democrats and did not bode well for Democratic intentions to start putting binding restrictions on use of funds in Iraq.

"This vote isn't as overwhelming as I thought it would be, so that isn't exactly a harbinger that the next one would pass," said Hess.

House Passes Nonbinding Resolution On Iraq (SFC)

By Edward Epstein

San Francisco Chronicle, February 17, 2007

The House sent President Bush a double-barreled confrontational message today, telling him it opposes his latest buildup of troops in Iraq and in the next few weeks will try to start curtailing military operations in the war zone.

The Democratic-led House approved 246 to 182 a nonbinding resolution expressing the support of Congress for the U.S. troops serving in Iraq while opposing Bush's plan to send 21,500 more combat troops into the war.

Seventeen Republicans joined 229 Democrats in voting for the resolution. Two Democrats and 180 Republicans voted against it.

Before the House voted after 45 hours of debate that began Tuesday, lawmakers heard Speaker Nancy Pelosi reiterate her position that the 97-word resolution is just the start of the Democratic effort to end the four-year-old war.

"The passage of this legislation will signal a change in direction in Iraq that will end the fighting and bring our troops home," Pelosi said in the debate's final hours before a chamber half-full of Democrats who had been summoned to hear their new speaker. The Republican side was all but empty as she spoke.

Next up for the House will be legislation being pushed by one of Pelosi's closest allies, Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., that will seek to limit Bush's ability to deploy more troops to Iraq. Murtha, the chairman of the panel overseeing military spending, plans to attach his proposals as conditions next month to Bush's latest $100 billion war spending request. Murtha said he will require that no units be sent to Iraq until fully trained and equipped, including the latest armored protection against roadside bombs.

Murtha also plans, with Pelosi's full support, to require military units receive more time at home before they can be redeployed to Iraq and to end the practice of "stop loss" in which miliary personnel are kept on active duty past their date for leaving the service.

Today's House passage of the resolution spurred Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., to try to break the partisan deadlock over the war in the upper chamber.

Republicans earlier blocked a vote on a more wide-ranging bipartisan resolution against Bush's plan that had been sponsored by Sen. John Warner, R-Va., a former Navy secretary and past chairman of the Armed Services Committee.

Reid plans a rare Saturday vote -- when the body should have begun its weeklong Presidents' Day recess -- on a motion to proceed with debate on the House-approved statement.

But the minority leader, Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., told reporters Friday that he remains confident he can muster enough Republicans to block Reid's latest effort, which would need 60 votes to pass. Democrats hold a 51-49 majority in the Senate.

McConnell appeared with the House Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, to demand votes in both chambers on proposals that Congress not cut funding for the war while U.S. forces are in the field.

Bush has said that while he disagrees with Pelosi and Murtha and their supporters he respects their right to make their case opposing his latest troop increase.

Bush's spokesman, Tony Snow, said Murtha's proposals to require better training and equipment as well as longer times between deployments were dangerous.

"Anything that is going to tie the hands of military commanders and deny both the funds and flexibility they're going to need, he will take a dim view of," Snow said of the president.

DOJ_NMG_0134050

"We're just not going to get into trying to characterize a specific position about a bill that has yet to see the light of day," Snow added.

Bush spoke with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Al Maliki on Friday and encouraged him to have his forces take a more active role in fighting insurgents. The president said he conveyed "a message of urgency to the Iraqi government that our patience is not unlimited and that we expect that government to perform."

The final hours of the House debate -- in which 392 members spoke -- were pointed as both sides repeated the themes that have sounded since Tuesday.

Republicans opponents said the resolution was contradictory in praising the troops but opposing their mission. They also said it amounted to micromanaging military strategy.

"Are we really best equipped to decide what reinforcements are sent into battle?" asked Rep. Greg Walden, R-Ore. "Isn't that better left to the commanders in the field?"

Rep. Mike Ferguson, R-N.J., acknowledged that Bush's strategy hasn't worked too well, but said the Democrats, by opposing Bush's "surge," were in effect endorsing the status quo.

"The prospected of success are dwindling but a new and amplified effort may offer the best hope we have for success and for the Iraqi government," Ferguson said.

And Republicans warned that the Iraq war is part of the broader fight against Islamic extremism.

"What we're doing with this resolution is not a salute to GI Joe. It's a salute to jihadist Joe," said Rep. Phil Gingrey, R-Ga.

But Democrats said it's time for a sharp change of course with Iraq stuck in a civil war as the American military operation soon enters its fifth year with more than 3,100 Americans killed and more than $400 billion spent.

"Sending 21,000 more troops is nothing but stay the course on steroids," said Rep. Xavier Becerra, D-Los Angeles

Rep. Paul Hodes, D-N.H., one of the Democratic freshman who ousted a GOP incumbent last November on an anti-war platform, said Congress must rein in the president. "The administration is in a parallel universe of its own creation," Hodes said.

While the resolution doesn't require Bush to do anything, its proponents hope it sends him a strong signal that he should sit down with Congress' Democratic leaders to discuss new strategy.

Rep. Tom Lantos, D-San Mateo, one of the resolution's bipartisan co-sponsors, said calling the resolution nonbinding ignores its real power.

"What could be more binding on the president than the view of the elected representatives of the American people?" asked Lantos, the chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

Boehner, who accuses the Democrats of slowly trying to suffocate the miliary effort in Iraq, challenged them to a direct debate on cutting off funding.

"Let's get away from the shadow boxing, the slow bleed," and have an up-or-down vote on funding, rather than attaching conditions to future spending legislation, he said.

House Vote Repudiates Iraq Policy (HC)

Paul is the only Texan among 17 GOP dissenters

WASHINGTON — The Democratic-controlled House, joined by U.S. Rep. Ron Paul of Lake Jackson and 16 other Republicans, on Friday delivered a symbolic but stern repudiation of President Bush's decision to deploy 21,500 more troops to Iraq.

Only two Democrats defected in the showdown with the White House over an increasingly unpopular war that has claimed the lives of more than 3,100 U.S. troops.

On the 246-182 vote, the Democrats were joined by a smaller-than-expected group of Republicans. Early predictions suggested that as many as 60 Republicans skittish over the public's growing opposition to the war would back the resolution engineered by Democratic legislative leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0134051

With the exception of Paul, Texas' 18 other Republicans and 13 Democrats voted along party lines. Paul, who has a strong Libertarian streak and is weighing a GOP presidential bid, was the only Texas Republican who voted against the 2002 resolution authorizing Bush to go to war to depose Saddam Hussein.

"Resorting to a medical analogy: A wrong diagnosis was made at the beginning of the war, and the wrong treatment was prescribed," said Paul, a physician. "Refusing to reassess our mistakes and insisting on just more and more of a failed remedy is destined to kill the patient. In this case, the casualties will be our liberties and prosperity here at home and peace abroad."

Across the Capitol, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, of Nevada, set a rare Saturday vote to bring up the identical resolution in the Senate. Sen. John Cornyn, of Texas, and other Republicans said they would block Democrats from getting the 60 votes necessary to bring up the measure unless they also can vote on an alternative that would oppose any cuts in troop funding.

Emotional clashDuring four days of House debate, Democrats and Republicans clashed in often emotional, personal terms about the future course of the U.S. military campaign in Iraq and the broader fight against Islamic militants.

Republicans warned that the resolution marks the first step in a Democratic campaign to prevent Bush from deploying additional troops by cutting off funds.

Democrats, mulling a number of ways to place constraints on Bush's ability to deploy more troops to Iraq, will get a chance to do so when they take up his request for $93 billion in additional war funds.

Former Vietnam POW Sam Johnson, a Republican congressman from the Dallas area, beseeched colleagues Friday to reject the resolution, which affirms support for the troops but disapproves of Bush's decision to send more to Iraq.

"Our troops and their families want, need and deserve the full support of the country and the Congress," Johnson said, receiving a standing ovation as lawmakers from both parties saluted his heroism. "Moms and dads watching the news need to know that the Congress will not leave their sons and daughters in harm's way without support."

Johnson and his allies insisted that withdrawal from Iraq would destabilize the Middle East and embolden al-Qaida. Democrats argued that the United States is mired in a civil war that can be won only by diplomatic means and with Iraqi resolve. Staying in Iraq brings with it a far greater peril, they said.

"The longer it takes us to resolve the situation in Iraq, the longer resources and attention will continue to be diverted from the war on terrorism," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, of California. "Our ability to respond to the escalating conflict in Afghanistan and other potential crises in the world is constrained severely by the deterioration in military readiness to levels not seen since the Vietnam era."

Facing the reality that the resolution would pass, the White House did little to lobby against it and now is focused on the steps Democrats will take to block the so-called troop surge.

"What the president is insistent upon is that our forces have the funds they need and the flexibility required to continue to execute not only the Baghdad security plan, but the way forward that's designed to secure the situation in Iraq," White House spokesman Tony Snow said.

House Minority Leader John Boehner, of Ohio, called "unthinkable" any strategy to deny funding for troops.

"The American people will not support a strategy that involves pulling the rug out from under American troops," Boehner said.

Opposition to escalationEfforts to limit Bush's ability to deploy troops could prove a far tougher vote for Democrats, who fear being viewed as denying the troops necessary armor, protection and support.

A new AP poll found that while 63 percent of Americans oppose a troop surge, two-thirds also reject the idea of cutting off funds to the troops.

Rep. Al Green, D-Houston, said he was unsure how he'd vote on the Democrats' possible next action.

"I don't make snap decisions about how we will handle issues concerning our military because our military makes ... the freedoms that we enjoy possible," Green said. "For me, it would be a serious vote and I would think long and hard before I cast a vote one way or another."

Rep. Ted Poe, R-Humble, previewed the strategy Republicans would use to fight any funding cuts.

DOJ_NMG_0134052

"Does this Congress want to tell our troops in the ground 'Do more with less even though we in Congress have it within our power to give you aid?' " Poe asked.

He dramatically read to the House the letter a besieged William Barrett Travis wrote from the Alamo in 1836 begging for reinforcements.

Thirty-two men joined the 150 or so fighters inside the San Antonio mission, whose defenders were killed a few days later by Mexican soldiers.

House Opposes Iraq Buildup (DMN)

The Dallas Morning News, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON – The House voted Friday to oppose a troop buildup in Iraq, the first time since the war began nearly four years ago that Congress has gone on record against President Bush's policy.

Seizing that momentum, Senate Democratic leaders are delaying their weeklong recess to vote today on whether to consider the House's measure. They'll try to pressure enough Senate Republicans up for re-election next year to join them and allow the debate to begin – or they'll blast those Republicans as supporting the escalation of an unpopular war.

While the House's 246-182 vote on a nonbinding resolution carries no force of law, its political symbolism gives it some historic significance. Congress has rarely objected to a president's military strategy once combat is under way.

"People will look back in history and see it as the first step in an effort by Congress to limit the commander-in-chief powers of this president," said James Thurber of American University, an authority on Congress and the presidency.

"It's similar to the early [congressional] steps with regard to Vietnam," he said. "It's not the same as setting timelines and cutting money, but I think those things are likely to come unless there is a significant change on the ground in Baghdad."

Seventeen Republicans voted for the resolution – about half what Democrats had hoped for – while two Democrats from conservative districts voted against it: Reps. Gene Taylor of Mississippi and Jim Marshall of Georgia.

War opponents hope Friday's vote will serve as a turning point, the first of several actions that the Democratic-led Congress will take to pressure the president to redeploy troops to Afghanistan, the Middle East or elsewhere, or bring them home. Within minutes of the vote, Democrats said their next move would be to challenge Mr. Bush's request for $93 billion in new funds for the Pentagon

But getting binding anti-war legislation through the Senate, where Democrats hold only a 51-49 majority, and past Mr. Bush's veto, will be difficult, if not impossible.

HOW TEXANS VOTED

All Texas Democrats in the House voted for the resolution, as did Republican Ron Paul of Surfside. The rest of the state's GOP representatives voted against it.

Mr. Bush made no comment on the developments in the House, and his spokesman said the president was too busy to watch the proceedings on television.

Mr. Bush has already said passage of the measure will not deter him from proceeding with the deployment of 21,500 troops, designed primarily to quell sectarian violence in heavily populated Baghdad.

Emotional, agonizing

The rhetoric on the House floor Friday was emotional, sweeping and at times agonized, with orators on both sides speaking of honoring the dead, staying true to the nation's mission and respecting the Constitution. In a chamber that often sees a lone congressman addressing an empty chamber, many seats were filled, and particularly eloquent speeches were met with standing ovations. It was perhaps the closest Congress had come in three decades to the impassioned debates that animated the nation during the Vietnam War.

"The stakes in Iraq are too high to recycle proposals that have little prospect for success," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California, who led the House in a moment of silence, out of respect, she said, for those who fought, and "particularly those who have lost their lives in the war, and their families."

Vietnam POW

Rep. Sam Johnson, the Plano Republican who served seven years as a prisoner of war in Vietnam, was equally impassioned as he wrapped up the four-day debate, during which 390 of 434 lawmakers spoke. As he stepped to the microphone, lawmakers in both parties rose to applaud his heroism.

"Now it's time to stand up for my friends who did not make it home and for those who fought and died in Iraq already," he said in opposing the resolution. "We must not cut funding for our troops. We must stick by them," he added, snapping off a salute as he finished his remarks to another ovation.

House Denounces Bush's Iraq Strategy (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, February 17, 2007

The US House of Representatives on Friday issued a rebuke to George W. Bush's Iraq strategy in the first concrete demonstration of opposition to the war by Capitol Hill since the US-led invasion almost four years ago.

The 246-182 vote was non-binding and will have no impact on Mr Bush's plan to deploy 21,500 extra troops in addition to the 131,000 already there as part of his "new way forward in Iraq" unveiled last month.

But leaders of the Democratic party, which won midterm congressional elections in November largely on the back ofdisaffection over Iraq, said yesterday's symbolic step would be followed by measures to limit Mr Bush's ability to "escalate" the war.

The vote, to be followed by a similar one in the Senate on Saturday, marked the most significant questioning of a US president's wartime authority since the 1970 vote to rescind the 1964 Gulf of Tonkin resolution, which led to war in Vietnam.

Nancy Pelosi, Democratic speaker of the House, said: "The stakes in Iraq are too high to recycle proposals that have little prospect for success. The passage of this legislation will signal a change in direction in Iraq that will end the fighting and bring our troops home."

The White House said Friday's resolution went against the wishes of the Iraqi government and the US military in Iraq.

Republican leaders said the Democratic party was attempting a "slow bleed" of operations in Iraq that would culminate in a move to cut off congressional funding for US troops there. Seventeen of the 201-strong Republican caucus voted with Friday's resolution, fewer than party leaders had feared.

"They [supporters of the resolution] are gambling on failure," said Tony Snow, White House spokesman. "The president has a plan for success...What we're afraid of is that this is, in fact, going to serve as a precursor for cutting off our troops."

Democratic leaders plan to tread a fine line in the next few weeks that will involve taking further steps to oppose Mr Bush's prosecution of the war - such as attaching conditions to future congressional funding of military operations - while also making it clear they will continue to support American troops in the field.

"The Democratic party is highly conscious of the fact that the overwhelming majority of the American public opposed the Vietnam war and yet it was the Democrats who emerged as the losers politically," said Mark Schmitt at the New America Foundation, a centrist think-tank in Washington.

Among Democratic plans being floated are measures that would require the Iraqi government to meet certain benchmarks before new funds were authorised and conditions on the US administration's ability to redeploy military units to the battlefield. The US army has complained that it is severely under-equipped and overstretched.

House OKs Measure Opposing Troop Surge (AP)

By David Espo

AP, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Democratic-controlled House issued a symbolic rejection of President Bush's decision to deploy more troops to Iraq on Friday, opening an epic confrontation between Congress and commander in chief over an unpopular war that has taken the lives of more than 3,100 U.S. troops.

The vote on the nonbinding measure was 246-182, and within minutes, Democrats said their next move would be to challenge Bush's request for $93 billion in new funds for the Pentagon.

DOJ_NMG_0134054

"The stakes in Iraq are too high to recycle proposals that have little prospect for success," said Speaker Nancy Pelosi, leader of Democrats who gained power last fall in elections framed by public opposition to the war.

"The passage of this legislation will signal a change in direction in Iraq that will end the fighting and bring our troops home," she vowed after the vote, in which 17 Republicans joined 229 Democrats in a wartime rebuke to the president.

Citing recent comments by Democrats, Bush's Republican allies said repeatedly the measure would lead to attempts to cut off funds for the troops. Outnumbered, they turned to GOP Rep. Sam Johnson of Texas to close their case - and the former Vietnam prisoner of war stepped to the microphone as lawmakers in both parties rose to applaud his heroism.

"Now it's time to stand up for my friends who did not make it home, and for those who fought and died in Iraq already," he said. "We must not cut funding for our troops. We must stick by them," he added, snapping off a salute as he completed his remarks to yet another ovation.

Moving quickly, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., set a test vote for Saturday on an identical measure, and several presidential contenders in both parties rearranged their weekend campaign schedules to be present.

Republican senators said in advance they would deny Democrats the 60 votes needed to advance the resolution, adding they would insist on equal treatment for a GOP-drafted alternative that opposes any reduction in funds for the troops.

Even so there were signs of Republican restlessness on the issue. Only two members of the GOP rank and file sided with Democrats on an earlier procedural vote; the total figured to be higher this time.

The House vote completed a turnabout from the fall of 2002, when the House bowed, 296-133, to Bush's request to authorize military action against Iraqi ruler Saddam Hussein.

U.S.-led troops made quick work of his regime but soon found themselves targeted in a country where long-suppressed sectarian rivalries flared and outside forces rushed to intervene. Tens of thousands of Iraqis have died in the ensuing war, along with more than 3,100 U.S. troops.

Bush made no comment on the developments in the House, and his spokesman said the president was too busy to watch the proceedings on television.

After a secure videoconference with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, Bush said the Iraqis reported providing troops to fight alongside Americans, making sure that no ethnic or religious factions are ignored in the security operations, providing $10 billion toward reconstruction and working on an oil revenue-sharing law.

"That's good news for the Iraqi people. And it should give people here in the United States confidence that his government knows its responsibilities and is following through on those responsibilities," Bush said.

More than 390 of 434 lawmakers spoke during nearly 45 hours of dignified debate that spilled across four days - an unusual amount of time devoted to what Republicans and Democrats alike said was the most significant issue confronting the country.

House Republican Leader John Boehner appeared to choke back tears at one point as he read from a letter that a husband of a former congressional aide wrote home before being killed in Fallujah.

Pelosi led the House in a moment of silence, out of respect, she said, for those who fought, and "particularly those who have lost their lives in the war, and their families."

Supporters of the nonbinding resolution included 229 Democrats and 17 Republicans - fewer GOP defections than Democrats had hoped to get and the White House and its allies had feared. Two Democrats joined 180 Republicans in opposition.

The developments unfolded as a new poll showed more than half those surveyed view the war as a hopeless cause.

A sizable majority, 63 percent, opposes the decision to dispatch more troops, although support for Bush's plan has risen in the past few weeks from 26 percent to 35 percent, according to the AP-Ipsos poll.

The House measure disapproves of Bush's decision to increase troop strength, and pledges that Congress will "support and protect" the troops.

Bush has already said passage of the measure will not deter him from proceeding with the deployment of another 21,500 troops, designed primarily to quell sectarian violence in heavily populated Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0134055

Already, troops of the Army's 82nd Airborne have arrived in Iraq. Another brigade is in Kuwait, undergoing final training before proceeding to Iraq. Three more brigades are ticketed for the Baghdad area, one each in March, April and May.

In addition, the Pentagon is sending two Marine battalions to Anbar Province in the western part of the country, the heart of the Sunni insurgency.

Bush and his allies in Congress calculated days ago that the House measure would pass, and increasingly have focused their energy on the next steps in the Democrats' attempt to end U.S. participation in the war.

"The President believes that the Congress should provide the full funding and flexibility our Armed Forces need to succeed in their mission to protect our country," said White House press secretary Tony Snow.

But Rep. David Obey, D-Wis., who chairs the committee that will review Bush's request, said, "the president wants a supplemental (spending bill). If he wants it, he's going to have to accept certain things."

Democrats have made clear in recent days they will use Bush's spending request to impose certain standards of readiness, training and rest for the troops.

"That stops the surge (in troops) for all intents and purposes, because ... they cannot sustain the deployment," Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., said recently.

Republicans pointed to Murtha's remarks repeatedly during the day as evidence that despite their claims to the contrary, Democrats intend to cut off funds for the troops.

"This is all part of their plan to eliminate funding for our troops that are in harm's way. And we stand here as Republicans ... committed to making sure our troops in harm's way have all the funds and equipment they need to win this war in Iraq," said Boehner of Ohio, the Republican leader.

House Rebukes Bush On Iraq Troop Surge (HILL)

By Klaus Marre, Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, February 16, 2007

With bipartisan support, the House Friday passed 246-182 a non-binding resolution expressing its disapproval of President Bush's plan to send more combat troops to Iraq.

Seventeen Republicans joined all but two Democrats in supporting the measure. Two Democrats and four Republicans did not vote.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said the vote on the resolution, which supports the troops but rejects the surge of U.S. forces, would send a "strong message" to Bush. "The passage of this legislation will signal a change in direction in Iraq that will end the fighting and bring our troops home," she said.

But House Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said the vote is "the first step down a treacherous path." He accused Democrats of wanting to "micromanage the war" through the power of the purse. Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.) said the resolution transfers the House into 435 generals.

Republicans voting for the resolution were Reps. Mike Castle (Del.), Howard Coble (N.C.), Tom Davis (Va.), John Duncan Jr. (Tenn.), Phil English (Pa.), Wayne Gilchrest (Md.), Bob Inglis (S.C.), Tim Johnson (Ill.), Walter Jones (N.C.), Ric Keller (Fla.), Mark Kirk (Ill.), Steven LaTourette (Ohio), Ron Paul (Texas), Tom Petri (Wis.), Jim Ramstad (Minn.), Fred Upton (Mich.) and James Walsh (N.Y.).

Democratic Reps. Gene Taylor (Miss.) and Jim Marshall (Ga.) voted with the Republicans.

Despite the loss, Republican leaders were pleased to limit the defections. At the beginning of the week, House Minority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) said estimates of as many as 60 Republicans crossing party lines were not "at all unreasonable." Blunt said the final vote count showed that the GOP "won the debate."

The White House responded to the vote by pointing out that the measure is non-binding.

"[The president's surge plan] enjoys the support of the Iraqi government and U.S. military leadership, including Gen. David Petraeus, Commander of the Multi-National Force in Iraq, who recently was confirmed to his post by an 81-0 vote in the Senate," said White House spokesman Tony Snow.

DOJ_NMG_0134056

"The president ordered a new way forward in Iraq because he, like most Americans, believed the existing situation in Iraq was unacceptable. The president concluded that this new strategy was necessary in order to help the Iraqi government gain control over Baghdad, assume more responsibility for security, and pursue reconciliation of all of Iraq's communities."

Snow added that Congress will soon "have the opportunity to show its support for the troops in Iraq by funding the supplemental appropriations request the president has submitted, and which our men and women in combat are counting on."

The White House spokesman also told reporters Friday that the resolution did not come up during a 45-minute conversation between the president and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Pelosi said Congress owes the troops "a course of action in Iraq that is worthy of their sacrifice." The Speaker said placing the emphasis on training Iraqi forces would allow "the phased redeployment of our forces from Iraq to begin within the next four to six months."

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has said he favors the House resolution over a bipartisan Senate measure and will seek to bring it to a vote in the upper chamber. The Senate will meet Saturday and vote on cloture on the resolution.

House Passes Iraq Resolution As Senate Readies For Saturday Vote (RC)

By John Stanton

RollCall.com, February 16, 2007

The House passed a nonbinding resolution Friday afternoon opposing President Bush's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq, as Senators were preparing for what is expected to be a brief but bitter Saturday session during which Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) will attempt to bring the measure to the floor.

The resolution passed the House, 246-182, with 17 Republicans joining all but two Democrats in voting "aye."

On the Senate side, although Democrats at press time appeared to have peeled off several Republicans — notably Sen. John Warner (R-Va.) — senior Democratic aides said Reid likely would fall just short of the 60 votes needed to end a GOP filibuster. One aide predicted Democrats would fall just three or four votes short of breaking the filibuster.

While Democratic aides said every member of their Caucus aside from Sen. Tim Johnson (S.D.) would attend the Saturday vote — despite the angry private protests of the crowd of 2008 presidential aspirants — several Republicans were expected to skip the vote. Sens. Kit Bond (R-Mo.) and Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.), both announced today they would forgo the vote.

Outside organizations were gearing up for a last-minute push to pressure vulnerable Republican incumbents to break with their leaders and end the filibuster. MoveOn.org, VoteVets and Americans Against Escalation In Iraq were all planning phone banking, e-mail campaigns and "citizen lobbying" trips to Capitol Hill for today and Saturday morning targeting GOP moderates up for re-election in 2008.

One lawmaker who will not be present for Saturday's vote is Senate GOP Conference Chairman Jon Kyl (Ariz.), who will be leaving before the roll call vote to lead an official visit to Iraq.

Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) also will be on the trip, as will a handful of House Members from both parties.

House Rebukes The President On Iraq (CNN)

CNN.com, February 16, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Seventeen Republicans joined Democrats on Friday in passing a two-sentence resolution denouncing President Bush's plan to boost troop levels in Iraq.

The resolution passed easily, 246-182.

Democratic leaders on Saturday will attempt to bring the same measure to the floor in the Senate. (Full story)

Democrats hailed the victory, while outside the chamber, Republican congressional leadership blasted the resolution, calling it the first step toward de-funding the war.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, a California Democrat, said the passage of the non-binding resolution "should send a very clear and firm message to the president of the United States: that the American people spoke in November, that they wanted a new direction in Iraq. This resolution today sets the stage for that new direction," she said.

"The Congress of the United States knows that if we pass a bill, a law, a binding document, the president can veto that," said House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer of Maryland. "What the president cannot veto is the opinion of the Congress of the United States, the judgment of the United States Congress, the advice and counsel of the Congress of the United States. He cannot veto that."

The resolution says that Congress supports the military but disapproves of Bush's plan to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq. A clear majority of Republicans battled to the end against the resolution.

"One vision sees no hope for us in Iraq and counsels that we withdraw, just give up," said Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida, the ranking Republican on the Foreign Affairs Committee. "By contrast, the other vision focuses on success."

House Minority Leader John Boehner of Ohio said he was concerned that the "Democrats in the House and Senate intend to tie the president's hands when it comes to the conduct of war in Iraq. That's why we want a vote in the House and Senate that says that we will not, we the United States Congress, will not cut funding for our troops in harm's way."

The Democratic leadership has said it will not cut funds for troops already in Iraq, but Sen. John Murtha, chairman of the committee in charge of the Defense Department's purse strings, has already signaled he may attempt to tie future deployments to legislation requiring the troops be fully equipped and armored before they're allowed to be shipped out.

Republicans say that's not necessary.

"What we have now is a system where you can move personnel very quickly; they marry up with the equipment in places like Kuwait and they move into the battle," said Rep. Duncan Hunter of California, the ranking Republican on the House Armed Services Committee. "So our ability to move people quickly and move equipment quickly to the fight to save American lives and American interests will very much be compromised by any of these micromanaging policies.

"Micromanaging DoD personnel policies and trying to choke off equipment and people for the war-fighting theater is extremely dangerous," Hunter said.

The White House acknowledged the resolution's passage, noting in a statement from Press Secretary Tony Snow's office that the president's plan "enjoys the support of the Iraqi government and U.S. military leadership, including Gen. David Petraeus, commander of the Multi-National Force in Iraq, who recently was confirmed to his post by an 81-0 vote in the Senate."

"The resolution is nonbinding. Soon, Congress will have the opportunity to show its support for the troops in Iraq by funding the supplemental appropriations request the president has submitted, and which our men and women in combat are counting on," the statement said. "The president believes that the Congress should provide the full funding and flexibility our armed forces need to succeed in their mission to protect our country."

Now that the House has completed its debate, the showdown moves to the Senate, where Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada has promised to bring up the same resolution Saturday. Reid urged Senate Republicans to drop procedural moves that blocked votes on similar Senate resolutions last week.

"We demand an up-or-down vote," Reid said Thursday. "The resolution says we support the troops and oppose the escalation of the presence in Iraq. We're determined to give our troops and the American people the debate they deserve."

But it was not clear whether Reid and his allies will get the 60 votes needed for the Senate to cut off debate on other matters and bring up the issue. Minority Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky said Republicans will insist on "a measure of fairness" that will allow them to offer alternative resolutions, including one stating the Senate won't cut off money for troops in the field.

"If we have only one alternative, it will involve a vote on funding the troops," said McConnell. He predicted enough Republicans would stick with him to prevent the House resolution from coming to the floor.

On February 5, all but two Republican senators voted to block debate on another non-binding resolution backed by most Democrats and several Republicans that would have expressed the Senate's opposition to deploying additional troops.

Republicans said Reid's latest move appears to leave behind that measure, backed by Virginia Republican John Warner, the influential former chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, and current Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin, a Democrat from Michigan.

Published polls indicate a solid majority of the U.S. public opposes the Bush plan, and Democrats said the November election victories that put them in control of Congress show Americans want to wind down the nearly four-year-old war.

US House Rejects Bush Iraq Plan (BBC)

BBC.com, February 16, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134058

The US House of Representatives has voted in favour of a resolution criticising President George W Bush's decision to send extra troops to Iraq.

Seventeen of his Republican Party joined the Democrats in passing the non-binding motion 246 to 182.

The vote follows days of fierce debate, during which the Democrats have made it clear that more decisive steps to limit Mr Bush's war policy could follow.

The Senate is due to vote on Saturday on whether to debate the troop plan.

Text of resolution Previous Senate attempts to debate the anti-troop surge resolution have been met with delaying tactics from Republican members.

If senators do vote to consider the resolution in their unusual Saturday session, Mr Bush faces the possibility that both chambers of Congress will repudiate his Iraq policy within two days, says the BBC's Justin Webb in Washington.

Although both the Congressional resolutions are non-binding, the president needs the legislators to support his $93bn (£48bn) emergency troop funding measure.

"The president believes that the Congress should provide the full funding and flexibility our armed forces need to succeed in their mission to protect our country," the White House said in a statement shortly after the vote.

White House officials said Mr Bush had been too busy to watch the proceedings on television.

'Tragic goal'

The House vote brought to a close the first full debate there since the Democrats took control of Congress in November.

Written by the Democrats, the resolution states that the House "will continue to support and protect" US soldiers in Iraq but that it "disapproves" of the 21,500-strong troop increase.

The bipartisan resolution today may be non-binding. But it will send a strong message to the president

Speaker Nancy Pelosi About 400 of 434 representatives in the House spoke during four days of debate.

Speaking after the vote, House of Representatives Speaker Nancy Pelosi said it would send an unmistakable signal to the White House.

"The president's escalation plan repeats past mistakes. The stakes in Iraq are too high to recycle proposals that have little prospect for success.

"The bipartisan resolution today may be non-binding. But it will send a strong message to the president - we here in Congress are committed to protecting and supporting our troops."

Ms Pelosi had earlier warned there would be "no more blank cheques" for Mr Bush on Iraq.

House Minority Leader John Boehner had urged lawmakers to vote against the motion, saying it was "the first step towards a tragic, unthinkable goal".

"We face a sophisticated, determined enemy who wants to annihilate our way of life," he said.

"We have a duty to stand and fight against those that seek to destroy America and the freedom that defines us."

Democrats Signal A Wider Battle Lasting The Rest Of President's Term (WP)

By Peter Baker, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

After enjoying great deference in the conduct of national security for his first six years in office, President Bush now faces an assertive opposition Congress that has left him on the defensive. The nonbinding resolution passed by the House yesterday on a largely party-line vote seems certain to be the first of a series of actions that will challenge Bush for the remainder of his presidency.

At stake is not just Bush's decision to send an additional 21,500 U.S. troops to Iraq, the plan specifically renounced by the resolution. By extension, the 246 to 182 vote passed judgment on Bush's overall stewardship of the war in Iraq and, more broadly, on his leadership in the world. At a time when the president is confronting Iran over its nuclear enrichment program, the House vote demonstrates that he has far less latitude to take aggressive action than he might have had in the past.

DOJ_NMG_0134059

"This is an important moment," said Zbigniew Brzezinski, who was President Jimmy Carter's national security adviser and is now a counselor at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "And it's an important moment not only about what's in the past, or even in the present, but also what might be happening in the future."

The resolution, he said, "tells the president that the country's increasingly tired of the war and the country's reaction to his provoking a new war would be even worse."

Both sides recognized that the House vote, along with a Senate vote scheduled for today, represents the opening salvo in a more protracted struggle. "To me, this is kind of a baby step. It doesn't have teeth," said David J. Rothkopf, author of "Running the World," a book on the making of modern foreign policy. "The real question is going to be whether the Democratic leadership goes further and challenges funding, because that's where Congress historically has been able to show its influence."

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and her close adviser, Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), are devising a strategy to tie Bush's hands by placing conditions on future funding for the war, such as requiring any units sent to Iraq to meet certain standards for training, equipment and rest between deployments. Because those conditions might be hard to meet, they could slowly constrict Bush's ability to keep up troop levels.

But yesterday's vote signaled peril for the Democratic congressional leadership as well. Despite deep Republican discontent with the course of the war, Democrats were unable to persuade more than 17 members of the president's party to register that dissatisfaction with their votes. If Democratic leaders could not build a broader bipartisan coalition for a symbolic vote, it may prove much harder to attract Republican support for proposals to limit Bush's options in Iraq.

Many Democratic strategists remain allergic to repeating the finale of the Vietnam War, when Congress voted to cut funds for the South Vietnamese government and the nation fell to the North in 1975. For years afterward, Democrats have struggled to shed the image of being soft on defense, which is why they were so eager to bring along more Republicans yesterday.

The White House privately pressed that point with wavering Republicans. Even as Bush resigned himself to certain passage of a resolution with no substantive force and publicly made little effort to oppose it, aides such as national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley lobbied GOP lawmakers to stick with the president to avoid emboldening Democrats down the line. "If Republicans go along with this," an administration official said, "it sends a message to Murtha about what he might be able to do with the supplemental" war-spending measure.

Administration allies warned about the precedent beyond Bush as well. "If Congress proceeds to throttle the president's strategy, then it will seriously undercut the ability of future presidents to do what they need to do to protect the nation in a time of war," said James Phillips, a foreign policy scholar at the Heritage Foundation. "It's a mistake to think you can effectively run a war by committee."

The president and Congress have wrestled over national security since the founding of the nation. The first congressional investigation back in 1792 when George Washington was president looked into a bloody military defeat inflicted by Native Americans. Congress challenged the White House during the Mexican-American War and the Civil War, rejected the Treaty of Versailles negotiated by Woodrow Wilson after World War I, and tried to keep Franklin D. Roosevelt from aiding allies facing threats from Nazi Germany.

The clash between branches came to a head during the Vietnam War, when Congress rescinded the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution that Lyndon B. Johnson had used to justify an escalation. A measure to cut off money for the war was rejected in 1970 but increased pressure on Richard M. Nixon to turn the fighting over to the South Vietnamese. As Nixon withdrew U.S. forces, Congress in 1973 cut off funding for "offensive" operations, in effect ratifying what by then was the president's stated course. A 1974 vote cut aid to South Vietnamese forces by 50 percent after U.S. forces were already gone, leading to the fall of Saigon.

Tension between the executive and legislative branches over national security has percolated since then. Congress restricted Ronald Reagan from funding the contra rebels in Nicaragua, and the Senate rejected the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty submitted by Bill Clinton. But the tension had not reached the Vietnam War level until yesterday.

"There's always been a lot of dissent in wartime," said Senate historian Donald A. Ritchie. Sometimes, as in Vietnam, it takes a while to build, he added: "There's a certain point when everybody marches together. They were very much united with Johnson in '65 and '66. But when the war turned bad, that's when they broke away. The same was true in the Civil War, and the same was true in any protracted war when things didn't go well."

A Symbolic Vote Is A Sign Of Bitter Debates To Come (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 16 — The symbolic House vote on Friday opposing the American troop buildup in Iraq was an act of Congressional defiance that lays the groundwork for an even more bitter and ultimately more consequential clash over whether and how lawmakers might restrict President Bush's authority to prosecute the war.

Even before the vote, the White House and Democrats who control Congress were girding for the next fight, over Mr. Bush's request for $99.6 billion in emergency spending for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. Already, Democrats are contemplating moves that, while short of cutting off money for the war, would restrict how Mr. Bush can spend it by limiting the Pentagon's ability to recycle troops back to Iraq after they have returned home.

The 246-to-182 vote, with 17 Republicans crossing party lines to join Democrats, was a stark reminder of how isolated Mr. Bush has become as he presses ahead with his increasingly unpopular Iraq policy. The president himself seemed resigned to the outcome. At a news conference on Wednesday, he told reporters, "They have every right to express their opinion."

At this point, it is unclear whether that opinion will eventually translate into the political resolve to rein in Mr. Bush. But by emboldening critics of the Iraq war, the vote has made the debate over financing, which would have been unthinkable even six months ago, a virtual certainty. "What the president is getting is a real indication that the weather is going to get worse," said Tom Daschle, the former Senate Democratic leader. "He's going to be in the middle of a huge storm."

At his news conference on Wednesday, Mr. Bush seemed to be telling lawmakers to bring it on. "I'm going to make it very clear to the members of Congress, starting now," he said, "that they need to fund our troops and they need to make sure we have the flexibility necessary to get the job done."

American history is replete with examples of clashes between Congress and the White House over war powers. Congress, for example, used its power of the purse to bar covert military assistance for the Nicaraguan contras — a move that led to the Iran-contra scandal under President Reagan — and to cap the number of troops in Vietnam.

When it comes to the war in Iraq, Mr. Bush has been betting that Congress will be unwilling to play that kind of "constitutional hardball," in the words of Martin S. Lederman, an expert on presidential war powers at the Georgetown University School of Law.

If Congress does try to restrict financing, Mr. Bush could be forced into a difficult choice of abiding by a statute he does not approve of, or asserting he has the constitutional authority to flout it.

Or, if lawmakers attach restrictions to a military spending measure, he could find himself in the uncomfortable position of vetoing a bill that provides money for the troops.

Allies of Mr. Bush make clear he will not accept financing restrictions without a fight.

"No president can afford to accept that kind of condition," said David B. Rivkin, a lawyer for the Reagan and first Bush administrations, who has been an ardent supporter of Mr. Bush in Iraq. "If Congress can do this to the president, the president, instead of being head of a co-equal branch, is a ward of Congress, a flunky."

For Democrats, the debate is not without political risk. They do not want to seem unpatriotic by advocating withdrawal of financial support for soldiers engaged in battle. At the same time, they are under intense pressure from the antiwar faction of their party and mindful of the results of midterm elections in November, which put them in the majority and have been widely interpreted as a call to bring the troops home.

On the House floor, Speaker Nancy Pelosi tried to give voice to the Democrats' balancing act. "The bipartisan resolution today is nonbinding," she said, "but it will send a strong message to the president: we are committed to supporting the troops and we disapprove of the escalation."

But symbolically opposing the president's plan to add more than 20,000 troops is not enough for war opponents, who have been banding together in state legislatures around the country to pass their own nonbinding resolutions and are pressing Congress to do more.

"We want the war to end," said the author of one such bill, Jeanne Kohl-Welles, who represents Seattle in the Washington State Senate.

"We want to have no more escalation, period," she said. "Rather than a nonbinding resolution, I would like Congress to take action to make it binding."

Just how Democrats will proceed is not entirely clear. Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., the Delaware Democrat who is running for president, wants to repeal the 2002 resolution authorizing the Iraq war. Representative John P. Murtha, the Pennsylvania Democrat who leads the House subcommittee that oversees the Pentagon budget, is drafting his own version of the president's financing request that could effectively limit troop deployments to Iraq.

The Murtha plan has already proven explosive. ThePolitico.com, a Web site that covers politics, dubbed it a "slow-bleed strategy," a term that Republicans seized upon. In an online commentary posted Friday, William Kristol, editor of The Weekly Standard, wrote, "The national Democratic Party has become the puppet of antiwar groups."

The president, meanwhile, has pursued a kind of divide-and-conquer strategy, pitting the Senate against the House. With the Senate set to take up the House resolution on Saturday, he has been reminding reporters that the Senate had overwhelmingly confirmed Gen. David H. Petraeus — who supports the troop buildup — as the new American troop commander in Iraq. Why, Mr. Bush asks, would the House disapprove of the plan that the Senate has sent General Petraeus to carry out?

People on both sides say the Senate is unlikely to muster the votes to pass the House resolution, let alone restrain spending authority.

Mr. Bush has been urging Congress and the American public to give his troop buildup a chance, and for a while, at least, that argument may hold. The question is, how long?

Senate Democrats To Try Again For War Debate (POL)

By John Bresnahan, Carrie Budoff

The Politico, February 16, 2007

Senate Democrats, following four days of often-contentious war debate in the House, will try again Saturday to force debate of President Bush's plan to deploy another 21,500 troops in Iraq, but their second attempt in two weeks appears unlikely to succeed.

Several Republican senators, including John Warner of Virginia, intend to vote with Democrats. But Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., said that he did not expect Democrats to stitch together the 60 votes necessary to move the Senate toward a debate on the anti-surge resolution approved by the House.

On Friday, the House adopted a Democratic non-binding resolution rejecting President Bush's plan to send another 21,500 troops into Iraq.

The vote was 246 to 182, largely along party lines.

Seventeen Republicans broke ranks with the president and their own House leadership and supported the measure. Only two Democrats opposed it.

At the White House, press secretary Tony Snow pointedly noted the House resolution was non-binding.

"Soon, Congress will have the opportunity to show its support for the troops in Iraq by funding the supplemental appropriations request the president has submitted, and which our men and women in combat are counting on.'' Snow said, adding the "president believes that the Congress should provide the full funding and flexibility our armed forces need to succeed in their mission to protect our country."

In the House, the number of GOP defectors was smaller than Republican leaders had initially feared, thanks to a lobbying campaign by the president; his national security adviser, Stephen Hadley; and top GOP House leaders.

The 17 Republicans supporting the resolution were: Reps Mike Castle of Delaware, Howard Coble of North Carolina, Tom Davis of Virginia, John J. Duncan Jr. of Tennessee, Phil English of Pennsylvania, Wayne Gilchrest of Maryland, Bob Inglis of South Carolina; Timothy V. Johnson of Illinois, Walter B. Jones Jr. of North Carolina, Ric Keller, Fla.; Mark Kirk of Illinois, Steven C. LaTourette of Ohio, Ron Paul of Texas, Tom Petri of Wisconsin; Jim Ramstad of Minnesota, Fred Upton of Michigan, and Jim Walsh of New York.

Everyone but Inglis, Johnson and Petri had been mentioned as Republicans who would likely cross the aisle and vote with the Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0134062

The two Democrats who voted against the resolution were Reps. Jim Marshall of Georgia and Gene Taylor of Mississippi.

Republican leaders were confident the defections would be under 20, a significant drop from the beginning of the week when Democrats were projecting 40 to 60 Republican defections.

Minority Whip Roy Blunt, R-Mo., told a group of reporters afterward that Democratic projections of 40 to 50 defections at the early part of the week were not off base.

"We never had an opportunity to win the vote,'' he said, "but I thought we won the debate.''

In the Senate, At least one Republican in a group of seven that sent a letter last week to Senate leaders urging a debate will stick with his party. Sen. George Voinovich, R-Ohio, said Friday that he will vote against the cloture motion because Democrats are not allowing debate on alternative resolutions, including one favored by GOP leaders to protect funding for troops in Iraq.

"The American people want Congress to play a role in the way this war is being handled," Voinovich said in a statement. "The first step is to demand a better plan, and we owe the people more than the 10 lines in the House resolution. You can't even begin to address a real solution to a complex situation in 10 lines."

A spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said "it remains to be seen whether we can get to 60 votes."

"Sen. Reid remains hopeful," said spokesman Jim Manley. "If not, we will be right back at this issue shortly after the recess."

Reid expects attendance from all members of the Democratic caucus, with the exception of Sen. Tim Johnson of South Dakota, who is still recovering from brain surgery, Manley said.

The rare Saturday session forced several presidential candidates to rework their weekend campaign schedules.

The Senate's third ranking leader, Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., said he will not cancel his plans to travel to Iraq Saturday – a trip that had been in the works for a month.

"What more important place could you be?" Kyl asked reporters Friday at a Capitol news conference. "Getting the real story, not the story that is being spun here on Capitol Hill."

Not The "Real Vote" (WP)

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

Or so Rep. John Murtha says of the House's Iraq resolution.

REP. JOHN MURTHA (D-Pa.) has a message for anyone who spent the week following the House of Representatives' marathon debate on Iraq: You've been distracted by a sideshow. "We have to be careful that people don't think this is the vote," the 74-year-old congressman said of the House's 246-182 decision in favor of a resolution disapproving of President Bush's troop surge. "The real vote will come on the legislation we're putting together." That would be Mr. Murtha's plan to "stop the surge" and "force a redeployment" of U.S. forces from Iraq while ducking the responsibility that should come with such a radical step.

We'll return to Mr. Murtha's plan, but first it's worth considering the five days of debate that he so breezily dismissed. It's true that nonbinding resolutions won't stop the troop surge, which is already underway. But after years of minimal debate and oversight of the war, the House Democratic leadership was right to allow scores of representatives to speak at some length on Iraq. Some of the speeches were little more than partisan rhetoric, but there were also intelligent and heartfelt interventions, especially from veterans of Iraq and Vietnam.

The House vote does matter: It ought to increase the pressure on Mr. Bush and the Iraqi government to follow through on their pledges to accompany the military campaign with tangible steps toward political accords and economic reconstruction. Senate leaders would be wise to reach an agreement today allowing a similar debate. And both chambers should aggressively conduct oversight hearings aimed at holding the administration to its promise to link continued U.S. troop deployments to Iraqi performance.

Mr. Murtha has a different idea. He would stop the surge by crudely hamstringing the ability of military commanders to deploy troops. In an interview carried Thursday by the Web site MoveCongress.org, Mr. Murtha said he would attach language to a war funding bill that would prohibit the redeployment of units that have been at home for less than a year, stop the extension of tours beyond 12 months, and prohibit units from shipping out if they do not train with all of their equipment. His aim, he made clear, is not to improve readiness but to "stop the surge." So why not straightforwardly strip the money out of the appropriations bill -- an action Congress is clearly empowered to take -- rather than try to micromanage the Army in a way that may be unconstitutional? Because, Mr. Murtha said, it will deflect accusations that he is trying to do what he is trying to do. "What we are saying will be very hard to find fault with," he said.

Mr. Murtha's cynicism is matched by an alarming ignorance about conditions in Iraq. He continues to insist that Iraq "would be more stable with us out of there," in spite of the consensus of U.S. intelligence agencies that early withdrawal would produce "massive civilian casualties." He says he wants to force the administration to "bulldoze" the Abu Ghraib prison, even though it was emptied of prisoners and turned over to the Iraqi government last year. He wants to "get our troops out of the Green Zone" because "they are living in Saddam Hussein's palace"; could he be unaware that the zone's primary occupants are the Iraqi government and the U.S. Embassy?

It would be nice to believe that Mr. Murtha does not represent the mainstream of the Democratic Party or the thinking of its leadership. Yet when asked about Mr. Murtha's remarks Thursday, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) offered her support. Does Ms. Pelosi really believe that the debate she orchestrated this week was not "the real vote"? If the answer is yes, she is maneuvering her party in a way that can only do it harm.

On To The Hard Part On Iraq (NYT)

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

President Bush lost touch long ago with Iraq's political reality — not to mention Americans' anguish and disbelief at his mismanagement of the war. So we welcome the House of Representatives' long-overdue attempt to shake some sense into Mr. Bush with a resolution opposing his decision to send another 20,000 combat troops to fight this disastrous war without any plan to end it.

Yet yesterday's vote, in which 17 Republicans joined the Democrats to produce a margin of 246 to 182, was the easy part. It takes no great courage or creativity for a politician to express continuing support for the troops and opposition to a vastly unpopular and unpromising military escalation. Even if the Senate manages to overcome its procedural self-hobbling and approve a similar resolution, the war and the mismanagement will go on.

The next necessary steps will require harder thinking and harder choices. Congress needs to do what Mr. Bush is refusing to do: link further financing for the war to the performance of Iraq's Shiite-led government, which is making no serious effort to rescue its country from civil war.

Congress needs to impose clear benchmarks and rigorous timetables, insisting that the Iraqi government stop equivocating and start disarming sectarian militias, adopt a formula to share oil revenues equitably and end employment discrimination against Sunni Arabs. Congress must be prepared to cut off financing if the Iraqis refuse.

We fear that clever maneuvers like the one proposed by Representative John Murtha, reportedly with the backing of Speaker Nancy Pelosi, to dress up a reduction in troop strength as a "support the troops" measure won't help contain the war or make American troops safer. Mr. Murtha would link this year's war financing to the Pentagon's adoption of new deployment rules, including longer stretches from the battlefield for returning troops, more specialized training and better defensive equipment. That would let representatives cast a politically safe vote for financing the war, while forcing the Pentagon to gradually reduce the number of active duty troops available to serve in Iraq.

This page has advocated many of the same reforms — but not as a back-door way of forcing lower troop numbers in Iraq. Congress's overriding goal must be to find the most responsible way to extricate American troops from what is becoming an increasingly unwinnable war, while trying to contain the suffering and minimizing the damage to American interests in the region.

Instead of camouflaged troop squeezes, Congress needs to grasp the problem straight on and do what the administration won't do. It must impose tough requirements and deadlines on the Iraqi government, and link the future of all American troops in Iraq to the timely achievement of these goals.

House Irresolution (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

A funny thing happened yesterday on the way to the House of Representatives' vote to "support" the troops but assail their mission in Iraq: The majority for this "non-binding" attempt at gathering political cover was a lot smaller than advertised.

DOJ_NMG_0134064

Yes, the Democrats carried the day, 246-182, and thus can say to their antiwar supporters that they "sent a message," or something, to President Bush and the Iraqis. But the margin was smaller than media speculation had predicted, with only 17 Republicans heading for the tall grass.

Minority Leader John Boehner and the GOP leadership deserve credit for making a spirited argument against the resolution that clearly won over many of their skittish backbenchers. Credit, too, to such "moderate" GOP Members as John McHugh of New York and Jim Saxton of New Jersey, who opposed the resolution despite the unpopularity of the war in their states. And credit as well to the two Democrats, Gene Taylor of Mississippi and Jim Marshall of Georgia, who didn't join their party's defeatist ranks.

As for those in favor, no fewer than 69 Members were for the war before they were against it. By our count, 13 Republicans and 56 Democrats voted to authorize the war in October 2002, when it was popular, but yesterday voted against it now that the going is tough. We have more respect for those, such as Texas Republican Ron Paul or Ohio Democrat Dennis Kucinich, who voted against the war from the start.

The immediate effect of the modest majority vote may be to slow the momentum for Speaker Nancy Pelosi's "slow-bleed" strategy to micromanage the war without actually cutting off funds. Democrats don't want to leave their fingerprints on defeat in Iraq by actually voting to bring the troops home. So instead, they're hoping to put restrictions on troop deployments that will make it impossible for the Iraq commander, General David Petraeus, to fulfill his mission. Yesterday's vote showed that if Democrats want to execute this cynical duck-and-run, they will have to do it without much Republican help.

Words Of War (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 17, 2007

Great oratory isn't the House's strong suit. But at least its members actually voted on Iraq policy.

FORTUNATELY FOR Congress, actions speak louder than words — even symbolic actions such as the House of Representatives' approval Friday of a nonbinding resolution opposing the "surge" of U.S. troops to Iraq.

The surge is necessary, but the resolution may be as well — as a way to hold President Bush to his commitment that U.S. involvement in Iraq is not open-ended. Still, the world will little note, nor long remember, the words that were uttered by House members before the 246-182 vote. Congress is often a cave of winds, but with a few exceptions the House's Iraq debate was a blowhard's paradise.

This debate had it all: pointless recriminations about the original decision to invade Iraq and topple Saddam Hussein; strained analogies to Pearl Harbor, the Alamo and an unfriendly neighbor who won't mow his own lawn; invocations of Osama bin Laden (as the real enemy in Iraq or, alternatively, as the real enemy from whom Iraq has distracted us); and, on both sides, simplistic depictions of what's going on in Iraq as either a civil war with no international implications (a scenario attractive to supporters of the resolution) or the epicenter of the worldwide "war on terror" (an article of faith for some opponents).

Non sequiturs and contradictions abounded. Some opponents of the resolution ridiculed it as meaningless and "fake"; others warned that it was all too substantial, the first step in a Democratic master plan to defund the war directly or by erecting new "readiness" requirements that would make the surge impractical. (Such proposals are in the air but aren't affected by this resolution.) Meanwhile, some supporters of the resolution talked as if it would not only stop the surge (which it won't) but end current U.S. involvement in Iraq.

Perhaps the most perplexing aspect of the debate was the near-universal emphasis on "supporting the troops," a mantra so malleable that it was cited by both supporters and opponents of the resolution. For Rep. Yvette D. Clarke (D-N.Y.), supporting the troops meant moving them "out of harm's way." But Rep. Elton Gallegly (R-Simi Valley) asked Democrats: "How can we say you support the troops when you don't support sending the people necessary to back them up to do the job that we sent them there to do to start with?"

Perhaps it was too much to expect eloquence or even originality in this week's debate. But what the members said was less important than what they did, which was to give vent to the American people's impatience with a war that has cost more than 3,000 American lives and will soon begin its fifth year.

BAGHDAD, Feb. 17 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice made an unannounced visit to Baghdad Saturday for meetings with U.S. and Iraqi officials, arriving in the embattled capital as the Iraqi government reported initial success in a new security effort.

Rice was expected to hold a town hall-style meeting with U.S. Embassy and military personnel in the heavily fortified Green Zone and later meet with senior Iraqi government officials, according to Lou Fintor, a spokesman for the embassy. The secretary of state, who arrived at about 11:30 a.m. Baghdad time, planned to brief reporters on her visit Saturday afternoon. No further details about her trip were immediately disclosed.

Rice, the highest-ranking U.S. official to visit Iraq since the start of the new crackdown on sectarian violence in Baghdad, made the previously unannounced stop as part of a trip to the Middle East. She was scheduled to fly to Israel this weekend for a meeting with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, and she planned to hold talks Monday in Jerusalem with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas.

Her visit came amid a relative lull in violence, which the Iraqi government held up as a promising sign that the new Baghdad security plan is off to a good start. A top U.S. military official cautioned, however, that it might be a temporary letup as militant organizations assess the new measures and gear up to fight back.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki assured President Bush Friday that the three-day-old plan "has achieved fabulous success," according to an account of the conversation released by the prime minister's office. Speaking by secure video link-up, Maliki also told Bush that officials will be "firm in dealing with any side that breaks the law, regardless" of their sect.

U.S. Maj. Gen. Joseph F. Fil Jr., the commander of the 1st Cavalry Division in Baghdad, spoke of the recent calm in more cautious terms. "We do expect there are going to be some very rough, difficult days ahead," Fil told reporters at the Pentagon Friday, speaking from Baghdad in a video link-up, according to a transcript. "This enemy knows how -- they understand lethality, and they have a thirst for blood like I have never seen anywhere before."

Meanwhile on Friday, a U.S. military spokesman said the leader of a powerful Sunni insurgent group in Iraq was not wounded in a clash with police, denying a report from Iraq's Interior Ministry. "We believe that al-Masri was not killed or wounded in any action yesterday," Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver said Friday.

A ministry spokesman said Thursday night that the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, who is known by the alias Abu Ayyub al-Masri, was injured in a shootout with police earlier that evening. The spokesman also said one of Masri's top deputies, Abu Abdullah al-Mujamie, was killed in a gun battle with police near Samarra.

A statement posted online attributed to the insurgent group denied that Masri had been killed and accused the Iraqi government of fabricating the report.

However, an al-Qaeda in Iraq leader confirmed the death of the deputy in a phone interview Thursday night. Repeated attempts to reach ministry sources Friday for further details on the reported clash were unsuccessful.

Iraqi and U.S. forces have been sweeping targeted areas of the city to root out insurgents and restore order in neighborhoods. So far, officials say, they have met little resistance.

The increased patrols are accompanied by other security measures, such as tightened controls at the borders with Syria and Iran and a crackdown on civilians carrying weapons.

To support the growing number of U.S. Army brigades in the Baghdad area, Pentagon officials said Friday that an additional division headquarters of about 1,000 soldiers will be sent three months earlier than expected. The 3rd Infantry Division headquarters, based at Fort Stewart, Ga., will deploy to Iraq in March instead of June. The soldiers will provide command and control, intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance.

The acceleration of the deployment reflects an immediate need for more support for what will be 10 U.S. brigades in Iraq's capital, officials said. There are currently eight brigades operating under the 1st Cavalry Division's leadership.

The deployment is the headquarters' third to Iraq, including the initial invasion of Baghdad in 2003. The unit's original June deployment was announced in November and was scheduled to be part of President Bush's plan to send about 17,500 additional U.S. troops to Baghdad.

Secretary Of State Rice Visits Baghdad (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, February 17, 2007

The success of a new security crackdown in Baghdad will be measured largely on how well the U.S.-backed government capitalizes on any respite of sectarian violence, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Saturday.

Rice made an unannounced visit to the Iraqi capital to check on the early days of the campaign to put down tit-for-tat violence between Sunnis and Shiites that has consumed Baghdad and contributed to the exodus of an estimated 3.8 million Iraqis from their homes.

Insurgent violence remains a concern. Rice's plane circled the airport for 30 minutes before landing because of military action in the city.

The joint U.S.-Iraqi campaign is under way as the House delivered a symbolic blow to President Bush's strategy to turn around an unpopular war that has been largely stalemated by internal Iraqi reprisal killings and terror campaigns that have little to do with U.S. forces.

"If in fact militias decide to stand down and stop killing innocent Iraqis ... that can't be a bad thing," Rice told reporters traveling with her. "But how the Iraqis use the breathing space that that might provide is what's really important."

Rice spoke with American troops and U.S. Embassy personnel before a scheduled meeting with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite. The beleaguered official is increasingly seen as unwilling or unable to deliver security, essential public services or political inclusion for minority Sunnis.

Rice is the highest-level U.S. official in Iraq since the recent start of a massive security operation in the Iraqi capital. The visit was not previously announced as part of her trip to the Middle East.

She told the U.S. forces and diplomats that their work was worthwhile in helping Iraq and securing the safety of the U.S. at the same time.

"When you see Iraqis toiling and squabbling and struggling ... remember it's not easy to build a democracy," Rice said.

Rice will get an update on the security operation begun just days ago from U.S. generals, but she told reporters that the campaign appeared to be off to a good start. The number of Iraqi civilians killed in Baghdad's sectarian violence fell drastically Friday, and officials credited the security operation begun in force just days ago.

Ten bodies were reported by the morgue in the capital, compared to an average of 40- to 50 per day common in recent months, as parts of Baghdad have descended into a lawless jumble of gang killings and sectarian payback.

While the reduction in killings was a relief, U.S. officials sounded a note of caution. Maj. Gen. Joseph Fil, commander of U.S. forces in Baghdad, said militias and insurgents have apparently decided to lie low at least during these early days of the security crackdown.

"They're watching us carefully," Fil said Friday. "There's an air of suspense."

But in the northern Iraqi city of Kirkuk a suicide car bomber rammed into a crowded market on Saturday moments after a booby-trapped vehicle exploded, killing at least nine people and injuring 60, the police said. The back-to-back blasts shattered the brief lull in major violence around the country.

Meanwhile in Washington, the House of Representatives on Friday passed a nonbinding resolution, 246-182, voicing opposition to Bush's decision to send 21,500 additional troops into Iraq. The Senate was to meet in a rare Saturday session to consider a similar measure.

Rice Grilled On Extra Funding Sought For Iraq, Afghanistan (WP)

By Karen Deyoung, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

Skeptical lawmakers yesterday demanded a detailed accounting of how Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice plans to spend $6 billion in supplemental funds that the administration has asked for the State Department this year, much of it for Iraq and Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0134067

"I think you've got a lot of explaining to do," Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.) told Rice at a hearing of the House Appropriations subcommittee on state and foreign operations. "A huge majority of the funds in the supplemental are for military, not political or economic or reconstructive, purposes."

Both Republicans and Democrats asked pointed questions about the rising cost of efforts that seem to be failing, despite newly announced U.S. strategies for both countries. Even as the administration has asked for more money, Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.) told Rice, it ought to increase its diplomatic engagement with Iraq's neighbors in the Middle East.

"I plead with you, I beg of you," Wolf said, "if we're going to ask a young man or woman in our military to go to Iraq three different times, it's not asking too much . . . to send somebody to engage with regard to the Syrians."

Rice replied: "We don't have an ideological problem with talking to Syria." But, she said, "there just isn't any evidence that they're trying to change their behavior."

The supplemental funding is in addition to more than $140 billion in emergency money that President Bush has requested, primarily to fund new military operations. In a Thursday address, he urged Congress to provide $11.8 billion to accelerate military and police training and reconstruction in Afghanistan, where he said al-Qaeda and the Taliban are launching new offensives after having been "driven from power" by U.S. forces in 2001.

In a video posted on the Internet yesterday, al-Qaeda appeared to ridicule Bush's latest remarks. "Bush raved in his latest speech . . . that he has deprived al-Qaeda of a safe haven in Afghanistan," said a voice attributed to and read over a photograph of Osama bin Laden's deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri. "The entire world bears witness to his barefaced lie."

The 24-minute video, marked as a product of al-Qaeda's video arm and made available and translated by the Alexandria-based analysis firm IntelCenter, is the longest and most sophisticated to date from Afghanistan. After Zawahiri's introduction, it purports to document an undated mujaheddin attack on a U.S. military encampment in Afghanistan. IntelCenter said it thinks the voice-over narration was provided by Adam Gadahn, the California native who has been indicted in absentia on a charge of treason for alleged al-Qaeda activities.

Intelligence and military officials in Washington did not dispute that the video is an al-Qaeda product. But they noted that it is not a recent recording, because the fighters are shown in warm-weather clothing amid greenery.

Regarding the claimed military operation, a Pentagon official said that "no one has been able to verify what they're talking about." The official said that U.S. and NATO forces in Afghanistan have not lost any direct engagements with Taliban or al-Qaeda forces. He said it is possible that the scenes of fighters preparing for battle and firing weapons may have been juxtaposed with those of a deserted compound once occupied by the U.S. military.

In yesterday's hearing, Rice acknowledged the poor results in U.S. efforts to stem Afghan opium production, which reached record levels last year.

"I have to say this is a case where priority and success actually are not linked," she said in response to a question from Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.). "We have put enormous effort into this, and it's just a tough problem to crack."

"Yeah, but it's not good enough," Lewis replied. He has heard a lot about various U.S. counternarcotics programs, he said, "but there have been no results."

Panel members sharply questioned both the supplemental budget and the other funding requests, including a planned $250 million cash payment to the government of Lebanon, $86 million requested for security assistance for Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, and more than $500 million being spent for a new U.S. Embassy in Baghdad.

Rice said a major portion of the Iraq money would fund the expanded Provincial Reconstruction Teams. The teams, led by U.S. diplomats, are located in Baghdad neighborhoods and elsewhere in the country, where they assist in developing the Iraqi economy and governance.

The teams, embedded with U.S. military units, are expected to "bring about 40,000 jobs [to] critical areas" in Iraq, Rice said. Iraqi government money, she said, would pay for additional job creation.

The Iraqi expenditure of $10 billion in reconstruction and job-creation funds was one of the "benchmarks" for the Baghdad government that Bush set when he announced his new strategy last month. Iraq has a $12.5 billion surplus of previously budgeted but unspent funds.

DOJ_NMG_0134068

Rice pledged yesterday that the administration will see to it that Iraq's Shiite-dominated government spends the money, with at least $2 billion going to areas outside the capital. In White House remarks yesterday, after a conversation with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, Bush said that Maliki has already "met that benchmark" by again budgeting the money.

Maliki Hails Lull In Violence (WP)

BAGHDAD, Feb. 16 -- The relative lull in violence is a promising sign that the Baghdad security plan is off to a good start, the Iraqi prime minister said yesterday, while a top U.S. military official cautioned that it might be a temporary letup as militant organizations assess the new measures and gear up to fight back.

Baghdad Plan Is A "Success," Iraq Prime Minister Tells Bush (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 16 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki told President Bush on Friday that the increased effort to provide security in Baghdad had gone exceedingly well so far, Mr. Maliki's office said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0134069

The two spoke via video link and, according the statement, Mr. Maliki said, “The security plan has been a dazzling success during its first days.”

Across Baghdad, there were signs of the heightened troop presence, as cars were searched at new checkpoints and raids resulted in the arrest of at least 35 people, according to Iraqi officials.

Maj. Gen. Joseph F. Fil Jr., commander of the First Cavalry Division in Baghdad, told reporters on Friday that there had been a substantial reduction in violence in the past 48 hours, which he attributed both to the increased troop presence and the decision by Sunni and Shiite militants to keep a low profile.

“They’re watching us carefully,” he said. “There’s an air of suspense throughout the city. We believe, there’s no question about it, that many of these extremists are laying low and watching to see what it is we do and how we do it. How long that will last, we don’t know.”

American military officers also disputed Iraqi reports that the commander of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, Abu Ayyub al-Masri, was wounded in recent fighting, saying they have seen no evidence to support the claim.

Still, in an interview on Friday, Iraq’s Interior Ministry spokesman, Gen. Abdul Kareem Khalaf, continued to maintain that Mr. Masri had been wounded in fighting near Balad, north of Baghdad. He said Mr. Masri was wounded Thursday afternoon, then managed to flee. But two other Iraqi officials contradicted that account.

In Hilla, south of Baghdad, the Iraqi security forces arrested 34 members of a messianic Shiite splinter group that just three weeks ago tried to overthrow the Shiite clerical hierarchy in Najaf.

In heavy fighting in January, hundreds of members of the group, called the Soldiers of Heaven, were killed as American forces joined the Iraqis in a daylong battle in which an American attack helicopter was shot down.

Jury Remains Out On Baghdad Crackdown (HC/AP)

By Brian Murphy,

Houston Chronicle/AP, February 17, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq — As a military offensive seeks to bring Baghdad from the brink of anarchy, a top Iraqi security officer tried Friday to measure its early stages using the grim logic of a place with daily bloodshed: by counting the bodies arriving at the morgue. A total of 10 corpses were collected off the streets — apparently all victims of the city's lawless jumble of gang justice and sectarian payback. The daily body tally recently has often been 40 or more, excluding major bombings, said Brig. Gen. Qassim Moussawi.

This was the basis for an upbeat message by Moussawi, a spokesman for the joint U.S.-Iraqi security sweep that began this week and has so far faced limited resistance. But his American counterparts remain much more guarded.

"I would say that it is way too early to establish any trends," said Lt. Col. Chris Garver, a U.S. military spokesman. "We've just started to focus our operations. We have months to go to see if we are going to succeed or not."

Maj. Gen. Joseph Fil, commander of U.S. forces in Baghdad, attributed the reduction in violence not only to the increased security presence but also to an apparent decision by the militias and insurgents to lay low for a while.

"But make no mistake, we do not believe ... that's going to continue, and we do expect there are going to be some very rough, difficult days ahead," Fil said. "And this enemy knows how — they understand lethality and they have a thirst for blood like I have never seen anywhere before."

The contrasting outlooks cut across the entire mission, dubbed Operation Law and Order, which seeks to reclaim the streets. Powerful militias and freelance vigilantes have carved Baghdad into fiefdoms and made even daily errands a gamble that could end with a car bombing or gunfire.

The Iraqis are eager to show clear progress to boost the leadership of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. U.S. commanders, however, are approaching the neighbor-by-neighbor sweep as a methodical campaign without quick victories — learning from past mistakes of pouring through an area, only to find that militiamen simply went underground and returned after American forces left.

"We are just at the beginning stages," reminded Garver.

But evidence of the offensive against militants appeared around the country.

DOJ_NMG_0134070

Borders to Iran and Syria have been temporarily sealed in attempts to foil suspected supply routes. In Diyala province northeast of Baghdad, U.S. forces are under sharply escalating attacks from Sunni Muslim insurgents — suggesting that some groups have shifted from Baghdad to other areas to sidestep the crackdown in the capital.

U.S. military officials said demolition experts destroyed a bomb-making factory they linked to the al-Qaida in Iraq faction in Salman Pak, just southwest of Baghdad. The statement said the workshop contained about 1,000 pounds of explosives.

But doubt was cast on another reported blow to al-Qaida in Iraq.

The Interior Ministry said that leader Abu Hamza al-Muhajir, also known as Abu Ayyub al-Masri, was wounded and an aide killed Thursday in a clash with Iraqi forces near Balad, north of Baghdad.

Garver, the U.S. military spokesman, later said the Pentagon had no information that al-Masri was hit. The al-Masri deputy reported killed, identified as Abu Abdullah al-Majemaai, was detained last week and remains in jail, said an Iraqi army officer, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to disclose the information.

In a statement posted on an Islamic militant Web site on Friday, the al-Qaida-affilated Islamic State of Iraq purportedly denied that al-Masri was wounded. It said the Iraqi government was "making up such news that has been denied even by their masters, the Americans."

Iraqi security officials also said 34 armed men belonging to a messianic Shiite cult were detained near Hillah, about 60 miles south of Baghdad.

The Soldiers of Heaven, or Jund al-Samaa, cult was involved in a fierce gunbattle last month with Iraqi forces who accused it of planning to kill Shiite clerics and others in a bid to force the return of the "Hidden Imam" — a descendant of the Prophet Muhammad who disappeared as a child in the 9th century. Shiites believe he will return one day to bring justice.

In mosques Friday, some Muslim clerics supported the general goals of the military push to calm Baghdad. But others used the weekly prayers to denounce the American troop buildup in Baghdad.

Political leaders, too, quarreled over the widening security sweeps — reflecting starkly opposing perspectives among Iraq's two Muslim groups.

The majority Shiites have generally favored the campaign as a way to neutralize Sunni militant groups, blamed for waves of recent car bombings. Sunnis — who enjoyed a privileged position under Saddam Hussein — believe Shiite factions will use the military push to try to cement controls of key areas in Baghdad.

Sunni lawmaker Dhafir Al-Ani said on Al-Arabiya television that the Baghdad security plan had lost the "element of surprise" because it was announced long in advance, giving Shiite militiamen time to flee to Iran. He also claimed Shiite militias had provided security forces with some of the names on their wanted list.

But a Shiite lawmaker, Hadi Al-Amiri, backed the U.S.-Iraqi crackdown as a way to "target all those who cause the Iraqi bloodshed."

In Geneva, the International Organization for Migration offered a bleak picture of Iraqis trying to escape the violence and insecurity. Nearly 18,000 people have left their homes in the past three weeks in central and southern Iraq — some fleeing for the borders and others taking shelter in makeshift housing.

As many as 1 million Iraqis could flee their homes this year unless the unrest is brought under control, said a report by the 120-nation agency. An estimated 1.4 million Iraqis have already left their homes.

"The numbers of people that are being displaced are increasing every day," said Jemini Pandya, a spokeswoman for the group. "The security situation is not improving. It's not changing."

In other developments:

_ The Pentagon said it is sending an Army division headquarters staff of about 1,000 soldiers to Baghdad three months ahead of schedule, a move intended to improve the Army's ability to command and control the thousands of extra combat troops that President Bush has ordered to Iraq.

_ Iraq's Sunni vice president, Tariq al-Hashemi, told the Arabic language daily Al-Hayat that Sunni insurgents who are "honorable and genuine" must be given the chance to join the political process now that the United States is eager to pull its troops from Iraq. He said U.S. and Iraqi representatives must negotiate "with the participation of the resistance" after "America has failed to run the country."

DOJ_NMG_0134071

_ On Saturday, two explosions tore through a crowded market area in the northern city of Kirkuk, killing at least five people and injuring 17, police said. The first blast came from a car rigged with explosives and was followed by a suicide attacker who drove a bomb-laden car into a busy area, which included a bus depot in a mostly Kurdish district of the city, authorities said. The blasts also damaged about 20 shops.

Sadr Commanders Flee Crackdown In Iraq (FT)

By Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, February 17, 2007

Iraqi officials on Friday reported an "exodus" of commanders from the Shia Mahdi army, as armed groups seek to protect themselves from the US military crackdown in Baghdad and preserve their organisations.

Mystery has swirled over the whereabouts of Moqtada al-Sadr, the fiery cleric whose Mahdi army is accused by the US of a leading role in the sectarian violence that has devastated the capital.

Mr Sadr has always kept a low profile, fearing he might be captured or killed by US troops. US officials say he has fled Iraq and is hiding in Iran. His aides denounce the US assertions and say he remains in his country.

Jalal Talabani, the Iraqi president, late on Thursday said Mr Sadr, whose group is a partner in the governing Shia coalition, had ordered his commanders to leave Iraq to facilitate the US operation in the city.

A senior Iraqi official told the FT on Friday that there has been an "exodus" of commanders over recent days, and that Mr Sadr is likely to have travelled to Iran, though he had no idea how long he would stay there. Iranian officials say they have no comment on Mr Sadr's whereabouts.

"All groups that are armed and those who are suspected of violence, whether from Mahdi or other organisations, saw that the government and the US were serious about the security plan and that everyone would be targeted," said the official. "They fled, in a cautious attempt on their part to prevent capture."

The senior official denied that the government had helped co-ordinate the "exodus" or asked Mahdi commanders with links to Iran to move out of Iraq for their own protection.

But the move by Mahdi commanders has highlighted the dilemma facing the Iraqi government as it seeks to balance support for the US operations with pressure from domestic coalition partners whom it relies upon for political backing.

It is not clear how long the Mahdi commanders will stay away. In previous security crackdowns in the capital, militias and Sunni insurgents faded but re-appeared when US forces retreated.

Iraqi officials say the return depends on the US and the government's ability to establish their authority in Baghdad. "If we're able to establish government authority, it will be more difficult for them to re-establish their own power on the ground," said the senior government official.

One Shia Iraqi political adviser said the departure of Mahdi commanders would facilitate the military crackdown on the Sunni insurgents. By the time the commanders come back the insurgents may have been sufficiently weakened, reducing the need for Shia militias to fight a sectarian war, he suggested.

The retreat of the Mahdi commanders comes as Iran adopts a cautious approach to the intensifying US pressure against its alleged involvement in Iraqi violence, amid growing concern in Tehran that Washington could be preparing for direct military action against the Islamic republic.

The relationship between the Mahdi army and Iran has been at the centre of US-Iranian tensions. The US insists elements in Tehran have provided the militia with sophisticated explosives. Iran denies the allegations.

Sunni Insurgents Carrying Fight North Out Of Baghdad (HC/AP)

By Lauren Frayer,

Houston Chronicle/AP, February 17, 2007

BAQOUBA, IRAQ — Sunni insurgents have been streaming out of Baghdad to escape the security crackdown, carrying the fight to neighboring Diyala province where direct fire attacks on Americans have nearly doubled since last summer, U.S. soldiers say.

DOJ_NMG_0134072

That has led to sharp fighting only 35 miles north of the capital in a province known as "Little Iraq" because of its near-equal mix of Sunni and Shiite Arabs as well as Kurds. At stake is a strategic region that extends from the northeastern gates of Baghdad to the Iranian border.

"I was here in 2004 and I don't remember them ever attacking tanks in open daylight, but now that's exactly what they're doing," said Capt. Paul Carlock, 31, of Chattanooga, Tenn., a company commander in the Army's 1st Battalion, 12th Cavalry Regiment. "There's a big Sunni influx here, and in the last month or so it's been pretty violent."

Some U.S. officers suspect the advance publicity for the Baghdad security plan may have encouraged extremists — both Sunnis and Shiites — to flee the capital for surrounding provinces, including Diyala, where fewer U.S. troops are stationed.

Even before President Bush announced last month that he was sending in 21,500 more soldiers, mostly to Baghdad, violence had been steadily decreasing in the capital and increasing in Diyala.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki told President Bush that the increased effort to provide security in Baghdad had gone exceedingly well so far.

The two spoke Friday via video link and al-Maliki said, "The security plan has been a dazzling success during its first days." A total of only 10 corpses were collected Thursday off Baghdad streets. The daily body tally has often been 40 or more.

Maj. Gen. Joseph Fil, commander of U.S. forces in Baghdad, attributed the reduction in Baghdad violence not only to the increased security presence but also to an apparent decision by the militias and insurgents to lay low for a while.

"But make no mistake, we do not believe ... that's going to continue, and we do expect there are going to be some very rough, difficult days ahead," Fil said. "And this enemy knows how — they understand lethality and they have a thirst for blood like I have never seen anywhere before."

On Thursday, a rooftop sniper fired on members of the 12th Cavalry as they patrolled a suburb of Baqouba with Iraqi soldiers. Shots rang out for about 15 minutes until a Bradley Fighting Vehicle arrived and drove off the attackers.

Gates Follows Rumsfeld With A Less Combative Case For The Defence (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, February 17, 2007

Before Robert Gates held his first Pentagon press conference as defence secretary, reporters were curious how his modus operandi would differ from Donald Rumsfeld's, his predecessor. When he opened with something Mr Rumsfeld rarely gave - an apology - it was clear a new era had dawned.

Sitting between reporters at a large table, Mr Gates apologised for the crowded room and for holding the briefing on Friday afternoon, before explaining that he would prefer "a more informal setting than the dais and the big sign behind me".

Although he returned to the Pentagon briefing room - where Mr Rumsfeld enjoyed lecturing reporters from the podium - for his second "round table", Mr Gates sat at a small table, prompting a joke that he resembled an anchor man for the Pentagon television channel.

Asked if he was trying to distinguish himself from the "acknowledged master of the Pentagon briefing", Mr Gates, who as director of the Central Intelligence Agency, had few public dealings with the media, said he would "never be in that category".

He added that he was not making a statement about the past. But he appeared to do just that when he explained his preference for "more of a conversation than a one-way means of communication".

Mr Rumsfeld, who might best be described as charismatically antagonistic, revelled in answering not the question posed to him but the question he wanted to be asked.

Travelling to Europe last week, Mr Gates seemed almost shy in comparison. But when interrogated in Seville about the evident contrast with Mr Rumsfeld, he warmed up, saying he found the questioning "amusing". "As an old Kremlinologist, it shouldn't surprise me," he said.

Then he closed by saying that people could judge for themselves after his speech to a security conference in Munich whether he would take "a different path than secretary Rumsfeld".

He did. Mr Rumsfeld ruffled many feathers by splitting US allies into "old Europe" and "new Europe".

DOJ_NMG_0134073

Remarking in Munich that European countries had often been pigeonholed into categories - the "free world" versus the "Iron Curtain" - Mr Gates drew guffaws when he said: "Some have even spoken in terms of 'old' Europe versus 'new'."

But in his less abrasive manner, he also delivered a Rumsfeld-like message in reminding the mostly European audience Nato was a "military alliance" and not a "social club".

Back in the Pentagon press room on Thursday, Mr Gates maintained his non-combative style. Asked about recent comments by a US general that the trail for Osama bin Laden had "gone cold", Mr Gates would reply only that the al-Qaeda leader should "keep looking over [his] shoulder".

Responding to a similar question in 2001, Mr Rumsfeld gave the New York Times a dose of the typically entertaining, yet infuriatingly evasive, answers that ultimately reduced the news value of his press conferences. "If you're chasing the chicken around the chicken yard and you don't have him yet and the question is, 'how close are you?' the answer is, 'it's tough to characterise because there's lots of zigs and zags'."

In a sign Mr Gates may be seeing his honeymoon draw to a close, he came under pressure over recent contradictory statements by members of the military and Bush administration officials about the extent to which top Iranian officials had approved attacks on US solders in Iraq.

Ultimately, said Larry Di Rita, the former Pentagon spokesman, Mr Gates would probably have to deal with the "inescapably confrontational" nature of Washington press conferences. "[But] if secretary Gates wants to find ways even on the margins to take some of that edge out, more power to him," he said.

Some In Surge To Deploy Earlier (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, February 17, 2007

The Pentagon said yesterday it is sending an Army division headquarters staff of about 1,000 soldiers to Baghdad three months ahead of schedule, a move intended to improve the Army's ability to command and control the thousands of extra combat troops that President Bush has ordered to Iraq.

The 3rd Infantry Division headquarters staff will deploy from Fort Stewart, Ga., next month -- about three months earlier than planned, according to an Army statement. It said family members have been notified of the change.

It is the 3rd Infantry's third deployment to Iraq. The first was during the initial invasion in 2003.

The decision to send them early is related to Bush's decision to deploy an extra five Army brigades -- about 17,500 soldiers -- to Baghdad as part of the president's new approach to stabilizing the country amid rising sectarian violence.

There currently is just one Army division headquarters staff in Baghdad -- the 1st Cavalry Division. That unit's commander, Maj. Gen. Joseph Fil, Jr., told Pentagon reporters by video teleconference from Baghdad that he saw no need for another division headquarters staff, but he said the matter was being studied.

"I've told my bosses that it's just fine, that we do not have a command-and-control issue right now," he said.

Gen. Fil also said he has requested an unspecified number of extra attack helicopters and combat engineers, and that U.S. and U.S.-trained Iraqi army troops face a determined and ruthless foe in the capital region.

"They have a thirst for blood like I have never seen anywhere before," Gen. Fil said.

A division headquarters normally would command no more than about five brigades. Gen. Fil's division currently has eight ground combat brigades operating with it, including a brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division, which was the first of the five extra brigades under Mr. Bush's plan to arrive in Baghdad. It got there in January.

The next to arrive, the 4th Brigade, 1st Infantry Division, from Fort Riley, Kan., is now in Kuwait conducting its final training before heading to Baghdad later this month. The three other brigades -- including two from the 3rd Infantry Division -- are scheduled to go between March and May.

Since Mr. Bush's announcement of the troop buildup on Jan. 10, when he said 17,500 more soldiers would go to Baghdad and about 4,000 more Marines would go to western Anbar province, there has been controversy over the actual size of the buildup.

DOJ_NMG_0134074

The Congressional Budget Office, a nonpartisan arm of Congress, said recently that the Pentagon might need to send 15,000 to 28,000 combat support and combat service support troops to Iraq, in addition to the 21,500 combat troops. But Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates has said that estimate grossly exaggerates the need for support forces.

Al Qaeda's Outrages Swing Sunnis To U.S. (WT)

By Pamela Hess, United Press International

The Washington Times, February 17, 2007

RAMADI, Iraq -- Sunni tribes in troubled Anbar province have begun working closely with U.S. and government forces, contributing nearly 2,400 men to the police department and 1,600 to a newly organized tribal security force, authorities say.

U.S. troops are training and equipping the new tribal forces, which are called Emergency Response Units (ERUs), and are charged with defending the areas where they live, according to the local U.S. commander.

By a U.S. count, 12 of the Ramadi area's 21 tribes are cooperating in the security effort, six are considered neutral, and three are actively hostile. That is almost the reverse of the tribal posture last June, when three were cooperative and 12 were hostile.

For nearly four years, the tribes around Ramadi survived by playing both sides, working with U.S. forces when it suited them, while at the same time helping or tolerating Sunni insurgent groups and al Qaeda in Iraq -- the terrorist organization once led by Jordanian Abu Musab Zarqawi.

That changed in August, according to U.S. Army Col. Sean MacFarland, commander of the 1st Brigade Combat Team, 1st Armored Division, which has been responsible for security operations in Ramadi since June.

Al Qaeda in Iraq -- which has also turned its intimidation tactics on the tribal leaders -- kidnapped and killed Sheik Khalid of the Albu Ali Jassim tribe and left his body where it could not be found, preventing the family from burying him within 24 hours as prescribed by Muslim tradition.

"Al Qaeda overplayed its hand," Col. MacFarland said at his headquarters, a dusty base on the west side of Ramadi.

At a meeting that month, several sheiks drew up an 11-point declaration vowing to fight al Qaeda, within the rule of law, and declaring solidarity with coalition and government security forces. It is a movement referred to by the tribes as "the Awakening."

Al Qaeda "assassinated a lot of the sheiks," said Sheik Ahmed Abureeshah, 41, whose brother, Sheik Sitar, is the driving force behind the initiative. "They killed my father. They killed three of my brothers. They killed 14 other sheiks from different tribes. ...

"Then we met the sheiks of the tribe one after one, and we decided that we must put our hands together and fight to defeat these criminals."

The tribes sent hundreds of young men to join the police -- more than 1,000 in December and more than that last month, a record recruiting effort for the province.

The men were assigned to police stations in their own tribes' neighborhoods, giving the tribes a vested interest in their success and contributing to unusually high rates of policemen turning up for work. Others were organized into the ERUs, which operate in the countryside while the police remain in the cities.

Improved security, in turn, made it possible for the brigade to pour in reconstruction money, enabling some $3 million in projects to be undertaken.

As the benefits of cooperation became evident, "the tribes began flipping, like a domino effect," Col. MacFarland said. "Almost every week, we get another sheik knocking on our door."

Ramadi remains dangerous for Americans -- Col. MacFarland's brigade has lost 85 troops in the area -- but the improvement in security is measurable.

From July 2006 to January 2007, the daily average number of attacks fell by 38 percent and roadside bomb attacks dropped by 57 percent to an 18-month low.

The roadside bombs also are getting smaller and less complex, enabling the brigade and the Iraqi police to find more than 80 percent of improvised explosive devices before they detonate.

DOJ_NMG_0134075

It is "a very significant indicator that this potent weapon system has become less effective in Ramadi," Col. MacFarland said.

More important to the colonel, attacks are occurring farther from the town center and from the main road -- suggesting that residents are not tolerating insurgents the way they once did, and are tipping off police to suspicious activities.

Jury Remains Out On Baghdad Crackdown (AP)

By Brian Murphy, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 17, 2007

As a military offensive seeks to bring Baghdad from the brink of anarchy, a top Iraqi security officer tried Friday to measure its early stages using the grim logic of a place with daily bloodshed: by counting the bodies arriving at the morgue. A total of 10 corpses were collected off the streets — apparently all victims of the city's lawless jumble of gang justice and sectarian payback. The daily body tally recently has often been 40 or more, excluding major bombings, said Brig. Gen. Qassim Moussawi.

This was the basis for an upbeat message by Moussawi, a spokesman for the joint U.S.-Iraqi security sweep that began this week and has so far faced limited resistance. But his American counterparts remain much more guarded.

"I would say that it is way too early to establish any trends," said Lt. Col. Chris Garver, a U.S. military spokesman. "We've just started to focus our operations. We have months to go to see if we are going to succeed or not."

Maj. Gen. Joseph Fil, commander of U.S. forces in Baghdad, attributed the reduction in violence not only to the increased security presence but also to an apparent decision by the militias and insurgents to lay low for a while.

"But make no mistake, we do not believe ... that's going to continue, and we do expect there are going to be some very rough, difficult days ahead," Fil said. "And this enemy knows how — they understand lethality and they have a thirst for blood like I have never seen anywhere before."

The contrasting outlooks cut across the entire mission, dubbed Operation Law and Order, which seeks to reclaim the streets. Powerful militias and freelance vigilantes have carved Baghdad into fiefdoms and made even daily errands a gamble that could end with a car bombing or gunfire.

The Iraqis are eager to show clear progress to boost the leadership of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. U.S. commanders, however, are approaching the neighbor-by-neighbor sweep as a methodical campaign without quick victories — learning from past mistakes of pouring through an area, only to find that militiamen simply went underground and returned after American forces left.

"We are just at the beginning stages," reminded Garver.

But evidence of the offensive against militants appeared around the country.

Borders to Iran and Syria have been temporarily sealed in attempts to foil suspected supply routes. In Diyala province northeast of Baghdad, U.S. forces are under sharply escalating attacks from Sunni Muslim insurgents — suggesting that some groups have shifted from Baghdad to other areas to sidestep the crackdown in the capital.

U.S. military officials said demolition experts destroyed a bomb-making factory they linked to the al-Qaida in Iraq faction in Salman Pak, just southwest of Baghdad. The statement said the workshop contained about 1,000 pounds of explosives.

But doubt was cast on another reported blow to al-Qaida in Iraq.

The Interior Ministry said that leader Abu Hamza al-Muhajir, also known as Abu Ayyub al-Masri, was wounded and an aide killed Thursday in a clash with Iraqi forces near Balad, north of Baghdad.

Garver, the U.S. military spokesman, later said the Pentagon had no information that al-Masri was hit. The al-Masri deputy reported killed, identified as Abu Abdullah al-Majemaai, was detained last week and remains in jail, said an Iraqi army officer, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to disclose the information.

In a statement posted on an Islamic militant Web site on Friday, the al-Qaida-affilated Islamic State of Iraq purportedly denied that al-Masri was wounded. It said the Iraqi government was "making up such news that has been denied even by their masters, the Americans."

Iraqi security officials also said 34 armed men belonging to a messianic Shiite cult were detained near Hillah, about 60 miles south of Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0134076

The Soldiers of Heaven, or Jund al-Samaa, cult was involved in a fierce gunbattle last month with Iraqi forces who accused it of planning to kill Shiite clerics and others in a bid to force the return of the "Hidden Imam" — a descendant of the Prophet Muhammad who disappeared as a child in the 9th century. Shiites believe he will return one day to bring justice.

In mosques Friday, some Muslim clerics supported the general goals of the military push to calm Baghdad. But others used the weekly prayers to denounce the American troop buildup in Baghdad.

Political leaders, too, quarreled over the widening security sweeps — reflecting starkly opposing perspectives among Iraq's two Muslim groups.

The majority Shiites have generally favored the campaign as a way to neutralize Sunni militant groups, blamed for waves of recent car bombings. Sunnis — who enjoyed a privileged position under Saddam Hussein — believe Shiite factions will use the military push to try to cement controls of key areas in Baghdad.

Sunni lawmaker Dhafir Al-Ani said on Al-Arabiya television that the Baghdad security plan had lost the "element of surprise" because it was announced long in advance, giving Shiite militiamen time to flee to Iran. He also claimed Shiite militias had provided security forces with some of the names on their wanted list.

But a Shiite lawmaker, Hadi Al-Amiri, backed the U.S.-Iraqi crackdown as a way to "target all those who cause the Iraqi bloodshed."

In Geneva, the International Organization for Migration offered a bleak picture of Iraqis trying to escape the violence and insecurity. Nearly 18,000 people have left their homes in the past three weeks in central and southern Iraq — some fleeing for the borders and others taking shelter in makeshift housing.

As many as 1 million Iraqis could flee their homes this year unless the unrest is brought under control, said a report by the 120-nation agency. An estimated 1.4 million Iraqis have already left their homes.

"The numbers of people that are being displaced are increasing every day," said Jemini Pandya, a spokeswoman for the group. "The security situation is not improving. It's not changing."

In other developments:

• The Pentagon said it is sending an Army division headquarters staff of about 1,000 soldiers to Baghdad three months ahead of schedule, a move intended to improve the Army's ability to command and control the thousands of extra combat troops that President Bush has ordered to Iraq.

• Iraq's Sunni vice president, Tariq al-Hashemi, told the Arabic language daily Al-Hayat that Sunni insurgents who are "honorable and genuine" must be given the chance to join the political process now that the United States is eager to pull its troops from Iraq. He said U.S. and Iraqi representatives must negotiate "with the participation of the resistance" after "America has failed to run the country."

Iranian Force, Focus Of U.S., Still A Mystery (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 16 — Like so much else about the Iranian state, the Quds Force, which conducts overseas operations for Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps, remains remarkably mysterious even to those who closely study the country.

The Quds Force is under intense scrutiny by American intelligence agencies because it is suspected of supplying sophisticated explosives to Iraqi militants. Among those detained in recent American raids on Iranian offices in Iraq were several Iranians identified by the United States military as Quds operatives, including a diplomat said to be the No. 2 official in the Quds Force.

Questions about what exactly Quds Force officers have done and whether they acted at the direction of the Iranian leadership have taken on particular urgency as the Bush administration sends more troops to damp the violence in Baghdad. But the competing power centers inside the Iranian government, and the intense secrecy that obscures decision making, make answers elusive.

DOJ_NMG_0134077

"We know that the Quds Force is involved," Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates told reporters on Thursday. "We know the Quds Force is a paramilitary arm of the I.R.G.C.," he added, using the abbreviation for the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps.

"So we assume that the leadership of the I.R.G.C. knows about this," Mr. Gates said. "Whether or not more senior political leaders in Iran know about it, we don't know."

Most independent experts say it is only logical to assume that Iran deployed large numbers of operatives in Iraq as soon as Saddam Hussein was ousted in 2003. Many of Iraq's Shiite clerics, politicians and militia leaders have close ties to Iran, where some spent years in exile while Mr. Hussein and the Sunnis of his Baath Party ruled Iraq.

And the past role of the Quds Force as the long arm of the Islamic revolution abroad, performing a mix of military, intelligence and training operations, has been widely reported in past conflicts like those in Lebanon and Bosnia. Its name, the Arabic word for Jerusalem, symbolizes the Iranian government's commitment to driving Israelis out of the occupied Palestinian territories.

The Quds Force "is the handpicked elite of an already elite ideological army," said Abbas Milani, director of Iranian studies at Stanford University.

As part of the Revolutionary Guard, the force officially answers to the supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, and not the Iranian president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, though Mr. Ahmadinejad is believed to have personal ties to many senior guard officials.

But the Quds Force is cloaked in secrecy inside Iran and is the subject of considerable guesswork from scholars in the United States, who in interviews this week offered estimates of its size ranging from 3,000 to 50,000 men. The true number, along with details of the strength and budget of the entire Revolutionary Guard, is hidden even from the Iranian Parliament, said Mr. Milani, according to legislators he has spoken with.

Some specialists even question whether the Quds Force exists as a formal unit clearly delineated from the rest of the Revolutionary Guard.

"It could be that anyone with an intelligence role in the Revolutionary Guard is just called Quds," said Vali R. Nasr, who studies Iran and political Islam at the Naval Postgraduate School.

Whether properly identified as part of the Quds Force or not, members of the Revolutionary Guard mobilized intelligence and paramilitary agents in Lebanon in the 1980s, where they trained the Shiite militia Hezbollah; in Afghanistan, during the anti-Soviet jihad in the 1980s and episodically since then; in the former Yugoslavia, supporting the Bosnian Muslims against Serbian forces; and in other trouble spots.

The guard has also been accused of supporting terrorist attacks outside Iran, notably the 1996 truck bomb attack on the Khobar Towers complex in Saudi Arabia that killed 19 American service members. In December, a federal judge ruled that the government of Iran bore responsibility for the Khobar Towers attack and ordered Tehran to pay survivors of those killed more than $253 million.

The Revolutionary Guard was created after the Islamic revolution that overthrew the shah in 1979. The government of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini did not trust the existing Iranian military, where support for the monarchy remained strong. The new rulers established the guard as a parallel military force, recruited from among the revolution's most devout religious supporters.

In the past 25 years, the Revolutionary Guard, whose strength is estimated by Western specialists at 125,000 to 300,000, has gradually evolved into more of a conventional military and has become deeply involved in lucrative business enterprises inside and outside Iran. But all along, it has conducted overseas operations, both covert and overt, often under the Quds Force name.

The actions of the Quds Force are not necessarily ordered by Ayatollah Khamenei, and the supreme leader may not even get reports of all its actions, said Hooshang Amirahmadi, director of the Center for Middle Eastern Studies at Rutgers University. "The Iranian government is a very loose grouping of power centers," blurring lines of control and authority, he said.

There have been past instances of actions by rogue intelligence officers that the Iranian government has disavowed. In 1999, for example, Iran's Intelligence Ministry blamed rogue officers for the killings of five prominent critics of the government's conservative wing.

DOJ_NMG_0134078

But Mr. Amirahmadi said he did not think the Iranian leadership should be allowed to sidestep responsibility for actions by its operatives in Iraq. "The Bush administration can't say, 'We have a C.I.A., but we don't control it,' " he said, adding that the same rules should apply to Tehran.

Though the American allegations about the Quds Force have received attention from administration officials and the media only in recent weeks, they are not new. On several occasions over the last year, senior Pentagon officials have spoken publicly about the Iranian role in Iraq.

More recently, Bush administration officials have engaged in a balancing act, engaging in harsher rhetoric about Iranian actions and offering more evidence on sophisticated improvised explosive devices, which they say are traceable to Iran, but vehemently denying they have any plans to go to war against the country.

But by all accounts, the imperfect nature of American intelligence agencies' reporting on Iran makes certain conclusions difficult to reach. "I just don't think we have a very acute understanding of the internal workings of the regime in Iran," said Patrick Clawson, an Iran expert at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

Businessman Sentenced In Iraq Scheme (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

An American businessman whose companies made more than $8 million in Iraq reconstruction money through a gifts-for-contracts scheme was sentenced to 46 months in prison. The businessman, Philip H. Bloom, who has lived in Romania for many years, pleaded guilty last year to bribery and conspiracy to commit money laundering. Mr. Bloom admitted bribing military personnel with jewelry, computers, cigars and sexual favors. Three Army Reserve officers were indicted last week as part of the case; the officers, Col. Curtis G. Whiteford of Utah, Lt. Col. Debra M. Harrison of New Jersey and Lt. Col. Michael B. Wheeler of Wisconsin, were accused of steering contracts to Mr. Bloom from 2003 to 2005.

Missing In Baghdad: My Father (WSJ)

By Sarmad Ali

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

About 5 o'clock on a mid-December morning, I was awakened by a call from my brother in Iraq. "Dad is missing," he said. He was upset and some of his anger spilled out at me: "You should be here," he shouted. "You don't seem to care."

My father had left home in Baghdad that morning to go to the auto-repair shop across town where he works. Fifteen minutes after he left, car bombs exploded on his route to work and he hasn't been seen since.

His disappearance set off a desperate search by my family through the netherworld of war-torn Baghdad. It also put me in the agonizing position of trying to help my family with the violent dislocations of civil war -- over the phone, from thousands of miles away. I'm the oldest son and have been studying and working in New York for more than two years. Since my father vanished, my three grown siblings and my mother have looked to me as the head of the family.

Every time I hear about a bomb going off, I brace myself for the worst possible news. Last February, my entire family went missing for two weeks, without a word. When my cellphone rings and an Iraqi number shows up on the display, I say a silent prayer before answering.

My life has always been marked by Saddam Hussein's wars. Born to Sunni parents -- my mother a homemaker, my father a mechanic -- I grew up in a brick house in a poor Baghdad neighborhood where Sunnis and Shias lived together. War with neighboring Iran dominated my early childhood. Many nights, Iranian jet fighters roared overhead. Most afternoons, we would watch "Sowar min Al-Marakah" ("Pictures from the Battle"), a propaganda show featuring battlefield footage and the mangled corpses of Iranian soldiers. My parents once gave me medication to fight a recurring nightmare of being squashed under an Iranian tank.

I was in primary school in 1991 when Operation Desert Storm kicked off after Saddam Hussein's invasion of Kuwait. Once, a U.S. missile hit a spice factory near our home. We smelled the spices, thought it was a chemical attack and covered our mouths with wet towels. During most of my teens, we lived under U.N. sanctions on government-issued rations of staple foods.

There were happy times, too. Some of my fondest childhood memories are of the celebrations surrounding the Muslim religious holiday of Eid. During the festival, my father used to take me, my sisters and my brother to the park for amusement rides, to eat kebab and to walk at night by the Tigris River.

I always wanted to be a journalist. But under Saddam, studying journalism was pointless, since all newspapers were run and rigorously monitored by the government. In middle school, I started teaching myself English, practicing with translation texts and old American newsmagazines left in our basement by a relative. I used to spend hours memorizing vocabulary lists and looking up new words in an outdated dictionary. I dreamed of going to school in a Western country, of traveling the world and writing about it.

A radio that Mr. Ali brought to New York from Baghdad. He inherited it from his late grandfather and used it in Iraq to listen to the BBC in Arabic and English during and after the U.S. invasion of Iraq.

By 2003, at the time of the U.S. invasion of Iraq, we were already used to war. My family evacuated to the countryside, with the exception of my father, who said that if he had to die, he would rather die at home.

We returned several weeks later, after Saddam was toppled. My father welcomed us back, but he appeared broken. A secular Sunni and fervent patriot, he had been against the American invasion and never thought it would happen. Now, he had become pessimistic about the future of his country: The looting in the aftermath of the invasion disgusted him. "They stole everything from the government buildings around us," he said, as we walked in the door. "TVs, computers, and even water pipes."

But life continued. My father went back to work; my younger sister and brother went to high school, and my older sister, who had graduated with a degree in English, helped my mother around the house. I found a job as a journalist for a new local English-language paper. I reported stories on bombings, reconstruction projects and other news from all over Iraq.

The violence increased. I had been on the job less than one year when the editor, an Iraqi-American, left the country, afraid that his life was in danger. Along with three other journalists, I kept the publication alive on the Web, posting news items from an Internet cafe in downtown Baghdad.

Before he left, the editor got me in touch with Columbia University in the U.S., which shortly afterward offered me a scholarship to study journalism. My parents said I should accept. I did, and four months later I took off. The morning I left, my brother insisted on carrying my big suitcase to the cab. My mother splashed a pitcher of water behind me, an Iraqi tradition wishing a traveler a safe return home.

With $300 in my pocket, I took a 15-hour cab ride to Jordan, and a plane to New York from there.

By August 2004, I settled in New York, enjoying the life of a newcomer in his 20s. I started to take classes and learned new things, from buckling my seat belt in a plane to working out in a gym; from using a washing machine to eating sushi and tandoori dishes. Later, I landed an internship, and then a reporting job with this newspaper.

During one conversation with his mother, Mr Ali asked her for some of his favorite Iraqi recipes: lentil soup, tomato sauce with beans and Iraqi-style biryani. He scribbled them down on envelopes and keeps them next to his bed.

But as I was getting used to my comfortable new life, I was also regularly pulled back into Iraq, where things were getting worse. A few months after my arrival in New York, I was chatting with a friend in Baghdad on my cellphone when he told me that an acquaintance had died in a roadside bomb attack. I became afraid of getting calls from Iraq, sometimes not answering them. I considered changing my phone number so no one could call me with bad news -- but I could still call people back home when I felt like it. Other times, I became obsessed with fear and would call to check on my family and friends, burning through a 400-minute calling card in a weekend.

When Al-Askari's famous gold-domed Shiite mosque was bombed last February, violence erupted throughout Iraq. Suddenly I couldn't get in touch with anyone back home. I didn't know whether my family members were dead or alive, whether they were taken by gunmen for ethnic reasons or if it was just that their phone line was down. I stopped eating, stopped going to work. I tried calling at three different times every day, to no avail. They surfaced two weeks later, safe and sound, after having fled to the countryside to stay with distant relatives, in an effort to escape violence or retaliation against Sunnis.

During an instant-message conversation with a friend in Iraq, the war dealt me its first massive blow: Haider Al-Maliki, a friend from university in Baghdad who had come to visit me in New York the year before, was found dead, his body riddled with 13 bullets. He was stopped by unknown gunmen while in a cab in the southern city of Amarah and shot on the spot. Other friends began going to their jobs at the government and in the Green Zone in disguise, trying to avoid Haider's fate. One friend poses as a student, while another takes a roundabout route to work for fear of being followed.

Meanwhile, my sister, seeing that ethnic violence was increasing near our neighborhood, asked me if the family should buy a gun. "Ask the neighbors what they are doing," I told her, not knowing what to do. When we talked a week later, my family had opted against it.

My father kept going to work every day, despite the rising violence. It was one way of staying sane. Then, in December, he went missing, and I got my brother's frantic call.

I told my brother to calm down and said that I was here to help -- that I left the country to help the family. "You are there, with air conditioning, entertaining yourself, while we are here in hell," he retorted.

I tried to ignore the comments -- I had heard them from him before -- and told him to focus on the matter at hand. He did. After dad left, he said, there was a huge bombing near the central station where he was supposed to transfer to another bus. Dad never showed up at work and never came back home.

I told him to go to the area of the bombing -- a busy marketplace in central Baghdad -- to see where the wounded were taken. I also called three of my old friends in Baghdad to ask them to accompany him. My brother had already asked some of our cousins to visit police stations to see if my father had been taken into custody.

A few hours later, we talked again. By that time, my brother had visited a local hospital, where most victims were taken. He said that my father wasn't on the hospital's official list of the dead, so he walked around to see if he could recognize him among the wounded. He described a scene of chaos and carnage: Blood was everywhere, people were weeping in the halls, hospital staff were running back and forth -- but my father was nowhere to be found.

An Iraqi-flag key chain bought by Mr. Ali the first time he visited the United Nations. It hangs on the wall of his apartment.

Two days after the bombing, I called my friend Ala and asked him to go to the hospital morgue to see if my father might be among the unidentified dead, victims who weren't carrying IDs or were burned beyond recognition. Ala went and checked three charred bodies, but concluded they were not my father. One was too fat, he said. Another had hair, while my father is bald. And the last one was too young and short to be my father.

My cousin went to a nearby police station, a mini-fortress surrounded by barbed wire and sandbags, to see if my father was mistakenly being held. He told the lieutenant that he was looking for his uncle and gave him the name. He wasn't there.

A week passed and my father still hadn't been found. On the phone, my mother sounded faint and sick but kept saying she was all right. She told me to take care of myself and that my father would come back. She insisted that my father was fine. Her proof: He was not at the morgue.

My older sister couldn't keep up appearances. She stopped eating, stopped taking showers and descended into a depression, my younger sister said. She hadn't been well for more than a year, ever since several cars exploded near her on a market square. Back then, the sight of a child's charred body had sent her into shock. For days, all she could do was hug her knees and murmur over and over: "Poor girl, they killed her, animals." She recalled running through streets awash with blood and sewage, packed with civilians pushing flat wooden carts on which they piled the wounded and the dead. Her condition improved only after she got antidepressants. But after my father went missing, she spiraled back into a severe depression. Medical assistance proved elusive this time, with violence deterring nurses from visiting.

On my way to the gym one recent day, I got a call from my brother with more bad news. A mortar shell hit near my house and damaged the already-fragile bedroom walls. "Do you know that your mother and sisters are sleeping in the hallway shivering in this cold winter?" my brother said. I told him I would send money. Exasperated, he said that even with money they wouldn't be able to fix the room and that they would sleep in my old bedroom from now on.

I feel responsible for my family, but at the same time helpless. I am not a U.S. citizen, or a permanent resident. My guest status here prevents me from being able to bring my family to join me. I ask them to stay strong and take care and stay indoors. I try to give them hope, although I know it could be a false hope. Sometimes I stop calling them for a few weeks to avoid listening to all this.

I've considered going back many times, mostly because I miss my family and I haven't seen them for more than two years. But that is risky -- both because of the growing violence and because it's not certain that I could leave the U.S. and return. My mother says I should stay here. "Don't even think of coming back," she told me on the phone a few weeks ago. "People are leaving, not coming."

These days, my mother and sisters don't go outside the house at all. None of them have traveled before. They don't have passports. And they don't have the money it takes to buy tickets, taxi rides, hotel rooms. They say there are no guarantees of finding a way to make a living in neighboring countries like Jordan.

I seek consolation in small things that remind me of home. I keep three envelopes with my mother's recipes scribbled on them -- lentil soup, tomato sauce with beans and Iraqi-style biryani -- next to my bed. When bad things happen back home, I cook them. My laptop is stocked with songs about Baghdad. I search the Internet for pictures of Iraq before the U.S. invasion. Pictures of the Tigris River. Of bustling Baghdad streets. Of the past that is no longer.

Occasionally, I talk to the few Iraqis I know in the U.S. -- a friend in Michigan, another in Massachusetts. A small Iraqi-flag key chain hangs on a nail sticking out of my wall.

Bombings in the news send me scurrying to my computer for information about the exact time and location of the explosions. I lay curled under my green comforter, going over in my mind where my family members and friends might have been at the time.

New friends keep me company. While civil war raged in Iraq, I attended parties celebrating Thanksgiving, Christmas and New Year's. At Christmas break, I went to the home of a friend's aunt in Connecticut; I shopped for gifts -- books, a T-shirt, a scarf, a tie -- and we ate a big dinner.

I don't tell my friends in America too much about what is happening with my family in Iraq. I try to avoid talking about the war because it's so far removed from the word of restaurants, coffee shops, and polite conversations. I worry people won't understand or don't want to be bothered. During a recent dinner in New York's Chinatown, a friend asked, "How's your family?" When I told her about my father, she was shocked. She offered condolences and said I shouldn't hesitate to ask her for help. I felt grateful, but a little awkward because I knew that neither she nor anyone else who means well can really change things for my family.

Sometimes, my family becomes hopeless and says my father must be dead -- otherwise he would have returned by now. Other days, they are more optimistic, saying that he may have been taken by kidnappers and he will be released.

The last time we talked, my younger sister pleaded with me to help her find a way out of Baghdad. She said she would cook and clean for me, if I could just figure out a way to get her out of there. It made my heart sink.

Trying to check on the fate of my father, I called my brother on his cellphone -- the only phone in my family's possession -- late last month. That day, bombs had gone off on a Shiite market where he likes to shop for DVDs and CDs. Press reports said there were more than 80 dead. He did not pick up his phone. Not the next day either. I recently reached a friend in Iraq, who said he had seen my brother. But I'm still waiting for him to call back.

For Baghdad's Uprooted Girls, School Offers A Hard Haven (WP)

Families Fled Sectarian Killing

BAGHDAD -- The textbooks at their new school might call their predicament "forced internal displacement," but the Iraqi girls living this phenomenon describe it in different terms.

Safwan Abbas worries about failing math. Fatima Hamza wanders the halls missing her friends. To finish the hours of nightly reading she needs to catch up to her classmates, Hadil Muhanned now must wear wire-rimmed glasses.

In Baghdad alone, 38,766 people have been driven from their homes by the daily sectarian killing, the United Nations reports, and the echoes of this mass migration resonate every day at Amil High School for Girls in Baghdad. Located in the relatively safe Shiite area of Kadhimiyah, along the western bank of the Tigris River, the whitewashed concrete schoolhouse has become a haven for Shiite Muslim students fleeing with their families from the religious segregation now pulling apart many of Baghdad's neighborhoods.

DOJ_NMG_0134082

In the past three months, Amil High School has accepted 135 new students, pushing the school's population over 1,000, and more families show up each day. Iraq's Human Rights Ministry has sent employees to distribute skirts, backpacks and shoes to the new pupils.

Teachers who once taught in a room of 40 students now cram more than 70 girls into a class, sometimes three to a desk. Headmistress Suad Kokaz has instituted after-school tutoring sessions for the new students, many of whom attended classes only sporadically at their old schools because of the threat of violence. The school's guidance counselor, Shulair Abdullah, keeps a list, now 16 names long, of students who have lost family members to violence in recent months.

"I run around screaming every day, this is such a hard job," Kokaz said. "I have never witnessed such a challenge."

Like countless others in Baghdad, Safwan Abbas's life as a 14-year-old changed with a missive. Until October, she had lived with her parents and two brothers in the predominantly Sunni neighborhood of Ghazaliya in western Baghdad. But the message on the leaflet that was dropped in their yard was blunt: "You are infidels and you have 72 hours to leave," she recalled.

"I was so scared, I thought they were going to kill us at any second," she said.

When they arrived in Kadhimiyah, Safwan, a round-faced girl with a soft voice and dark eyes, enrolled at Amil with great trepidation. She walked the speckled-tile hallways, ringing with the shouts of the elementary students who share the building, and stared at the bare white classroom walls, feeling disoriented.

"The first time I came here, I felt like a stranger. I had this feeling that I had to return to my neighborhood," she said. "It has been very difficult to adjust. It's not just a matter of finding friends. I feel desperate here, it's so frustrating. I can't adjust myself. I miss all my girlfriends and my house."

For three straight weeks, she said, she couldn't stop crying. She remembers her nightly gossipy phone calls, sometimes lasting more than three hours, with her best friend, Tahani Talib. She still has her cellphone, but her parents have decided they won't pay for the minutes now that they spend $385 a month for rent -- a hefty sum in Baghdad, and about double what an Iraqi family could expect to pay in that neighborhood before the war. Safwan often passes nights and the Friday holiday studying, but she has not been able to understand the math classes at Amil.

"This is the first year I have ever flunked in mathematics," she said. "It's very hard seeing my girlfriends pass the exams, and I'm not passing. I'm trying to do my best, but it's so hard."

After four hours of morning classes each day, Hadil Muhanned, 17, said she spends up to seven hours studying to meet the academic demands of Amil. It was enough reading -- geography, physics, English, history, chemistry, math -- that she needed to get glasses. But each day feels more like a relief than a struggle, she said.

Before her family moved from the predominantly Sunni neighborhood of Adel, Hadil was one of the few Shiite students who attended al-Khuroud High School. She rarely went more than twice a week because of fighting in the neighborhood. One student and her father were kidnapped, she said. Gunmen assassinated a school security guard. The girls read the graffiti scrawled on the neighborhood's concrete walls: "There is no existence for Shia."

On Jan. 28, after Hadil had left, a mortar shell crashed down on al-Khuroud, killing at least five girls and wounding more than 20 others, leaving windows shattered and blood spattered on the school's stone steps.

"We were living in constant anxiety," she said. "Here we at least feel comfortable. We are living as one."

In the past year, threats of violence have driven more than 470,000 people from their homes in Iraq, the United Nations says. They often flee religiously mixed neighborhoods to live among the relative protection of their own sect.

Within Baghdad, militias and insurgents have systematically tried to homogenize mixed neighborhoods. Many neighborhoods on the western side of the capital have become more predominantly Sunni, while Shiites have tended to congregate east of the Tigris. Near Amil High, internal refugees have begun living in abandoned school buildings, one sliver of a humanitarian crisis that has overwhelmed the government's resources, according to Abdul-Samad Sultan, the minister of displacement and migration.

"Really, we need international help, because you could use the whole budget of the country and it will not be enough. Because these people have lost everything, they need fuel, they need electricity, there's a lack of sanitation, education, jobs," he said. "Many of these families are, of course, far, far below the poverty line."

DOJ_NMG_0134083

Since November, freshman Fatima Hamza, 15, her parents, four brothers and two sisters have shared a one-bedroom apartment in Kadhimiyah after also fleeing the Adel neighborhood. Sitting in the office of Kokaz, the headmistress, a black head scarf embroidered with flowers covering her dark hair, Fatima bit her finger and quietly explained her new discomfort.

"Before that, in our schools there, we had our friends and our house and our home, but here it is different," she said. "It is hard psychologically, leaving that all behind."

"I'm getting along all right with the classes, but I'm having trouble relating to people," she added, then lowered her voice to a whisper, out of earshot of the headmistress: "Not everyone feels happy about us being here."

The influx of new students from Sunni neighborhoods has also placed a strain on the teachers and administrators. Kokaz, who said many new students are months behind her school in the state curriculum, has asked her teachers to allow students to postpone exams if they are not ready.

"They are treating the school like savages," said Majda Chechan, head of the elementary school that shares the building with Amil. "They broke the stairs."

The guidance counselor, Abdullah, holds therapy sessions with some of the new students to discuss their emotional problems and their difficulty accepting their new surroundings. Several of the students refused to believe their new circumstances were permanent.

"Maybe the situation will change?" Fatima said in the headmistress's office. "Most of my friends are also displaced. We hope this cannot last forever."

Al-Qaida Releases Video Of Afghan Attack (HC/AP)

By Jasper Mortimer,

Houston Chronicle/AP, February 17, 2007

CAIRO, Egypt — Al-Qaida posted today a video showing what it claimed to be an insurgent attack on a military position of U.S. and Afghan forces in southern Afghanistan.

The video appears to be an attempt by the terrorist network to disparage U.S. claims to be winning the war against the Taliban and allied militia in Afghanistan. It argues that the people of Afghanistan support the insurgents and provide physical assistance to their attacks on U.S.-Afghan forces.

The tape begins with the deputy leader of al-Qaida, Ayman al-Zawahri, ridiculing President Bush's claim to have deprived al-Qaida of a safe haven in Afghanistan, calling it a "barefaced lie."

Al-Zawahri, who speaks in Arabic with an English translation in subtitles, seems to be referring to a Bush speech on Jan. 10 when the president said that U.S. forces "took away al-Qaida's safe haven in Afghanistan — and we will not allow them to re-establish it in Iraq."

With a narrator speaking in American-accented English, the tape then shows video film of what it claims is an attack on a military position in Arghandab, a district in Zabul province, 100 miles northeast of the southern city of Kandahar.

The narrator, who sounds like the American al-Qaida member Adam Gadahn, claims that the position is "liberated" by the insurgents. However, the film does not show the insurgents capturing the target — a compound of mud-plastered buildings in a valley — during the night-time battle. It only shows the insurgents walking through the compound in daylight.

When asked about the video, the district chief of Arghandab, Fazel Bari, told The Associated Press that the only recent clash in that area was last month when NATO-led troops and Afghan forces were ambushed by suspected Taliban militants on the road between Arghandab and Qalat, the provincial capital.

Bari said the NATO and Afghan troops suffered no casualties, but they detained one man after the battle, which ended with the Taliban retreating.

The authenticity of the scenes shown could not be verified. The video carried the logo of the al-Qaida media production company, as-Sahab, and it was posted on an Islamic Web site known for hosting extremist material.

Al-Qaida appeared to have issued the tape on Thursday with the title "Holocaust of the Americans in the land of Khorasan, the Islamic emirate: Capture of an American post, Arghandab." The name Khorasan refers to Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0134084

The video shows the insurgents firing at the alleged post but their weapons cannot be discerned because it is night. Tracer bullets cross the sky, fire is returned and one sees explosions of what are said to be rocket-propelled grenades.

"After a fierce battle, the mujahideen (holy warriors) begin their retreat from the zone of operations," the narrator says in English. The tape quotes a fighter as saying: "We retreated after about 45 minutes of fighting."

In the day time footage, the video shows a dusty compound of single-story buildings which were once occupied by Americans soldiers. Scrawled on the walls are words such as: "Scalp Hunters," "CPT ASHWOKTH UTAH. N6 '06 ETT," and "Spc Smith Commo US Army 2006."

ETT stands for Embedded Training Teams — the U.S. and other Western soldiers who serve as mentors to the Afghan security forces.

The English-speaking narrator says the camera is going around "the liberated area to bring us pictures from inside the cleansed military bases."

An empty packet of Lay's potato chips is found and the camera focuses on the name of the Saudi manufacturer, Saudi Snack Food Co. Ltd, as the narrator says: "As is always the case in our tours of liberated bases, we find evidence that the primary financiers of this crusade are the puppet regimes of the Gulf."

The video shows a beige, battle-wrecked pickup truck that has the number RTS323 on its hood. A small crowd of men stone the vehicle, as the narrator says: "The mujahideen and local residents celebrate the victory in their own special way."

An Afghan with a white beard and black turban, purportedly a resident of the nearby village, tells the camera what the foreigners were like: "The people suffered a lot because of these devils. No one could leave his house, not even for absolutions and prayers. We couldn't even light a lamp at night. Thanks to Allah, the infidels have left.

"The people are very happy about the coming of the Taliban," he says.

Bills Would Let Military Death Benefit Go To Guardian (WP)

By Donna St. George

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

Lawmakers introduced companion bills in the House and Senate yesterday that would allow grandparents and other relatives raising children of fallen troops to be designated as beneficiaries of a $100,000 "death gratuity."

The bills, by Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) and Rep. Tom Latham (R-Iowa), followed a story yesterday in The Washington Post that profiled Susan Jaenke, an Iowa woman who is raising a 9-year-old granddaughter after Jaenke's 29-year-old daughter, Petty Officer 2nd Class Jaime S. Jaenke, was killed by a roadside bomb in Iraq.

Susan Jaenke could not collect the $100,000 benefit her daughter thought she had assigned to her because of strict next-of-kin regulations. Of the proposed change in law, she said yesterday: "To us, this would have made all the difference in the world."

The House bill leaves an opening for courts to resolve retroactive cases such as the Jaenkes', in which the fallen service member "left a clear expression of intent."

A Giant Doom Magnet (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

So I was sitting around watching “Oprah” yesterday afternoon when I realized how I could stop W. and Crazy Dick from blowing up any more stuff.

All I needed to do was Unleash my Unfathomable Magnetic Power into the Universe!

Energy flows where intention goes. Or maybe it’s the other way around.

Anyhow, Oprah taught me how to stop abusing myself and learn The Secret. I finally get it: because the Law of Attraction dictates that like attracts like, my negativity toward the president and vice president is attracting their negativity and multiplying the negative vibrations in the cosmos, creating some sort of giant doom magnet.

DOJ_NMG_0134085

I need to examine my unforgiving stance toward them and use my power of visualization to let them know that in my consciousness and awareness, they cannot determine my destiny. I am severing those emotional and vibratory tonalities that keep me tied to their toxic energy, causing me to repeat the same old pattern of bemoaning in the newspaper their same old pattern of blundering in the Middle East.

Oprah did her second show in eight days on "The Secret," the self-help book (and DVD) by Rhonda Byrne, an Australian reality-TV producer. The book hit No. 1 on the USA Today best-seller list this week.

At first glance, "The Secret" might seem like inane piffle, a psychobabble cross between Dr. Phil and "The Da Vinci Code," a new-age spin on Norman Vincent Peale's 1952 classic, "The Power of Positive Thinking" and the Beach Boys' "Good Vibrations." But that's a negative way of thinking.

James Arthur Ray, a teacher of The Secret method, who talked to Oprah, says it's "very, very scientific."

"If you think you're this meat suit running around, you know, you have to think again," he said. "You're a field of energy in a larger field of energy."

Oprah enthused that The Secret "really is touching a nerve around the world" because "so many people are hungry for guidance and meaning." Ms. Byrne claims it improved her eyesight; others say it works on everything from weight loss to panic attacks to getting rich to snagging the mate of your dreams or a good parking space.

"We create our own circumstances by the choices that we make, and the choices that we make are fueled by our thoughts," Oprah explained in her first show. "So our thoughts are the most powerful thing that we have here on earth. And based upon what we think — and [what] we think determines who we are — we attract who we are into our lives."

Or as the book so eloquently puts it, "You must feel good about You."

If it works on eyesight, can't it work on foresight? Can't we use The Secret on the secretive Bush White House to prevent a calamity in Iran?

According to the Sacred Principles set out by the Law of Attraction Specialists, the universe responds to your thoughts. So if I want certified chuckleheads to stop mucking up American foreign policy, all I have to do is let the universe know. I forgive the president for being a goose and the vice president for being a snake, and I start thinking about the sort of amazing, or even mildly competent, leaders I deserve to have in my life.

Maybe W. should read the book. He likes things biblical, and "The Secret" says it takes its Creative Process from the New Testament.

He would learn, as Mr. Ray said, that "trying is failing with honor," adding: "Take the word 'try' out of your vocabulary. You either do it or you don't."

W. could have applied that to Iraq, where he has always done only enough to fail, including with the Surge.

A main tenet of The Secret is learning to avoid the chain reaction of churlishness, which begins with a single thought: "The one bad thought attracted more bad thoughts, the frequency locked in, and eventually something went wrong. Then as you reacted to that one thing going wrong, you attracted more things going wrong."

It's an apt description of Iraq policy. A bad thought that led to more bad thoughts, and the negative frequency is now locked in on Iran, which is responding with its own negative frequency.

With The Secret, W. will realize that all he needs to do to change his current reality is admit that it's fake. (Similar to the wisdom of Dorothy clicking her shoes three times.)

Once he stops his chain reaction of negative thought, I can stop my chain reaction of negative thought. And then there will be peace on earth and parking spaces for everyone.

Interim Ark. U.S. Attorney Won't Seek Job (WP)

By Dan Eggen, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

Former Rove Aide Says Senate Democrats Would Block Permanent Nomination

Tim Griffin, the former White House aide who has been at the center of a political storm over U.S. attorneys' firings, said yesterday that he will not seek the nomination to be chief federal prosecutor in Little Rock.

Griffin, 38, a military lawyer who previously worked for presidential adviser Karl Rove and for the Republican National Committee, was appointed interim U.S. attorney in Little Rock in December on the White House's recommendation. The Justice Department said it intended to nominate Griffin for the job permanently.

But Griffin said yesterday that he would be unlikely to be confirmed for the job because of opposition from key Democratic senators, including Mark Pryor (Ark.) and Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.).

"I'm not going to get fair consideration from Senator Pryor, my home-state senator, or the Judiciary Committee, particularly under Leahy," Griffin said in an interview. "I decided that there was nothing to gain by submitting myself to that circus."

Griffin's decision, which was reported by the Arkansas Democrat-Gazette, is the latest development in the controversy over the abrupt firings of seven U.S. attorneys. The dismissals angered lawmakers of both parties and have prompted a battle over the attorney general's power to name replacements.

Under a little-noticed provision of the USA Patriot Act reauthorization law approved last year, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales may appoint interim prosecutors indefinitely.

Senate Republicans on Thursday blocked a bill approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee to return to the previous system, which allows district courts to name an interim prosecutor if a permanent U.S. attorney is not chosen within 120 days of a vacancy.

Griffin said he will remain in the job for "as long as they need me."

Justice spokeswoman Gina Talamona said in a statement that "the attorney general is disappointed that Senator Pryor would not support Tim's confirmation. We are pleased that he is willing to serve as interim United States Attorney until a candidate is nominated and confirmed."

The Little Rock job has been a focus of the debate over the fired prosecutors because Griffin's predecessor, Bud Cummins, was specifically asked to resign to make way for Griffin.

Congressional aides who were briefed on the issue this week said that Griffin was recommended for the job by Harriet E. Miers, the former White House counsel, who called a Gonzales aide to push for his appointment. Miers told Pryor in December that Griffin was "our person" for the Little Rock job, said Michael Teague, a Pryor spokesman.

Teague said Griffin's sharp comments about Pryor and other Democrats underscore the need for a confirmation process to ensure U.S. attorneys are not overly partisan.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), a Judiciary Committee member, said in an interview that "Mr. Griffin is proving to be the partisan he always seemed to be."

Griffin said it is "ridiculous" for senators to complain about White House involvement in his hiring and that complaints about his experience are unfair, after 10 years in the U.S. Army Reserve Judge Advocate General Corps and a short stint at the Justice Department.

Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty and other Justice officials have sought to distance the Arkansas dismissal from the other prosecutors' firings, which they have said were prompted by "performance-related" problems. Those six were all asked to resign in telephone calls Dec. 7.

Gonzales told senators in January that he "would never, ever make a change in a United States attorney for political reasons."

After Criticism Of Dismissal, Justice Dept. Shifts Course (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 16 — The prosecutor whose appointment as an interim United States attorney in Arkansas has ignited a furor in Congress will not be nominated for the job permanently, the Justice Department said on Friday.

The appointment of the prosecutor, J. Timothy Griffin, as the temporary successor to H. E. Cummins III as United States attorney prompted Democrats to complain that Mr. Cummins and several other United States attorneys had been removed for political motives.

The withdrawal of Mr. Griffin as the probable candidate to succeed Mr. Cummins permanently was a setback for the Justice Department, which had sought to portray the dismissals as a routine personnel matter.

Mr. Griffin is a military and civilian prosecutor, but Democrats said he was better known for his political ties to the Bush administration. He had been a political director for the Republican National Committee and, more recently, a deputy to Karl Rove, the senior White House political adviser, working on personnel matters.

On Thursday evening, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales called several Arkansas lawmakers to advise them that Mr. Griffin's name would be withdrawn, Congressional aides said. The calls came after several weeks of increasingly vocal criticism about the appointment from Democrats, including the two Democratic senators from Arkansas, Mark Pryor and Blanche Lincoln.

"Tim Griffin is a talented and experienced lawyer and prosecutor who has a deep commitment to public service," said Gina Talamona, a Justice Department spokeswoman.

Ms. Talamona added: "Given Tim's strong qualifications, the attorney general is disappointed that Senator Pryor would not support Tim's confirmation. We are pleased that he is willing to serve as interim United States attorney until a candidate is nominated and confirmed."

Asked to comment on the withdrawal of Mr. Griffin's candidacy, aides to Mr. Pryor and Ms. Lincoln pointed on Friday to earlier statements each had made expressing concern about Mr. Cummins's departure and Mr. Griffin's selection.

In the end, Mr. Griffin withdrew his name from contention, but his chances seemed to decline last week when Paul J. McNulty, the deputy attorney general, said at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing that Mr. Cummins's removal was not based on any flaw in his performance, but rather to make room for Mr. Griffin.

At that hearing, Mr. Pryor testified as a witness, saying he would not support Mr. Griffin if President Bush nominated him for the job permanently.

Mr. Cummins is among 7 to 10 United States attorneys who have recently been removed by the Justice Department. Officials there have said the dismissals were largely intended to replace poorly performing United States attorneys and were not an effort to interfere with any prosecutions.

But several ousted prosecutors have said that they had received highly positive evaluations when their performance was reviewed by the Justice Department, and Democrats have said they may hold further hearings to explore the dismissals.

Rove Associate Won't Seek U.S. Attorney Post Permanently (MCT)

By Marisa Taylor, McClatchy Newspapers

McClatchy Newspapers, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON - A former aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove who replaced one of the recently ousted U.S. attorneys has decided not to seek the job permanently after concluding that the Senate would block his confirmation.

Tim Griffin, the U.S. attorney in Little Rock, said Friday that he wasn't asked to step aside by the administration, despite the controversy sparked by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' unexpected firings of seven Republican-appointed U.S. attorneys.

Griffin, 38, said he would be willing to remain interim U.S. attorney until a replacement is named. Under a change in the law last year, that means he could stay in office until the end of President Bush's term.

"I will be here as long as the White House and Department of Justice wants me here," he said. "Under the law, I could be here, hypothetically, until end of 2008 or early 2009."

Justice Department officials described Griffin as a talented and experienced lawyer, and accused Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark., of trying to block Griffin from becoming a permanent U.S. attorney. Justice Department officials said Friday that the administration would work with the Arkansas delegation to find a replacement. Gonzales has told senators that he'll submit all U.S. attorney candidates for Senate confirmation.

"Given Tim's strong qualifications, the attorney general is disappointed that Senator Pryor would not support Tim's confirmation," Justice Department spokeswoman Gina Talamona said.

Administration officials have been forced to defend the firings in recent weeks after critics raised concerns that well-respected U.S. attorneys were being removed to make way for handpicked candidates who would be less likely to buck the White House.

Griffin took office after the Justice Department asked longtime U.S. attorney Bud Cummins to step aside. Justice Department officials later acknowledged that Cummins was removed to make way for Griffin and not for any "performance-related" reasons. The department cited unspecified performance issues as justification for firing the other six prosecutors.

Griffin, a former spokesman for the Republican National Committee, was criticized as having more impressive political credentials than courtroom experience. Former White House counsel Harriet Miers had asked the Justice Department to appoint him. Griffin, a former military attorney, was a prosecutor in Little Rock for about a year and an independent counsel for three years.

Gonzales called Pryor on Thursday night to tell him that the Justice Department would not ask the Senate to confirm Griffin.

Gonzales promised that the administration would seek confirmation for another candidate, but he didn't say when an announcement would be made, said Michael Teague, Pryor's spokesman.

Teague said Pryor hadn't made up his mind about Griffin, but simply wanted him to come before the Senate for confirmation.

Pryor was concerned that a change in the Patriot Act last March meant that Griffin could stay in office indefinitely without confirmation.

"It's not about Tim Griffin," Teague said. "It's about restoring legitimacy to the process."

Cozy At The Beach (WP)

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

A Justice Department lawyer invests with a lobbyist, settles with his company -- and is told there's no ethics problem.

IT'S THE KIND of story that seems to confirm everything people believe is sleazy about the way Washington works. Last March, Sue Ellen Wooldridge, then the head of the Justice Department's environmental division, bought a $1 million vacation home with Don R. Duncan, the top lobbyist for oil company ConocoPhillips. Nine months later, Ms. Wooldridge signed off on a settlement agreement that let ConocoPhillips delay the installation of pollution-control equipment and the payment of fines.

Just to make matters cozier, the third owner of the beach house is J. Steven Griles, the former No. 2 official at the Interior Department who's now the target of a Justice Department criminal investigation into his dealings with lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Oh, and Ms. Wooldridge, who lives with Mr. Griles, once worked with him at Interior, where she gave Mr. Griles ethics advice and defended his actions during an inspector general investigation.

Justice officials and Ms. Wooldridge's lawyer say she checked with a department ethics lawyer and got the go-ahead to buy the home. "There was no need to recuse herself from ConocoPhillips since she was advised by the appropriate ethics officials that there was not a conflict," her lawyer, Stephen Grafman, told the Associated Press. We'd like to understand more about the basis for that advice; Mr. Grafman says he has a written ethics opinion from Justice but declined to release it, saying that should be left to the department. Given Mr. Duncan's key position as the head of the company's Washington office, and Ms. Wooldridge's similarly key role as assistant attorney general, the assertion that Duncan didn't lobby Wooldridge doesn't give much comfort. The entanglements -- an investment with a senior employee of a company whose interests she's involved with overseeing -- look just terrible. Recusal should have been a no-brainer.

Ms. Wooldridge has left the department, but Justice, responding to inquiries from Reps. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) and Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), said yesterday that its Office of Professional Responsibility was looking into the matter. In the meantime, here's an ethics tip: If you have to ask the ethics folks for advice about whether you can do something, you probably shouldn't do it.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Case Could Avoid Trial (HC)

By Kristen Hays, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, February 17, 2007

Defense wants civil resolution to the charges

Three former Merrill Lynch & Co. executives whose 2004 fraud and conspiracy convictions in an Enron case were overturned last year may avoid facing another jury.

Upon informing U.S. District Judge Ewing Werlein on Friday that the government wanted to retry the case "sooner rather than later," Assistant U.S. Attorney Arnold Spencer said prosecutors also would "continue our conversations" with defense attorneys to resolve it without a second trial.

Spencer declined to elaborate, as did attorneys for two of the defendants. But one of the defense attorneys, Dan Cogdell, said he was "looking for a civil resolution, not a criminal resolution," such as a settlement with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Werlein, who presided over the first trial, encouraged some sort of nontrial resolution. He said prosecutors should "at least ponder" where the government's time, money and energy is best spent.

"So I wish you well in your conversations. I hope you will be able to be successful," the judge said.

Friday's hearing came nearly six months after a three-judge panel of the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals threw out most jury convictions of Daniel Bayly, James Brown, Robert Furst and a fourth former Merrill executive, William Fuhs.

The case involves a year-end 1999 deal in which the government contends the brokerage pretended to buy three power plants on barges from Enron so the energy company could appear to have met quarterly earnings targets. The defendants claimed the deal was proper.

Jurors acquitted in-house Enron accountant Sheila Kahanek while convicting the four Merrill defendants and Dan Boyle, a former Enron finance executive.

Brown lawyer Cogdell represented Kahanek, who called him "my hero" upon her acquittal. He said Friday he "can't wait to revisit this case."

The appeals panel erased Fuhs' convictions for lack of evidence, and he cannot be retried. Boyle did not appeal and is serving a three-year, 10-month prison term.

The panel also upheld Brown's convictions of perjury and obstruction of justice for lying to a grand jury about the nature of the deal. Cogdell and Sidney Powell, another of Brown's new attorneys, are seeking to appeal that decision to the U.S. Supreme Court.

But regarding the reversals, the panel's 2-1 ruling said the original prosecutors improperly presented a theory to win the fraud and conspiracy convictions. The opinion said the government wrongly claimed the men deprived Enron of their honest services because their actions were in line with corporate goals and didn't rob the energy company or shareholders of money or property.

The opinion also said it "should not be read to suggest that no dishonest, fraudulent, wrongful or criminal act has occurred."

Gary Brown, who probed the barge deal as special counsel for the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs, said Friday that even with the reversals, the case sent a message to Wall Street that investment bankers shouldn't help companies fudge their financial results.

"I think people have gotten that message loud and clear, but there needs to be some resolution that's clear these people are guilty of some wrongdoing," said Brown, who is not related to defendant James Brown. He said a civil settlement would suffice, "given the fact that they've also served some time."

Powell said James Brown "wants to be vindicated."

Bayly, former head of investment banking for Merrill, and Furst, the brokerage's former liaison with Enron, served nearly a year in prison when they and Fuhs were released in June 2006 pending their appeals.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Federal Probe Floods Statehouse With Subpoenas (NSL)

By Ted Sherman And Jeff Whelan, Star-ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), February 17, 2007

Democratic, Republican leaders served as inquiry into Trenton budget process grows

New Jersey legislative officials were hit with a volley of federal subpoenas yesterday, in a rapidly expanding corruption investigation into the Statehouse by U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie.

The subpoenas were served on both the Democratic and Republican leadership in the Senate and the Assembly -- seeking information on how millions in public funds were handed out over the last three years.

It was the latest development in a federal probe that began last April with an investigation into state Sen. Wayne Bryant (D-Camden), who was accused by a federal monitor of using his position to steer funding to the state's medical university after he received a "no-work" job there. The matter has now expanded into an inquiry into how lawmakers divvy up public funds.

The subpoenas, delivered by FBI agents late Friday afternoon as lawmakers were heading home, left many in Trenton thunderstruck.

"Trenton is on fire," declared Assemblyman Kevin O'Toole (R-Essex), as news of the subpoenas broke. "This is equivalent to Rome burning."

Lawmakers and other Statehouse veterans could not recall a federal probe ever going as deeply into the state's budget process.

Among those who received subpoenas were Senate President Richard Codey (D-Essex); Senate Minority Leader Leonard Lance (R-Hunterdon); Senate Majority Leader Bernard Kenny (D-Hudson); Assembly Speaker Joseph Roberts (D-Camden); Assembly Minority Leader Alex DeCroce (R-Morris), and Assembly Majority Leader Bonnie Watson Coleman (D-Mercer), legislative officials confirmed.

All planned to comply, said officials for both sides.

Michael Drewniak, spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office, had no comment and would neither confirm nor deny the issuance of subpoenas.

The subpoenas came after Christie's ongoing, behind-the-scenes fight for records from the Office of Legislative Services, which has been resisting his demand for information.

The Sunday Star-Ledger first reported the secret court showdown over those records last week, and the expanding inquiry by the U.S. Attorney into the Legislature.

Leaders of the Democratic-controlled Legislature have maintained that the scope of that earlier subpoena was narrowly focused -- and not necessarily indicative of a broader investigation into the Legislature itself. Yesterday's wide-ranging requests, however, made it clear that Christie was looking deeply into how the Legislature divvies up public funding.

Sources with direct knowledge of the probe have said that prosecutors are exploring whether some lawmakers have sought, through the state budget process, to steer money to nonprofit organizations that would have directly benefited them or their families.

Yesterday's subpoenas requested documents and communications from 2004 to present -- including e-mails, letters, memos and faxes -- regarding "property-tax assistance and community development grants and any other grants or assistance, commonly referred to as Christmas tree items," according to three legislative sources who saw them.

Republicans were quick to point out that Democrats have controlled the Legislature, and the budget process, during that period.

The Legislature each year awards millions in state grants with little public scrutiny or oversight. Spending for these legislative initiatives -- known in New Jersey as Christmas tree items -- more than doubled in the past five years, to nearly $350 million. Most of the money, in the form of community development grants, has historically gone to the party in power in Trenton, under a largely secretive process.

Codey said they would provide the information being sought.

"We will comply 100 percent, in every way, shape and form," he said.

Lance, confirming that his office received a subpoena, said the Republican Senate Office would also comply "completely and expeditiously" with the subpoenas.

"We have been in no way involved in the dead of night budget additions of recent years," he said. "There needs to be total transparency with regard to legislative additions to the annual state budget."

Assembly Republican Communications Director Bill Guhl, confirming the Assembly Republican Office had been served with a subpoena requesting information related to grants and budget items, said they have been clear that the Legislature should comply with the U.S. Attorney.

"We are fully cooperating with all requests from the U.S. Attorney's Office," said Guhl.

Roberts also pledged cooperation.

"Corruption is not a partisan issue. If the U.S. Attorney is going to conduct an investigation into allegations of wrongdoing, it's an inquiry that we welcome and will assist in," he said.

Roberts has already been directly questioned by FBI agents in connection with the Bryant investigation, as has several other legislators and legislative budget officials.

"I have tried to be as helpful as possible about the federal government's questions about Senator Bryant," Roberts said in a written statement late yesterday. "Federal officials spoke to me for about a half hour in December. ... I can't discuss specifics but the conversation was brief and professional."

Bryant has been a focal point of the U.S. Attorney since last year, after a federal monitor said the former chairman of the powerful appropriations committee used his position to steer state funding to the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey.

The monitor said Bryant funneled more than $12.5 million to the university's School of Osteopathic Medicine in Stratford, after he was hired to a "no-work" job that boosted his pension credits.

Federal authorities subsequently subpoenaed records about Bryant from the state Legislature, Gloucester County and Rutgers University -- where Bryant also held jobs -- and Bryant later resigned from his seat as Senate budget chairman.

Three subpoenas were served in October on the Office of Legislative Services, the state Senate and the state Treasury Department in connection with the Bryant investigation.

The Senate and the Treasury Department quickly complied with the request for information last fall. OLS, however, would not respond to the subpoena -- citing attorney-client privilege, sources have said.

In addition to serving as the nonpartisan research and operations arm of the Legislature, OLS acts as counsel to the Legislature and its members.

That led to a closed door hearing in U.S. District Court on Wednesday, as Christie sought to compel the legislative office to comply.

The stalemate turned into a politically charged debate this week spearheaded by Republicans, who accused the Democrats of a cover-up.

The Democrats on Thursday responded with charges that there was no broad investigation of the Legislature, and complained of "sensationalized media accounts based on false information about this investigation."

Payment After Mayor's Affair Is Questioned (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 16 — In the latest development in a lingering political scandal, the city attorney here is investigating whether any laws were broken in a payment to a married woman who had an affair with Mayor Gavin Newsom.

The woman, Ruby Rippey-Tourk, worked full time in City Hall as the mayor's appointments secretary until last May, when she took a three-month unpaid leave to seek treatment for a substance abuse problem.

While she was on leave, several unidentified city employees donated their sick time to Ms. Rippey-Tourk under a program that allows city employees to transfer sick time to other city employees. After she returned from leave, Ms. Rippey-Tourk formally resigned, and was paid out the cash equivalent of that accumulated time, a little more than $10,000.

DOJ_NMG_0134092

Sam Singer, a spokesman for Ms. Rippey-Tourk, said he was not at liberty to say who had transferred their time, but that the mayor had not. Mr. Singer added that the payment was "acceptable and legal."

But on Thursday, the city attorney, Dennis Herrera, said he would examine the payment to make sure it had been "done properly under city laws and procedures."

Peter Ragone, a spokesman for the mayor, said his office welcomed the review. "We are confident the matter was handled appropriately and humanely," Mr. Ragone said.

The inquiry comes as Mr. Newsom is trying to shake off the damage from his admission last month that he had a brief sexual relationship with Ms. Rippey-Tourk in late 2005, when he was in the process of getting a divorce. Ms. Rippey-Tourk is married to Alex Tourk, who had been managing Mr. Newsom's campaign for a second term until the affair prompted his resignation.

Payments to Mr. Tourk have also been examined during the fallout from the scandal. The mayor initially promised to pay him a salary from campaign funds until he could find a new job.

After city lawyers suggested that such payments might raise ethical or legal issues, Mr. Newsom pledged to pay Mr. Tourk personally out of his own fortune, which he made from a wine and restaurant business.

Shortly after news of his affair broke, Mr. Newsom acknowledged an alcohol problem and has sought continuing treatment at an out-patient rehabilitation program here. Since then, one member of the city's board of supervisors has called for the mayor's resignation, and several prospective mayoral candidates have suggested that the popular Mr. Newsom may be vulnerable in November.

Lawyer Accused Of Destroying Evidence In Connecticut Pornography Case (NYT)

By Matthew J. Malone

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

GREENWICH, Conn., Feb. 16 — A well-known lawyer was indicted on Friday on charges that he obstructed justice and destroyed evidence in the investigation of a former church choir director whose laptop computer contained images of naked boys.

The lawyer, Philip D. Russell, 48, of Stamford, appeared in United States District Court in Bridgeport and pleaded not guilty. He was released on $100,000 bail.

Mr. Russell is accused of destroying a laptop computer containing pornography that was owned by Robert F. Tate, the longtime music director at Christ Church here. Mr. Tate pleaded guilty in January to possessing 150 to 300 images of naked boys and faces a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison.

The indictment said that two unidentified church officials and Mr. Russell, who was acting as a lawyer for the church, confronted Mr. Tate in October after a church employee who had been using the laptop discovered the pornographic images. Mr. Tate admitted that the images were his and promptly resigned.

Mr. Russell then took the laptop and dismantled it, the indictment said.

Prosecutors said Mr. Russell and the church officials allowed Mr. Tate to remove his possessions from his church apartment and arranged for him to fly from Connecticut to California. He was later arrested in Los Angeles.

Many parishioners have supported Mr. Tate, who ran the church's renowned choir for three decades. Some helped him pay his bond.

It is unclear whether there will be other indictments. Several people affiliated with the church have hired lawyers, and the Rev. Jeffrey Walker, the church's rector, has been called before the grand jury at least twice. Prosecutors did not return calls seeking comment.

Christ Church, an Episcopal congregation of 1,500, has many prominent parishioners. It was the boyhood church of former President George H. W. Bush.

Mr. Russell's lawyer, Thomas J. Williams, said Mr. Russell was optimistic that if his case was not dismissed, a jury would find his actions lawful.

DOJ_NMG_0134093

Mark Phillips, a lawyer who has worked with Mr. Russell for 17 years, said, “I have no doubt that whatever Phil may have done, that in no way did he think he was violating any law or any ethical guideline.”

Some legal observers say Mr. Russell’s case could be a test of a provision of the Sarbanes-Oxley law that places greater responsibility on lawyers to preserve evidence in situations that may become the subject of criminal prosecutions.

Congress passed the law to tighten oversight of corporations in the aftermath of the Enron debacle and other corporate fraud cases. Some of those scandals involved allegations that files and e-mail messages were destroyed before criminal charges could be brought.

Mark A. Dubois, the chief disciplinary counsel for the Connecticut Judicial Branch, said he had spoken to local bar associations in recent months to educate lawyers on the provision. He said lawyers were taken aback by the news.

“You could hear a pin drop,” Mr. Dubois said.

California: Warrant Issued In Attack On Elie Wiesel (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

The San Francisco Police Department issued an arrest warrant for a man suspected of attacking Elie Wiesel, the Holocaust survivor, author and winner of the Nobel Peace Prize. The man, Eric Hunt, 22, of Sussex County, N.J., is accused of assaulting Mr. Wiesel, 78, on Feb. 1, as he was attending an interfaith conference. Mr. Hunt, who is not yet in custody but has been located, will be charged with a hate crime, the police said in a statement. He was identified as a suspect, the police said, after claiming to be the attacker in an Internet posting.

House Dems Back Federal Shield Law (SFC)

By Zachary Coile, Chronicle Washington Bureau

San Francisco Chronicle, February 17, 2007

It would protect reporters from revealing their sources to government prosecutors

Washington -- House lawmakers, with the support of top Democratic leaders, are preparing to fast-track long-stalled legislation that would shield reporters in most cases from having to reveal their sources to federal prosecutors.

The move follows the Justice Department's decision this week to withdraw a subpoena for two Chronicle reporters after a defense lawyer pleaded guilty to leaking grand jury transcripts in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative investigation, in which top athletes testified they had used illegal steroids.

Reps. Mike Pence, R-Ind., and Rick Boucher, D-Va., plan to reintroduce their federal media shield legislation next month with the support of House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers, D-Mich. Conyers has pledged to move the bill through his committee quickly and to the House floor.

Sens. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., and Richard Lugar, R-Ind., are preparing to reintroduce a similar bill in the Senate, although proponents suggest it may be tougher to get a filibuster-proof 60-vote majority in the Senate, given the Bush administration's opposition.

The Chronicle case has been used by the bill's supporters as Exhibit A for why Congress should pass a law protecting journalists from having to name their sources or turn over materials to the government.

Pence, who met last month with Chronicle reporters Lance Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada in his Capitol Hill office, said even though the journalists were spared a threatened 18-month prison sentence, their case exposed the lack of protections for journalists and their confidential sources in federal courts.

"While these reporters won't go to jail, in many respects the First Amendment is still behind bars," Pence said in an interview. "This case stands as a stark testament to the need for Congress to adopt a federal media shield statute."

Thirty-two states, including California, and the District of Columbia have media shield laws, and 17 other states have recognized some form of privilege of confidentiality between reporters and their sources. But the protections do not cover reporters in cases in federal court.

The shield law debate comes as high-profile journalists have testified under subpoena in the Washington trial of former White House aide Lewis "Scooter" Libby, who is charged with lying about the disclosure of a CIA agent's name.

Lawmakers also are watching the case of blogger Josh Wolf, who set a record last week for a journalist imprisoned for contempt after spending his 169th day in prison for refusing to hand over a videotape of an anarchist protest in San Francisco.

The Chronicle subpoenas were withdrawn after attorney Troy Ellerman, who once represented the founder and another executive of BALCO, pleaded guilty to four felony charges in federal court this week. He faces a sentence of up to two years in prison after acknowledging that he allowed Fainaru-Wada to take notes from the transcripts of testimony in the BALCO case.

Williams and Fainaru-Wada came to Washington last month to discuss their case and lobby for a shield law. Top lawmakers -- including House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco and Conyers -- sent letters to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales urging him to withdraw the subpoenas.

"Lance and Mark were very effective when they were here a few weeks ago. People are now paying attention," said Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press.

"Do I think they would pay more attention if (the reporters) were sitting in jail? Yeah," she said. "But this situation was egregious enough I think it's still going to be a very useful example for us to use up on Capitol Hill."

Lawmakers said they still believe the subpoenas to Chronicle reporters and the looming sentence of the leaker have sent an alarming message to both journalists and their sources.

"I don't know who put pressure on the source to reveal his identity, but I can say there is a chilling effect with respect to journalists, who are now going to be less willing to engage in investigative reporting where a confidential source may be involved," Boucher said.

"And the greater harm is the willingness of sources generally to come forward when they realize that ... a reporter can be threatened with jail time."

Sponsors of the House bill say they have redrafted it to include three major exceptions where reporters would be required to reveal information: in cases where disclosure could prevent imminent harm to national security; in cases where journalists were first-hand observers to a crime; and in cases where a corporation's trade secret was revealed.

Even though the Chronicle subpoenas have been withdrawn, Boucher said he believes the case remains one of the most compelling arguments for a federal shield law.

"This was probably the most egregious use of the prosecutorial power of the federal government to extract a confidential source from a reporter that we have seen to date. Because the subject matter did not involve national security, it did not involve imminent harm to anyone. This was a matter of finding out information about steroid use by a professional athlete."

Doolittle Defends Bribery Case Figure (SACBEE)

By David Whitney, Bee Washington Bureau

The Sacramento Bee, February 17, 2007

He doubts his friend is guilty of charges tied to ex-Rep. Cunningham.

Rep. John Doolittle, R-Roseville, said Friday that he believes in the innocence of a close friend and political supporter indicted this week on charges related to the bribery of former San Diego-area Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham.

Brent Wilkes, a Poway defense contractor whose business Doolittle had helped land a $37 million contract, was indicted on corruption charges, including paying bribes and providing prostitutes for Cunningham, who's now in prison.

Wilkes entered a not guilty plea to the charges, handed up by a federal grand jury, in a federal court in San Diego on Wednesday. He later sent out an e-mail proclaiming his innocence.

"The investigation and its accompanying deliberate leaks of false rumors has destroyed my reputation and inflicted critical wounds on all of my business interests," Wilkes said. "Let me say loud and clear: I never bribed Duke Cunningham or anyone else."

Doolittle said in an earlier interview that he befriended Wilkes though Ed Buckham, a former staff member for then-Rep. Tom DeLay who became a lobbyist for the Alexandria Strategy Group and was a close associate of convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Doolittle also has described Abramoff as a close friend.

DOJ_NMG_0134095

Over the course of their relationship, Wilkes and his wife, Regina, together with his companies and associates, contributed tens of thousands of dollars to Doolittle's re-election committee and political action committee.

In April 2005, Wilkes' corporate jet was used to fly DeLay to Las Vegas for a fundraiser at the Venetian Resort Hotel Casino for Doolittle's PAC, the Superior California Federal Leadership Fund. Wilkes contributed $10,000 to Doolittle at that event.

Later, Doolittle acknowledged he included a $37 million item in the Defense Department's budget to pay for a contract to one of Wilkes' companies, PerfectWave. He also said he tried to win a House contract for another Wilkes company, ADCS.

Asked about Wilkes' indictment during a telephone news conference Friday, Doolittle said he has read his friend's statement, and believes him.

"That's the Brent Wilkes I know," Doolittle said. But in an apparent reference to Abramoff, the congressman said that "I must admit that there are other examples of these people who turned out to be different than I imagined.

"But I've always said I don't believe Brent Wilkes could be involved in something like this," Doolittle said. "The behavior they've alleged about Brent Wilkes is inconsistent with everything I know about the man. I'll be shocked if it turns out differently."

In his own dealings with the Justice Department with regard to the ongoing Abramoff political corruption scandal, Doolittle said his attorneys have reported no progress in their efforts to clear his name in connection with any allegations of wrongdoing.

Doolittle has spent more than $100,000 in legal fees in that effort. He said Friday that he is not aware of any new legal fees charged to his re-election campaign recently, but added that "the bills just keep rolling in."

Doolittle was re-elected to a ninth term last November by a narrow three-point margin. He attributed the close vote in part to publicity about his association with Abramoff. Doolittle recently announced a 10-point plan to reconnect with voters, a key part of which begins next week with a series of town hall meetings throughout his congressional district. State Awaits Changes In Sex Offender Registry (LANSSJ)

By Erik Adams, Capital News Service

Lansing (MI) State Journal, February 17, 2007

Feds working on standardization, assigning duties

A Senate bill would amend the state's 1994 sex offender registry law to follow federal registry requirements.

But unfortunately, federal officials haven't revealed those requirements.

The bill would expand information about ex-cons on the State Police public sex offender registry to include details about vehicles they own, their places of employment and convictions for other crimes.

Advertisement

2006 mandate

That would comply with a 2006 federal mandate that requires standardization of information in state registries so they can be integrated into the National Sex Offender Registry.

However, the U.S. Justice Department hasn't announced what standardization would entail. It's up to that department to read what Congress ordered and determine exactly what it means, said Sgt. Matt Bolger, legislative liaison for the State Police.

"Federal law is nowhere near as easy to read as state law is," he said.

"We're kind of waiting on that determination from the Department of Justice on what our duties are going to be."

Once those duties have been determined, Michigan lawmakers can amend state law to comply, Bolger said.

Sen. Wayne Kuipers, R-Holland, is the bill's sponsor. Darin Ackerman, Kuipers' chief of staff, said the legislation is intended to get a jump on the federal regulations.

Changes anticipated

The Senate Judiciary Committee won't take action on the bill until the regulations are announced, at which point any necessary changes will be made, he said.

In January, the State Police launched a new version of the Michigan registry that features the anticipated changes.

Bolger said offenders are not yet required to provide the additional information and that his agency hasn't been collecting it.

'Coming soon'

"There are some data on there, like registration details - last verification date, date of initial registration, date of registration expiration - those all show 'coming soon,' " Bolger said.

Shelli Weisberg, legislative director for the American Civil Liberties Union of Michigan, said the additional information could create problems for individuals other than those in the registry, such as employers.

"It would be unfortunate if an employer chose to hire someone who's on the registry - because there are so many people who are on the registry who are not dangerous and would be fabulous employees - because having the employer's place of business connected to that registry would most likely cause hardship to the employer," she said.

What The CIA Leak Case Is About (WP)

By Byron York

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

At the end of each witness's testimony in the perjury and obstruction trial of Lewis "Scooter" Libby, after prosecutors and defense attorneys examined and cross-examined, U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton asked jurors to write down any questions they had. Walton would then look through the papers, decide which questions were appropriate and pose them to the witness.

Now, as the case heads to the jury, those queries are our best hints about what jurors are thinking.

But last week there was a moment when we got a hint not from a question that Walton asked, but from one he refused to ask. After the testimony of star prosecution witness Tim Russert, Walton scanned the jurors' queries and announced, "There is going to be one question I'm not going to ask. I've concluded that that question is not appropriate and therefore you should not speculate as to what the response would have been."

What was he talking about? A moment later, Walton told the jurors: "What Mrs. Wilson's status was at the CIA, whether it was covert or not covert, is not something that you're going to hear any evidence presented to you on in this trial."

"Whether she was, or whether she was not, covert is not relevant to the issues you have to decide in this case," he said.

It is The Thing That Cannot Be Spoken at the Libby trial.

From the first day, Walton has said that jurors will not be allowed to know, or even ask, about the status -- covert, classified or otherwise -- of Valerie Plame Wilson, the woman at the heart of the CIA leak case. "You must not consider these matters in your deliberations or speculate or guess about them," he told jurors in his opening instructions.

A few days later, on Jan. 29, Walton told everyone in the courtroom that the jurors are not the only ones in the dark about Mrs. Wilson's status. "I don't know, based on what has been presented to me in this case, what her status was," Walton said. Two days later, he added, "I to this day don't know what her actual status was."

Walton's reasoning is this: The trial is about whether Libby lied to the grand jury in the CIA leak investigation. Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald never charged anyone with leaking the identity of a covert or classified agent. Libby isn't on trial for that, so jurors -- and judge -- don't need to know.

The problem is, the entire case stems from accusations that the Bush White House illegally leaked Mrs. Wilson's identity in an effort to get back at her husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, for his high-profile criticism of the administration's case for war in Iraq. That's why the CIA leak investigation began, and it's why Libby appeared before a grand jury, leading to the perjury charges against him. It's what the CIA leak case is about. Yet Walton has told jurors to put it out of their minds.

However well-intentioned, the prohibition isn't working; the question of Mrs. Wilson's status came up in court virtually every day. Take, for example, the time prosecutors played tapes of all eight hours of Libby's grand jury testimony.

And what was Libby asked about?

"Did you have any sense that if you revealed the person's identity out at the CIA you may be compromising the identity of a covert person?" Fitzgerald was recorded as asking Libby.

"No, sir," Libby responded. "I mean, my, my understanding is that most of the people at the CIA are not covert . . ."

"You didn't consider that there might be a risk that a person working at the CIA might be overt to other CIA employees and even sometimes to the government, but may be operating undercover -- or might otherwise be a covert person?"

"I had no sense that it was something classified."

DOJ_NMG_0134097

The jury heard it all, aided by their own copies of the transcript and exhibits. Of course, if they thought about Mrs. Wilson's status, they would have been violating Judge Walton's order.

Then there was the argument Fitzgerald had with defense lawyer Ted Wells over Fitzgerald's theory that Libby lied because he was afraid for his job after President Bush announced that anyone who leaked classified information about a CIA agent would be fired.

Wait a minute, said Wells. "The jury has been instructed that the issue of whether it was classified or whether she was covert will not be presented in this case."

"I'm not going to tell the jury the information was classified," Fitzgerald responded. "I will tell the jury that there was an investigation into whether the law was violated."

Of course, we all knew -- and the jury knew too, since it was discussed in Libby's grand jury testimony -- that the law to which Fitzgerald referred was the one barring disclosure of a covert agent's identity.

Outside the courtroom, Fitzgerald has said that Mrs. Wilson's status was in fact classified. The Libby indictment says that, too. But the judge has not allowed the jury to see the indictment, either.

The result is that jurors have heard constant suggestions that some sort of crime, committed by the administration and perhaps by Libby himself, lies at the bottom of the case. An air of accusation hangs over the courtroom.

But the accusation can't be discussed.

Maybe in the end, jurors will be able to make sense of it all. But it's more likely that even after the trial ends, they'll still have one question they want answered.

CIVIL LAW:

GE To Record $115 Million Expense For Asbestos Claims (WSJ)

By Kathryn Kranhold

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

General Electric Co. said it will record a $115 million after-tax expense in the first quarter after losing a decade-long battle with its insurers over payments for thousands of asbestos-related claims.

In a decision released this week, the New York State Court of Appeals upheld lower-court rulings preventing GE from tapping secondary insurance to cover claims brought mostly by individuals exposed to asbestos-insulated turbines. The Court of Appeals is the state's highest court.

To date, GE, based in Fairfield, Conn., has paid more than $500 million to settle asbestos-related cases, according to court documents. GE said 509,000 asbestos-related claims were filed against the company through 2006; 40,000 are pending. GE said claims settled to date have mostly been covered by both GE's primary and secondary carriers; the rest are being covered by GE. GE didn't make the asbestos but used it to insulate turbines.

GE spokesman Gary Sheffer said, in a statement, GE was "disappointed in the decision, which is contrary to how the majority of courts have ruled." Mr. Sheffer said GE is reviewing its options.

Mr. Sheffer said the expense, amounting to about one cent per share, would have no impact on GE's financial forecast for the first quarter. GE has said it expects net income of between $4.5 billion and $4.6 billion, or 43 cents to 45 cents a share.

The lawsuit centered on whether GE's asbestos-related claims should be treated as one incident under its insurance policies issued between 1965 and 1985 or whether each claim should be treated individually.

GE was responsible for the first $5 million in coverage on each occurrence. After the first $5 million, GE could access more than $2 billion in secondary insurance.

GE argued that the claims were one occurrence, allowing it to tap the excess insurance. However, the court ruled that each claim was a single occurrence, limiting GE's access to the insurance, since few individual claims exceed $5 million. GE's primary insurer, Electric Mutual Liability Insurance Co., a GE affiliate, became insolvent in 1995.

DOJ_NMG_0134098

"GE was attempting to change a longstanding New York law on how the number of occurrences is decided in this context," said Michael Balch, of Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom LLP, who represented one of the insurers. He said GE wanted to consider as one occurrence "400,000-plus cases arising at thousands of sites across the country dating back 70 to 80 years."

Mr. Sheffer said the number of cases being filed each year is declining, down to 7,000 last year, compared with 61,000 in 2002. He said more cases are also being resolved without payment. More than 80% of the pending cases are for claimants who aren't sick, Mr. Sheffer said.

GE hopes "courts around the nation will follow the lead of many jurisdictions and dismiss such cases or place them on a deferred docket," he said.

Federal Appeals Court Probes Validity Of Lawsuit Over Tire-pressure Monitors (DEN)

By David Shepardson, Detroit News Washington Bureau

Detroit News, February 17, 2007

WASHINGTON --A three-judge federal appeals court panel today expressed skepticism toward tire makers and an auto safety group who say federal regulators have watered down rules requiring tire pressure monitoring systems in all new vehicles starting this fall.

Tire makers and Public Citizen argue the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration's regulation, aimed at making automakers install tire-pressure warning systems, falls far short of what Congress intended when it passed a 2000 law requiring that all vehicles be equipped with such monitors by Sept 1.

The legislation came in the wake of a recall of 13 million tires on Ford Explorers and other vehicles that were linked to nearly 280 deaths.

A three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia heard the challenge to the NHTSA rule today, more than three years after another appeals court threw out NHTSA's first tire pressure regulation, issued in 2002.

Judges David Sentelle, Brett Kavanaugh and A. Raymond Randolph questioned whether the tire makers and Public Citizen had the legal right or "standing" to file the suit.

Marc Machlin, a lawyer for Public Citizen, noted that more than 78,000 accidents yearly are caused by under inflated tires. "It's a very serious issue," Machlin said, but was quickly cut off by Sentelle.

The plaintiffs must overcome several hurdles: one is showing that there is a "non-trivial" higher risk from the rule NHTSA imposed versus the type of tire monitoring rules they are seeking. They also must show they have a legal right to file the suit.

Sentelle said if there is only a general risk for everyone, the matter is best decided by "the political branches" -- i.e. Congress and the White House. Sentelle said under the Public Citizen theory, drivers, passengers and pedestrians -- basically everyone in the United States -- would have a right to sue.

"If everyone has standing, than no one has standing," he said.

"What has the (Transportation) department done to prevent the companies from making safer tires?" Sentelle asked. He questioned how federal regulators could be held to account by tire makers.

But Kavanaugh also asked some tough questions of Justice Department attorney H. Thomas Byron III. He said it was "odd" that NHTSA could "water down" or effectively eliminate some of the requirements that Congress set in its statute.

Byron said Congress couldn't have meant to mandate an "impossible" requirement, namely that automakers certify that their systems work with all replacement tires.

NHTSA acknowledges that up to 1 percent of replacement tires would make tire pressure systems inoperative -- or 2.25 million of the 225 million replacement tires sold annually in the United States, a figure Byron sought to downplay. "That's still a lot," Kavanaugh said.Public Citizen, along with tire makers Goodyear Tire & Rubber, Bridgestone/Firestone North America, Cooper Tire & Rubber and Pirelli Tire, and the industry trade group Tire Industry Association, filed the suit against the U.S. Transportation Department and NHTSA.

"NHTSA's watered-down standards will cause more tire failures, leading to more deaths, injuries and property damage than standards meeting statutory requirements," lawyers for Public Citizen, the safety advocacy group, wrote in a legal brief filed late last month.

It has been estimated that the requirements will cost automakers up to $1.2 billion annually to fully implement, beginning in the 2008 model year. Car manufacturers argue that the lawsuit is an attempt by the tire industry to shift their warranty costs onto them.

Tire makers say NHTSA's regulation puts drivers and passengers at risk because it fails to provide for warning drivers of low tire pressure soon enough, doesn't require the systems to work with replacement tires and allows the monitors to be tested under conditions that don't take into account cold weather extremes, which can alter tire performance.

The regulation being challenged mandates that tire pressure monitoring systems alert drivers within 20 minutes if any tire is 25 percent or more below the recommended inflation level. NHTSA's prior proposal had set the figure at 10 minutes.

When the systems are in place, a radio transmitter sends a signal to an onboard computer that lights a warning signal on the dashboard.

The rule under challenge also says all testing on the system would be done on a test track in San Angelo, Texas, which critics said would not take into account cold weather.

The regulation was issued in April 2005, after an appeals court ruled in August 2003 that NHTSA's original 2002 regulation, which set the alert level at 30 percent below recommended inflation, adopted "a standard that permits plainly inferior systems" and that was "arbitrary and capricious."

The April 2005 rule was weakened from several earlier NHTSA proposals. NHTSA rejected calls from Public Citizen and the American Automobile Association to set the alert level at 20 percent below the recommended inflation. The agency also relaxed other requirements, including that the monitoring systems work with replacement tires or spares, saying "we expect a typical vehicle will outlast its original set of tires."

Tire companies acknowledge that they are concerned about higher warranty costs, lawsuits and customer dissatisfaction.

"Tire manufacturers and the government should strive in developing standards … to make tires safer and should not adopt a less safer alternative," wrote James Stroble, manager of product analysis at Goodyear Tire & Rubber, in a court filing.

"Minimizing tire failures is a very important goal of my company."

NHTSA says it was within its authority to write the regulation and honored the intent of Congress.

It also emphasized that drivers "subject to repeated warnings when a tire is only slightly under-inflated would quickly become frustrated by the frequent exercise of re-inflating a tire by only a small amount."

NHTSA said the systems aren't designed to "warn the driver of extremely rapid pressure losses that could accompany a vehicle encounter with a road hazard."

Automakers say the burden belongs on tire makers.

"Their own products will fail if more stringent regulations are not imposed on someone else -- in this case, the vehicle manufacturers," wrote Erika Jones, who represents the automakers, in a court brief. "But the product failure that the tire manufacturers cite -- failure due to severe under-inflation -- is preventable by the tire manufacturers themselves."

NHTSA estimates the system will cost as much as $65 per vehicle and save 120 lives annually and prevent about 8,400 injuries. Public Citizen argues imposing a tougher tire pressure standard that it says could save more than 150 lives and 10,000 injuries annually, while NHTSA said it would save just 4 lives a year.

In November 2000 -- in response to the Ford Firestone recalls -- Congress required the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration within 1 year to complete a rulemaking "to require a warning system in new motor vehicles to indicate to the operator when a tire is significantly under inflated."

The widely publicized tire recalls in 2000 and 2001 were sparked by a spate of rollover accidents that killed an estimated 270 people. Ford spent more than $3 billion and more than 14 million Firestone tires were recalled.

One key problem is that many drivers rarely check their tire pressure. A 2001 NHTSA survey found just 33 percent check tire pressure on a regular basis Another study found that more than a quarter of all cars and SUVs on the road have under inflated tires.

Spokesmen for Ford, General Motors and DaimlerChrysler said 70 percent of 2007 model vehicles under 10,000 pounds have the tire pressure monitoring systems, and they will be in all 2008 models, as required.

Justice Department Backs Sober House Suit (FLSUNSEN)

By Peter Franceschina, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, February 17, 2007

The U.S. Department of Justice filed a legal brief Friday contending that a Boca Raton ordinance banning so-called sober houses from residential neighborhoods clearly violates federal housing law.

The Justice Department brief was filed in a lawsuit by a sober house operator against the city that went to trial last month. It asks a federal judge to declare the ordinance invalid and prevent the city from enforcing it. The ordinance, passed by the City Council in May 2002, would require the sober houses to move into areas of the city zoned for medical centers and hotels.

The ordinance has never been enforced because of the threat of litigation. Steve Manko, the owner of two large sober house apartment complexes -- Boca House for men and Awakenings for women -- sued the city in March 2003. The American Civil Liberties Union, representing former and current Boca House clients, also was involved in the case.

Manko's attorney, William Hill of Miami, said he was encouraged by the Justice Department filing because it supports the plaintiffs' position. The plaintiffs contend that the ordinance violates the federal Fair Housing Act and also the Americans with Disabilities Act. Under those federal provisions, people who are in recovery from alcohol or drug addiction are considered to be disabled or handicapped, providing them with housing protections.

"I'm ecstatic," Hill said. "It could not be clearer. The Department of Justice is saying what we have been saying all along: This ordinance violates the Fair Housing Act on its face. The city should have realized this was wrong years ago and not put us through this. Instead, the city has been putting forth a defense that is not legal under the Fair Housing Act."

The city maintains that Manko's sober houses are commercial and medical operations -- involving on-site drug testing, counseling and other services -- that are inappropriate for a residential neighborhood.

Jamie Cole, an attorney for the city, said the Justice Department filing did not raise any new issues.

"We believe the medical and commercial activities taking place in a residential area are inappropriate. There was no evidence in the trial that on-site activities such as these were necessary," Cole said. "If Boca House would change their operations and not do these medical-commercial operations, we would have no problem with them housing recovering substance abusers."

The Justice Department filed a separate suit against the city over the alleged housing violations in September. That case is pending. The judge hearing Manko's suit invited the Justice Department to file Friday's brief.

During the trial, U.S. District Judge Donald Middlebrooks expressed concerns about the breadth of the ordinance relegating the sober houses to commercial districts, as well as the commercial aspect of the sober house operations. He said he would rule as quickly as he could after receiving briefs from the plaintiffs, the city and the Justice Department.

Justice Department attorney Nancy Langworthy wrote that the city's ordinance "singles out for regulation housing for disabled persons and is discriminatory on its face." Langworthy asked the judge to award damages to several former and current residents of Boca House and to impose a fine on the city "to vindicate the public interest."

Attorneys for the city asked the judge to order Boca House to stop providing on-site drug testing, counseling and Alcoholics Anonymous meetings.

Manko's attorney asked the judge to award about $925,000 to Manko for lost profits, but the judge said that was a tenuous claim. Jim Green, an attorney hired by the ACLU to represent the Boca House clients, asked the judge to award them $5,000 to $20,000 apiece.

"These are people in recovery trying to make a new life. Being told they are not welcome in residential neighborhoods hurts," Green said.

If the judge finds the ordinance violates housing laws, the plaintiffs could be entitled to attorneys' fees. If the city wins, its attorneys could collect fees from the plaintiffs. The city estimated the case would cost $600,000 in fees, while the plaintiffs estimated their costs would be $850,000.

Smile, You're On N.Y.P.D. Camera (NYT)

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

The New York Police Department has generally had the public on its side when it comes to securing the city since the Sept. 11 attacks. For their part, New Yorkers seem perfectly willing to put up with inconveniences, including traffic stops and bag searches. But the police have more and more overstepped their bounds by routinely and indiscriminately videotaping demonstrations of every kind, even peaceful ones. A federal judge was right this week to order the police to curb this conduct.

The practical effect of the order is to compel law-enforcement officers to obey guidelines that require them to state a reason to suspect unlawful activity before they videotape demonstrators. They must also get department authorization. That's a modest requirement. The city contends the current practice is not strictly unconstitutional, but the prospect of being photographed by police while merely protesting can have a chilling effect on free speech.

The city agreed in 1985 to abide by guidelines for police tactics as part of a settlement of a lawsuit by Vietnam-era political activists. Four years ago, after the 9/11 attacks, a judge agreed to give the police greater powers to investigate political groups. Unfortunately, the cops ignored the part about having a rationale for video surveillance.

This week, the same district court judge, Charles Haight Jr., rebuked the city for that failure. He said it was fine for the police to videotape the hundreds of bike riders who take to the streets on the last Friday of every month as an environmental protest, because the riders have a history of traffic violations. But taping a peaceful demonstration by activists for the homeless in front of Mayor Michael Bloomberg's home, as was done in 2005, was pointless because the group posed no security threat.

Judge Haight's lyrical opinion alluded to Longfellow, Greek mythology and even The New Yorker. We hope none of it goes over the heads of the city government, which should now move quickly to ensure the court, and the public, that it will protect New Yorkers' civil liberties.

ANTITRUST:

GM, DaimlerChrysler Deny Buyout Talks (WT)

By Sean Lengell, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 17, 2007

The Big Two?

The world's largest automaker is set to expand further, as General Motors Corp. is negotiating to buy the struggling Chrysler division from its German parent, DaimlerChrysler AG, sources with knowledge of the talks said.

GM and DaimlerChrysler officials have denied the existence of any talks.

"We're not going to comment on speculations concerning [any] discussions between [DaimlerChrysler] and GM," GM spokesman Tom Wilkinson said yesterday. "As we've said in the past, we've frequently discussed areas of mutual interest with other carmakers, and in a lot of cases, these discussions don't lead anywhere."

Nevertheless, Detroit and Wall Street were buzzing after the German business publication Manager Magazin reported Wednesday that GM and DaimlerChrysler were negotiating a buyout of Chrysler.

Speculation of a buyout intensified yesterday after the U.S. trade publication Automotive News reported that "high level talks" of a buyout between DaimlerChrysler and GM executives are being held.

DaimlerChrysler Chief Executive Officer Dieter Zetsche, when announcing plans Wednesday to cut 13,000 jobs at assembly plants throughout the United States, didn't rule out the possibility of spinning off the Chrysler Group.

"We don't know if any of this is true or not, but the fact that both [companies] are not commenting and the stock market is going crazy indicates that maybe there is something," said John Wolkonowicz, senior analyst with Global Insight of a Lexington, Mass., who tracks the auto industry.

"You can come up with scenarios where this makes good sense for GM. It's not necessarily a silly thing for them to do at all."

DaimlerChrysler's U.S. shares rose $3.08, or 4.4 percent, to close at $73.33 on the New York Stock Exchange. It was the shares' highest closing price since January 2000. GM shares fell 10 cents to $36.34.

Some industry experts say DaimlerChrysler executives in Germany have given up on Chrysler and want to sell the U.S. division.

"So GM could end up getting a good deal here," Mr. Wolkonowicz said.

Chrysler has bounced between losses and profits since Daimler-Benz AG purchased the U.S. automaker in 1998.

Yet aside from a poor third quarter last year, Chrysler vehicles reported strong sales for much of 2005 and 2006.

"Nobody in Germany was saying [in 2005 and 2006] let's get rid of Chrysler while we lose all this money on Mercedes-Benz," said auto analyst Charlie Hughes, former head of North American operations for Land Rover and Mazda. "So now, all of a sudden, this isn't a good marriage?

"Attitudes have changed rather abruptly [at DaimlerChrysler], which tells me basically those were the underlying attitudes all the time."

GM also may be pursuing Chrysler simply to keep Chrysler out of the hands of competitors, some analysts say.

"GM is in an aggressive mood, quietly confident that they have a lot of their house in order," said Jim Sanfilippo, an analyst at Automotive Marketing Consultants in Bloomfield Hills, Mich. "Both of these companies are North American-based; there is a common work force."

Still, many industry experts say they are skeptical.

Chrysler is cutting jobs and closing its Newark, Del., plant after a $1.5 billion loss last year. GM is reducing employment and shutting factories in North America after sales declines in the United States.

"GM isn't that flush with cash, so I don't know what they would bring to the party to buy [Chrysler] with," Mr. Hughes said.

Erich Merkle of IRN Inc., a Michigan automotive consulting firm, said GM has too many brands and plants to consider buying Chrysler.

GM "has got far too many plants that are underutilized," Mr. Merkle said. "They need to close their own plants."

Both companies have a "full plate" of issues they need to resolve, said David Healy, a Burnham Securities analyst in Sierra Vista, Ariz., who owns GM shares.

"I see no synergies at the corporate level" between GM and DaimlerChrysler," he said. "They have matching product lines and are trying to fix capacity and labor issues."

GM Reportedly In Talks With Daimler To Buy Chrysler Unit (WP)

By Sholnn Freeman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

Shares of DaimlerChrysler climbed yesterday after media reports that General Motors was in talks to buy the German firm's Chrysler division.

Chrysler officials in Germany played down the reports, saying the primary focus now for Chrysler was a restructuring aimed at returning it to profitability. And U.S. industry executives struggled yesterday to assess how GM would benefit from an alliance with Chrysler. GM is in the process of shrinking its operations in an attempt to increase its profit.

Other potential Chrysler suitors include European or Asian carmakers seeking a bigger foothold in North America. Renault-Nissan Motor chief executive Carlos Ghosn, who unsuccessfully sought to enter into an alliance with General Motors last year, has said he is open to new partners. He has not, however, publicly expressed interest in Chrysler.

Adding Chrysler to his alliance could help Ghosn build up his clout in the United States, the world's largest and most profitable auto market. Another key player is China's Chery Automotive, which has been trying to establish a presence here over the past few years.

The trade publication Automotive News, echoing reports in the German media, cited unidentified sources say saying GM had entered into high-level talks to buy Chrysler. Other reports have said two companies were discussing the possibility of entering into a joint-development project to build sport-utility vehicles.

DaimlerChrysler's shares gained more than $9 this week, including $3.08 yesterday, to close at $73.33 on the New York Stock Exchange. Shares were up 4.4 percent yesterday and 14 percent for the week.

In a statement yesterday, GM said: "We are not going to comment on the speculation concerning discussions between DaimlerChrysler and GM related to Chrysler."

Some industry executives suggested that GM could be interested in one or more pieces of Chrysler, rather than trying to absorb the whole company. Already, GM and DaimlerChrysler collaborate on gas-electric hybrid systems for big trucks in a consortium that includes the German automaker BMW.

An industry executive said that buying all of Chrysler could give GM additional volume and allow it to remain the world's largest automaker. Toyota is on track to supplant GM at the top this year.

Under pressure from German shareholders, DaimlerChrysler Chairman Dieter Zetsche said Thursday that he was open to all options related to Chrysler's future, including a spinoff or a sale. DaimlerChrysler also announced a recovery plan for Chrysler that includes laying off 13,000 workers and slowing production at plants that produce pickups and minivans.

DaimlerChrysler officials have said they expect Chrysler to lose money in 2007 but to achieve a profit margin of 2.5 percent by 2008. Analysts say DaimlerChrysler's other divisions, including the Mercedes-Benz car group, would offset Chrysler's losses.

The reaction in German publications yesterday to a possible spinoff was summed up by the word befreiungsschlag, which means a kind of liberation.

Until now, a separation of the two automakers had been a taboo subject, particularly when DaimlerChrysler was controlled by Juergen E. Schrempp, its former chairman. Schrempp was the main force behind the merger. Analysts said that Zetsche has now opened the path to a separation. Zetsche spent five years in Auburn Hills, Mich., as chief executive of Chrysler, leading a campaign to improve profitability.

GM And DaimlerChrysler Cozy Up, But A Merger Would Be Tricky (WSJ)

By John D. Stoll And Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

Shares in DaimlerChrysler AG jumped to a seven-year high on renewed speculation that General Motors Corp. could buy the company's Chrysler Group unit, a further sign that a spinoff of Chrysler has strong backing among investors.

Several people familiar with the situation said it is unlikely GM would buy Chrysler, although one person with knowledge of the matter said such a deal has been touched on in recent discussions between the two auto makers.

Detroit, New York Abuzz

The rumors created a hullabaloo in Detroit and on Wall Street. Their variety -- touching on everything from acquisition theories to a possible production alliance -- speaks to the difficulty that Daimler may have in managing the process.

GM and Chrysler are discussing joining forces to develop a large sport-utility vehicle and possibly a small car made in Korea, several people familiar with the matter said, adding that a "production deal" is the most likely scenario.

On Wall Street, the focus also turned to Detroit's labor negotiations with the United Auto Workers. As so much of the industry's future is based around this contract, the issue presents a chicken-and-egg paradox for potential buyers.

Many people discounted the idea of a spinoff, saying that it would do little to fix Chrylser's main problems of cost structure and product appeal. That said, these people pointed out that what is best for the remaining Daimler side of the company may not be best for Chrysler's side.

DaimlerChrysler investors clearly favor the idea of selling Chrysler, long the smallest of Detroit's Big Three and now even smaller than Toyota Motor Corp. in the U.S. market.

On Friday, buyers snapped up DaimlerChrysler shares, pushing them up $3.08, or 4.4%, to $73.33 as of 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading (see chart below with Abreast of the Market). The stock last closed above $73 on Jan. 19, 2000, about two years after the merger that created the German-American auto maker and only months before Chrysler's first major earnings breakdown.

GM investors were less enthusiastic. GM shares, which recently hit a 52-week high, closed at $36.34, down 10 cents in Big Board trading.

A deal linking GM, the world's largest auto maker, and Chrysler would likely face many hurdles, including antitrust questions, integration challenges and opposition from workers.

DOJ_NMG_0134104

The head of the GM European Employee Forum, which represents GM workers in Europe, said Friday he doesn't believe GM would or should buy Chrysler. "Chrysler doesn't have the right products for the U.S. customer," Klaus Franz said in a telephone interview.

Billions Lost

DaimlerChrysler in the past week reported a 40% drop in fourth quarter earnings because of a $1.5 billion loss at Chrysler. GM has its own problems. After posting a $10.6 billion loss in 2005, GM lost $3 billion over the first nine months of last year as it booked restructuring charges.

Friday's speculation was sparked by a report in Automotive News that cited unnamed sources in Germany and the U.S. A similar article had been reported a day earlier by a German business magazine, Manager Magazin.

GM In Exploratory Talks With Chrysler (FT)

By John Reed In London, Richard Milne In Frankfurt And Bernard Simon In Toronto

Financial Times, February 17, 2007

General Motors is in exploratory talks with Chrysler after DaimlerChrysler, its German parent, this week said it might sell the struggling US unit.

Other potential suitors for Chrysler, including car companies and private equity groups, have also expressed preliminary interest, insiders told the Financial Times on Friday.

Daimler's US shares rose as much as 6.1 per cent as rumours of the talks emerged.

The Stuttgart-based German-US company made the approach to GM through its bankers after saying it was considering "all options" for Chrysler, which lost €1.1bn ($1.4bn) last year. "Yes, we are in talks," a GM insider told the FT. "They started on Wednesday."

The talks were preliminary, and it remained unclear whether they might result in an offer to buy Chrysler, joint ventures in specific areas, or any deal at all. "We are in a very early stage," the GM official said.

People close to Daimler said there had been "lots of conversations" with several carmakers since the announcement.

"Everyone you can imagine is going to kick the tyres here," said one.

The head of a US investment bank in Germany said a number of private equity firms were in discussion with DaimlerChrysler.

It has hired JPMorgan to advise it on its options. A person involved in the talks said no substantive discussions with any potential buyer had taken place but that a range of carmakers and private equity houses were likely to be interested.

Daimler declined to comment. However, there was a feeling at the company that it did not want to be rushed into anything, and wanted to study all options in detail, from an outright sale to a Chrysler spin-off.

GM said: "We do have discussions with other carmakers with issues of mutual interest, but we won't comment on any speculation of discussions."

GM, which this year is expected to be overtaken by Japan's Toyota as the world's biggest carmaker, last year explored then rejected the possibility of an alliance with Renault and Nissan.

Analysts expressed scepticism on Friday that GM's shareholders would support the idea of a tie-up with Chrysler, the most focused of Detroit's Big Three, at a time when both face declining sales in the world's biggest car market.

GM has not made a full car-company acquisition in its recent history, although, like other groups, it forms ad hoc alliances and joint ventures.

However, "if DaimlerChrysler really want to sell Chrysler, then Rick will have to examine what the potential advantage would be", the GM official said, referring to Rick Wagoner, chief executive.

Analysts Are Skeptical Of G.M.-Chrysler Merger (NYT)

By Micheline Maynard

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134105

DETROIT, Feb. 16 —The willingness by DaimlerChrysler to cut loose its Chrysler Group, ending its nine-year trans-Atlantic partnership, is drawing cheers from investors.

Shares of the German company rose nearly 14.4 percent this week, capped by a climb on Friday that was fueled by speculation that General Motors and Chrysler were holding talks. DaimlerChrysler ended the week at $73.33, up $3.08.

The talk is doing little for G.M., however. Its shares rose less than 1 percent this week, closing Friday at $36.34, down 10 cents.

On Wednesday, DaimlerChrysler said it was keeping all its options open for Chrysler, refusing to rule out a sale or a strategic partner for its American unit.

That same day, the German magazine Manager reported that high-level talks were taking place about the possible purchase of Chrysler by G.M., a report echoed on Friday by news organizations including Automotive News.

Officials at G.M. and Chrysler refused to comment.

Senior automobile executives meet frequently to discuss issues of mutual interest, so any talks between G.M. and Chrysler would not be that unusual.

Three weeks ago, Ford's chairman, William Clay Ford Jr.; G.M.'s chief executive, Rick Wagoner; and Chrysler's chief executive, Thomas W. LaSorda, were all on hand for an Economic Club of Detroit luncheon, where the topic was the nation's health care problems.

But Wall Street analysts were skeptical of an outright sale of Chrysler to G.M.

"We see a deal as possible, but by no means certain," Jonathan Steinmetz, an automobile analyst with Morgan Stanley, said in a research report Friday.

Efraim Levy, an analyst with Standard & Poor's Equity Research, added: "We see no rationale for G.M. to purchase its struggling competitor." Mr. Levy reiterated on Friday his sell rating on G.M. shares.

Indeed, G.M. has plenty on its plate, an important reason it ultimately decided not to pursue a global alliance last year with Nissan of Japan and Renault of France, despite the urging of the billionaire Kirk Kerkorian, who was then G.M.'s largest shareholder.

The primary thing that Chrysler would bring G.M. is a return to its size 20 years ago, before it set out on a series of painful revampings that have eliminated more than 100,000 blue-collar jobs and led to the closing of more than three dozen factories.

G.M. ended 2006 with 24.3 percent of the American car market, while Chrysler held 13 percent.

So if it bought Chrysler outright, and kept all its operations intact, G.M. would again control over just a third of the American car market.

That would easily allow it to fend off a challenge from Toyota, which passed Chrysler last year to rank as the third-biggest player in the American car market, with 15.4 percent.

Toyota is on track this year to unseat Ford for the second spot, given that it is opening new factories as Ford is shutting them under its own reorganization plan.

But in recent months, G.M. said it was willing to give up several more points of market share to return to solid profits. Further job cuts and plant closings are scheduled to continue through 2008.

Taking on Chrysler now would only take attention away from the task at hand, Mr. Levy said. "G.M. has little to gain and should not be distracted from its own turnaround plans," he wrote.

By contrast, Daimler investors are seeing long-awaited gains.

At Friday's close, DaimlerChrysler stock was within $1.20 of a 52-week high, prompting some analysts to predict it could be headed much higher, to levels rarely seen since the heady days after the 1998 merger.

That alone is reason enough to keep the rumors swirling a little longer, analysts said, giving DaimlerChrysler time to see whether any potential suitors come forward for Chrysler. It has hired JPMorgan as a strategic adviser.

Doubtless, there may be such suitors, Mr. Steinmetz said, if only out of curiosity. Automakers rarely get a chance to see internal data that become available when a company goes on the market.

Banco Bilbao To Expand U.S. Presence By Buying Compass Bancshares (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0134106

By Julia Werdigier

The New York Times, February 17, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 16 — Banco Bilbao Vizcaya Argentaria, Spain's second-largest bank, after Santander, agreed to buy Compass Bancshares of the United States for $9.6 billion, making its biggest acquisition abroad in a market where it seeks to strengthen its foothold.

Banco Bilbao, or BBVA, said Friday that Compass shareholders can choose to receive either $71.80 in cash or 2.8 new BBVA shares for each of their current Compass shares. The offer represents a premium of about 16 percent to the average Compass share price during the last 10 days and 8 percent above Friday's closing price.

Spain's banks have profited from significant growth in the Spanish economy and a sharp increase in mortgage lending, even to foreigners who are buying holiday homes in the country. BBVA, based in Bilbao, in northern Spain, and Banco Santander Central Hispano, the country's largest bank, have used their profits to expand into Latin America, where economic growth has spurred demand for banking services.

BBVA owns BBVA Bancomer, the largest bank in Mexico by assets, while Santander has spent a total of $17 billion on various Latin American acquisitions since 1996. Santander now owns Mexico's No. 3 bank, Serfin, and Brazil's seventh-largest lender, Banespa.

Last year, BBVA agreed to buy State National Bancshares and Texas Regional Bancshares for 2.1 billion euros. With the acquisition of Compass, based in Birmingham, Ala., BBVA will generate about 10 percent of its earnings in the United States. It will have 622 branches in Alabama, Arizona, Colorado, Florida, New Mexico and Texas, holding a total of $47 billion of assets.

"Even though we can see the rationale behind expanding in the region, the price is very full," said Andy Lynch, who manages about 3 billion euros in European equities at Schroders in London. BBVA is paying about four times the book value of Compass and as much as 20 times its forecast 2007 earnings, according to Mr. Lynch.

Shares in BBVA dropped to 19.49 euros, down 2.4 percent, on the stock exchange in Madrid. The shares have risen 17 percent in the last year, giving it a market value of 69 billion euros ($90.6 billion).

Spain's banks have had strong growth. BBVA generated 1.8 billion euros in profit from Mexico and the United States in 2006 after building a franchise that taps the cross-border market among the Hispanic community in the United States. Santander, which paid £8.3 billion for Abbey National of Britain in 2004, said this month that higher revenue from Latin America helped raise fourth-quarter profit 13 percent.

Their growth and strong management have made Spain's banks a possible target for acquisitions by Europe's giant banks. But BBVA's acquisition of Compass may actually now make it less of a potential takeover target.

Francisco Gonzalo, BBVA's chairman, said last September that the bank received approaches from European and non-European rivals. BBVA's shares have gained after speculation that it could be of interest to the London-based HSBC Holdings or to Société Générale of France.

Mr. Gonzalo expansion plans were set back last year when he was outbid by BNP Paribas of France in an effort to buy the Italian lender BNL. The acquisition would have been BBVA's biggest since it paid 10.5 billion euros for Argentaria in 2000.

BBVA-Compass Deal Is Just the Latest; Target: U.S. Market

MADRID -- The Spaniards are coming, the Spaniards are coming -- and they want your deposits.

Spain's two main retail banks have moved from the bush leagues to become among the largest, most efficient, most profitable in the world. And one of them just made a big play to take on two U.S. giants in a lucrative American market.

Banco Bilbao Vizcaya Argentaria SA's agreement to buy Alabama-based Compass Bancshares Inc. for $9.6 billion, announced Friday, would give it hundreds of branches in the South and West, including 163 in Texas, a fast-growing market. That would pit Madrid-based BBVA against Bank of America Corp. and J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., the Lone Star State's two biggest banks.

DOJ_NMG_0134107

That deal follows Spain-based Banco Santander Central Hispano SA's acquisition last year of a 25% stake in Philadelphia-based Sovereign Bancorp, which has almost 800 branches in nine states.

BBVA was all bluster in announcing the deal. BBVA "is much more advanced than the Citis or the J.P. Morgans" at nuts-and-bolts retail banking, said Chairman and Chief Executive Francisco González.

The U.S. rivals are expected to put up a fight. "They're competing against some of our best retail banks," said Jefferson L. Harralson, a bank analyst at Keefe, Bruyette & Woods. "It's going to be hard for them to move market share, and it's going to be hard for them keep market share."

The deal follows a string of acquisitions that have turned BBVA and Santander into the world's 15th-largest and ninth-largest banks respectively by stock-market value. Both reported record full-year profits this month.

Santander increased its assets eightfold over the past decade, thanks to massive expansion in Latin America and the United Kingdom. Despite the growth, the bank has boosted its return on equity, a key profitability measure, to about 21%, up from about 14% in 1996. BBVA is slightly smaller but even more profitable, with a return on equity of about 24%. On that score, both Spanish banks outperform Citigroup Inc., Bank of America and HSBC Holdings PLC, the big British bank.

Shares in BBVA and Santander have trailed their more sedate peers because the market expects them to keep making pricey acquisitions. The Compass deal sent BBVA's stock on Friday down 2.4% in Madrid and its American depositary shares down 2.5% on the New York Stock Exchange. Compass shares rallied 6.5% on the Nasdaq Stock Market (see chart on page B3).

The Compass purchase was BBVA's biggest ever, and Mr. González says he wants it to be one of the world's biggest banks by the end of 2008. Santander swore off acquisitions after the Sovereign deal, but it stoked deal fears anew this month by taking a 2% stake in Capitalia SpA, Italy's No. 3 lender.

The Spanish banks' efficiency stems from stiff home-market competition. To survive, they overhauled their businesses. Both invested heavily in new computer systems in the early 1990s that are just now being fully implemented. The new systems offer advantages over the traditional databases that scatter information on customers into various business "silos."

That helps BBVA and Santander sell more products to each customer than European and U.S. peers. BBVA sells almost five products to each customer, compared with about three products per customer at Compass.

As a result, for every €100, or about $130, of income, BBVA and Santander spend €43 and €48, respectively -- compared with €50 at HSBC and €55 for Compass, considered one of the Sunbelt's best-run banks. Both banks also have invested heavily in other areas, especially risk management. Both have impressive nonperforming-loan rates of less than 1%, even including their Latin American operations.

BBVA is using its computer system to change banking in Mexico, where it has attracted four million customers in the past two years. Recovering from the economic shocks of the 1990s, banking services there are trickling down to the broader population. BBVA has two million low-income "virtual" Mexican customers who deposit paychecks and spend money via credit accounts. Maintenance costs for such accounts are low, widening profit margins.

The bank originally entered the U.S. with acquisitions of Valley Bank, Laredo National Bancshares and Texas National Bancshares over the past two years, hoping to funnel money from Mexican immigrants in the U.S. to relatives' BBVA accounts in Mexico.

Now Mr. González wants to expand to more affluent American customers in Texas. The state has no major hometown player, making it one of the most competitive markets in the country. Several banks are buying and building branches there, including Capital One Financial Corp., of McLean, Va.; Wachovia Corp., of Charlotte, N.C.; and Washington Mutual Inc., of Seattle.

BBVA has taken on considerable risk with the Compass deal, which was put together by BBVA's advisers at Morgan Stanley, its lawyers at Cleary Gottlieb Steen & Hamilton LLP, Compass's advisers at Sandler O'Neill & Partners, and its lawyers at Balch & Bingham and Wachtell, Lipton, Rosen & Katz. The deal increases BBVA's exposure to dollar earnings, which could fall against the euro, the bank's home currency. Mr. González says it is a long-term play.

"If we can successfully introduce our model there, we will have reached an enormous milestone," he says.

BBVA Expands In US With $9.6bn Deal (FT)

By Mark Mulligan In Madrid

Financial Times, February 17, 2007

BBVA, Spain's second-largest bank, on Friday stepped up its push into the US by unveiling an agreed $9.6bn (€7.3bn) acquisition of Compass Bancshares, a franchise covering six states.

News of the deal drew a cool reception from investors, who drove BBVA shares down 5 per cent in early trading. However, by the close on the Madrid stock exchange they had recovered ground, and finished down 2.7 per cent at €19.49.

Analysts voiced concerns about the dilutive effect of the planned €4bn capital increase to part-fund the deal, which comes just three months after a €3bn share issue aimed at improving the balance sheet.

There were also worries about the erosion of BBVA's core capital ratios. "History shows investors should be wary of acquisitive companies," UBS said.

However, Standard & Poor's affirmed the bank's credit ratings, highlighting BBVA's "healthy asset quality, conservative risk management and a benign economic environment in most markets".

Shareholders in the US retail bank, which is present in Alabama, New Mexico, Arizona, Florida, Colorado and Texas, will be offered 2.8 American Depositary Shares of BBVA per Compass share, or $71.82 in cash.

The Spanish bank said the offer represented a 16 per cent premium over Compass's average trading price over the past 10 days. It will finance the purchase through the capital increase, supplemented with the proceeds of planned asset sales. Among these is the disposal of its 5 per cent stake in Iberdrola, Spain's second-largest power group.

BBVA, described the deal as a "decisive step" in its US campaign, which until now has involved the purchase of small banking franchises in Texas.

In 2005 it paid $850m for Laredo National Bancshares and last year acquired State National Bancshares and Texas Regional Bancshares for $2.7bn.

Although its strategy was built on linking Mexican immigrants in Texas with its Bancomer operation in Mexico, chief executive Francisco González said on Friday BBVA saw scope for exporting the "universal" Spanish banking model to the US. "When it comes to offering full financial services, we are ahead of the pack, compared with our American peers," he told the FT.

With $34.2bn in assets, 417 branches and profits last year of $460m, Compass is by far BBVA's most important US – and global – purchase to date. The deal confirms its growing frustration with Europe, where in 2005 it abandoned plans to buy Banca Nazionale de Lavoro of Italy.

Newspapers Tribune Moves Closer To A Corporate Rewrite (WSJ)

By Sarah Ellison

The Wall Street Journal, February 17, 2007

As the auction for Tribune Co. limps to a close, it is becoming clear that newspaper publishers can't sell their way out of their current woes.

Tribune's board of directors is scheduled to meet late this coming week, and while it is uncertain they will emerge from the meeting with an announcement, company management and advisers are casting aside outside offers and working on what is being billed as a "self-help" plan.

That is another way of saying that nobody came to Tribune's rescue.

Typically, if a company avoids a takeover, employees and management breathe a sigh of relief and go back to business as usual. But if this auction ends as many expect, Tribune will have to self-inflict the kinds of harsh changes that normally come from an outside buyer. That will mean even steeper cost cutting and asset sales.

That is partly because Tribune, along with many other newspaper players, waited too long to take the dramatic action that now is being thrust upon them. Tribune was forced into the auction process by its largest shareholder, the Chandler family, which pushed for action just as panic was building about the industry's prospects. The irony is that the Chandlers were too late. They are angling to remove themselves from the newspaper business they should have gotten out of years ago, when they sold Times Mirror Co. to Tribune in 2000. Today, the options are much more limited.

DOJ_NMG_0134109

John Rogers, chairman and chief executive of Ariel Capital Management, one of Tribune's biggest holders, says the market's fear of newspaper companies is a result of "group think."

"We may be looking back on things in the long term and say that this was the bottom of the cycle," he says. By that rationale, it is a good time to buy into the industry. But timing the comeback of the industry is a risky bet, and one that few investors are willing to take.

Under the current plan, at least Tribune's fate is all in the Chicago family. Sam Zell, a Windy City real-estate mogul, and the Chandlers are still circling Tribune, though any chance of either party making a successful offer is unlikely. Tribune isn't comfortable with either proposal being proffered, and neither party seems willing to increase the terms.

Under the structure being considered, the company would spin off its television stations and pay out a dividend to its shareholders. Then, one possibility is that the McCormick Tribune Foundation -- Tribune's second-largest shareholder behind the Chandler family -- would help buy out part of the Chandlers' stake in the company.

That would solve two problems for Tribune. It would reduce the Chandlers' influence -- possibly booting them off the board -- and increase control for the management-friendly foundation, which is controlled by two former Tribune executives. The three other foundation board members are current Tribune executives who have recused themselves from decision making while the sale process is under way.

The foundation is adamant that it acts independently from the company. But in the past 50 years, the foundation has had only 20 directors, all of whom have been current or former Tribune officials. Foundation offices sit just floors away from Tribune management in Chicago's Tribune Tower.

It is hard to see how buying up more newspaper stock is good for the McCormick Tribune Foundation. If most shareholders are trying to get out of the newspaper business, why wouldn't the McCormick Tribune Foundation want the same?

Vt., N.H. Ski Areas To Be Sold (BOS)

The Boston Globe, February 17, 2007

Missouri's Peak Resorts to pay $73.5 million for Mount Snow, Attitash

Two New England ski resorts, Mount Snow in Vermont and Attitash in New Hampshire, are set to be sold for $73.5 million.

American Skiing Co. of Utah said yesterday it has entered into an accord to sell Mount Snow and Attitash to Peak Resorts Inc. of Missouri.

Included in the proposed sale of Mount Snow and Attitash are the commercial cores of the Grand Summit Hotels at both locations, said American Skiing, which added that the buyer will assume $2 million in debt and other liabilities.

Saying that the sale is expected to close on or before April 30, American Skiing said it plans to use the proceeds to reduce existing debt and for working capital.

The deal will give Eureka, Mo.-based Peak Resorts its first major ski areas. That company operates half a dozen tiny ski areas in Missouri, Ohio, Kentucky, and New Hampshire.

The sale will leave American Skiing with five resorts in the Northeast and Utah.

American Skiing already has agreed to sell Colorado's Steamboat Springs resort to Canadian resort operator Intrawest Corp. for $265 million. David Hirasawa, the company's investor-relations manager, said Steamboat is expected to change hands by March.

American Skiing has been investing heavily in The Canyons, its flagship 3,700-acre resort in Park City, which added terrain and lifts this winter. It also owns Killington and Pico, neighbors in central Vermont, and Maine's Sunday River and Sugarloaf/USA.

The company said Mount Snow, the closest major Vermont resort to the New York City metro area, is the fifth most popular eastern US ski area. It has an 18-hole golf course.

Attitash is a smaller, 280-acre ski hill in the heart of New Hampshire's Mount Washington Valley. It has a water park and alpine slide.

Both resorts sit partly on national forest land, and the sale will require the consent of the US Forest Service. Stockholder approval also will be required.

Hirasawa said the sale also is subject to an antitrust review by the US Justice Department.

Executives at Peak Resorts Inc. didn't immediately return a phone message seeking comment.

Vermont Resort Sold To Missouri Company (AP)

SALT LAKE CITY -- American Skiing Co. said Friday it agreed to sell Vermont's Mount Snow and New Hampshire's Attitash ski areas to Peak Resorts Inc. of Missouri.

American Skiing will sell the two resorts along with Grand Summit Hotels at both locations for $73.5 million, said David Hirasawa, the company's investor-relations manager.

Peak Resorts also will assume $2 million in debt and other liabilities at Mount Snow and Attitash, the company said.

The company planned to keep the management team at Mount Snow but had not made decisions about other staffing, said Tim Boyd, Peak's chief executive officer.

The purchase will give Eureka, Mo.-based Peak Resorts its first major ski areas. That company operates half a dozen tiny ski areas in Missouri, Ohio, Kentucky and New Hampshire.

American Skiing, based in Park City, Utah, said it will use the money to reduce debt and for working capital.

The sale is set for the end of April and will leave American Skiing with five resorts in the Northeast and Utah.

Interior Ethics Lapses Rarely Punished (BOS)

By John Donnelly, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, February 17, 2007

IG: Royalty loss could cost US tens of billions

WASHINGTON -- Officials at the US Interior Department received free golf outings, dinners, hunting trips, and box seats at sporting events from companies they monitored, but were rarely punished for the ethics violations, other than being ordered to attend two-hour ethics courses, the department's inspector general told a House panel yesterday.

Testifying before the House Natural Resources Committee, Earl E. Devaney said the ethical lapses were part of a department-wide culture "replete with a lack of accountability."

Devaney, who for seven years has been the independent overseer of a department that manages oil leases, national parks, and Native American affairs, has been in charge of numerous investigations inside the Interior Department, including one probe that has drawn intense scrutiny: What was behind the omission of royalty payments to the government in oil and gas contracts from 1998 to 1999.

DOJ_NMG_0134111

He said the loss of the payments, which kick in when oil and gas prices reached certain levels, could cost taxpayers "tens of billions of dollars" over the lifetime of the contracts. Six criminal investigations were now under way by the Justice Department relating to unethical behavior in the department, Devaney said.

Asked why the Interior Department has had so many ethical and management problems, Devaney suggested it was simply greed.

"Outside of the money at the Treasury Department, everything else [of value] that someone would want is at Interior -- oil, gas, mines, land, and water," he said. "It's been my experience that when a lot of money is at stake, bad people will show up eventually."

Still, he told the committee that "99.9 percent" of department employees were dedicated and ethical and that Dirk A. Kempthorne , the current department secretary, has in the past year tried to tackle a multitude of serious problems.

"In fairness to him, I have discerned a dramatic shift in attitude since his arrival," Devaney said.

Shane Wolfe , a department spokesman, said he was "heartened" by Devaney's statements noting the change at the department. "There is, of course, room for improvement in any organization," Wolfe added, "and we welcome the work of the inspector general in highlighting the areas that may need improvement."

Congress and Devaney's office have been investigating the broader issue of whether the Interior Department has been properly collecting money from its oil and gas contracts with energy companies. The New York Times first reported the omission of royalty payments during the late 1990s; Devaney said yesterday that he believed Kempthorne first learned of the omissions because of the Times story.

Devaney, 59, said the department's problems were deep and wide, including ineffective law enforcement , notably in Native American detention facilities; inadequate protection of some national parks' resources; a failure to follow funding and procurement laws; and an unethically cozy relationship among senior officials and companies seeking government contracts.

He also said that the Minerals Management Service rarely audited its major contracts and that the organization never reviewed the smaller ones even though they totaled millions of dollars.

"Throughout the department, the appearance of preferential treatment in awarding contracts and procurements has come to our attention far too frequently, and the failure of department officials to remain at arm ' s length from prohibited sources is pervasive," said Devaney, a Boston native who was a police officer in Dennis, Mass., in the late 1960s.

He said senior officials caught in ethical lapses were treated more leniently than junior employees. From 2003 to 2006, he said, his investigators identified 71 employees whose actions triggered ethics probes. The vast majority of those penalized were low- to mid-ranking employees.

Of the 21 senior officials whose ethical behavior was reviewed, more than half were not disciplined, Devaney said. The remainder received a reprimand that often involved a two-hour course on ethics, a transfer, or the option to resign, he said.

Representative Edward J. Markey , a Massachusetts Democrat and a member of the committee, said the findings shows "an upside-down system that punishes junior employees while rewarding or giving a pass to senior officials who have been responsible for horrendous errors in judgment, potentially criminal activities, and the loss of billions in taxpayer revenues."

Robin M. Nazzaro , director of the Government Accountability Office's Natural Resources and Environmental department , told the House panel that the royalty mismanagement could cost taxpayers as much as $10 billion for 576 active leases granted during 1998 and 1999 under the Clinton administration. Another $60 billion in royalties could be at risk because of a lawsuit filed by an oil company challenging the government's right to charge it royalties, she said.

Nazzaro also identified a separate set of problems in addition to Devaney's investigations, including the Interior Department's poor strategy in dealing with the growing number of wildfires, its inadequate land appraisals that have led to the "loss of millions" of dollars, and its failure to collect fees from tourist operations in at least three national parks.

But the committee seemed most interested in the loss of billions of dollars in oil and gas royalty contracts in the late 1990s that inadvertently allowed companies to avoid payments. Devaney characterized it as a mistake; he said he found no criminal intent.

Representative Steve Pearce , a Republican from New Mexico, countered that it must have been a "deliberate omission" and called Devaney's report a "great disservice." Devaney said he stood by the accuracy of his report.

DOJ_NMG_0134112

Six companies have agreed to pay royalties on the leases for production . But 50 other companies have refused to sign any agreement, contending that the US government is legally bound to the contract.

In Energy Conservation, Calif. Sees Light (WP)

By Steven Mufson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 17, 2007

Progressive Policy Makes It a Model in Global Warming Fight

At the height of the 1973 energy crisis, Arthur H. Rosenfeld had a revelation.

Disturbed about having to spend half an hour in line at a gas station one Friday night, the particle physicist calculated that keeping his floor of offices brightly lit all weekend as usual would consume the equivalent of five gallons of gasoline. So Rosenfeld took what then seemed like a bold step: He turned off the lights.

For 30 years, Rosenfeld has been one of the forces guiding California on a mission of conservation. And today the state uses less energy per capita than any other state in the country, defying the international image of American energy gluttony. Since 1974, California has held its per capita energy consumption essentially constant, while energy use per person for the United States overall has jumped 50 percent.

California has managed that feat through a mixture of mandates, regulations and high prices. The state has been able to cut greenhouse-gas emissions, keep utility companies happy and maintain economic growth. And in the wake of the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change report on global warming, California serves as a model for other states seeking a similar path to energy reduction. Now California is pushing further in its effort to cut automobile pollution, spur use of solar energy and cap greenhouse gases.

"California really represents what the rest of the country could do if it paid a bit more attention to energy efficiency," says Greg Kats, managing principal at Capital E, an energy and clean-technology advisory firm. "California is the best argument we have about how to very cost-effectively both reduce energy consumption and cut greenhouse gases. And they've made money doing it." Kats estimates that the average Californian family spends about $800 a year less on energy than it would have without efficiency improvements over the past 20 years.

Today, as an energy consumer, California is more like thrifty Denmark than the rest of the energy-guzzling United States. While the average American burns 12,000 kilowatt-hours a year of electricity, the average Californian burns less than 7,000 -- and that's counting renewable energy sources.

California has managed to cut its contributions to global warming, too. Carbon dioxide emissions per capita in California have fallen by 30 percent since 1975, while U.S. per capita carbon dioxide emissions have remained essentially level.

"If we're going to delay global warming, what we can do in a big hurry is energy efficiency: better cars, better buildings, better industry," says Rosenfeld, who is now a member of the California Energy Commission and who last year won the Energy Department's $375,000 Enrico Fermi Award for his contributions to national energy efficiency. "It's not the whole story. But I think it's at least half the story."

California does have natural advantages. The climate is mild in much of the state, and its high-tech and service sectors are less energy-intensive than older, heavy industry in some other states. However, even accounting for those differences, California has vastly improved its energy efficiency. The growing population and economy are still driving up electricity demand about 1 percent a year, enough to require a new power-generating station every couple of years. But if the state had not changed its pre-1974 trend of electricity consumption, by today it would have needed the equivalent of one nuclear plant every eight miles between San Diego and San Francisco, Rosenfeld says.

The reason for California's success is no secret: Electricity there is expensive, so people use less of it. Thanks to its use of pricey renewables and natural gas and its spurning of cheap coal, California's rates are almost 13 cents a kilowatt hour, according to the Energy Information Administration. The other most-energy-frugal states, such as New Jersey and New Hampshire, charge about 12 cents and 14 cents a kilowatt hour, respectively. Hawaii, which relies on oil-fired plants, tops EIA's list at about 21 cents.

"If the history of energy consumption in the U.S. has taught us anything, it is that cost drives conservation," says Chris Cooper, executive director of the Network for New Energy Choices.

Three of the nation's most profligate users of energy -- Wyoming, Kentucky and Alabama -- have one thing in common: low prices. Their electricity prices range from 5.25 cents a kilowatt hour to 7.06 cents, according to the EIA.

"What's dirt cheap tends to get treated like dirt," Rosenfeld says.

The District, also a wasteful user of energy, has a rate of 10.70 cents a kilowatt hour, only after recent rate increases. Virginia charges average 6.78 cents, and Maryland is at 10.03 cents.

Besides high prices, California has long-standing mandates. In 1974, the state enacted its first building standards for energy efficiency.

In 1976, the governor, Jerry Brown, was looking for a way to make good on his pledge to stop the construction of the proposed one gigawatt Sundesert nuclear plant in Southern California. The answer turned out to be refrigerators -- more efficient refrigerators.

Brown learned, in a meeting with Rosenfeld, who by that time had turned his full attention toward promoting energy efficiency, that California's refrigerators were using the equivalent of five Sundesert plants. A modest improvement in their efficiency would more than offset the need for new power plants, Rosenfeld told him. So the state adopted stringent appliance standards -- before the federal government did -- and staved off construction of the Sundesert plant. The change in California's refrigerators has saved energy equal to all the hydroelectric power produced nationwide, Rosenfeld says.

Next, California adopted an innovative approach to utility regulation called decoupling so that the utilities' profits were no longer linked to simply increasing sales.

Before then, electric utilities made more money when people bought more electricity. So a Midwest utility gave away energy guzzling light bulbs; in California and elsewhere, electric utilities promoted electric stoves or electric water heaters, appliances that run more cleanly and efficiently on natural gas. In December 1973, Rosenfeld had called Pacific Gas & Electric to challenge a newspaper ad the utility was running that said: "Don't mess with the thermostat. You'll use more gas heating your house in the morning than you'll save overnight." Rosenfeld asked the company's research head if he kept his coffee on the stove all night to avoid reheating it in the morning.

In 1982, the state Public Utilities Commission came up with the decoupling idea that would allow utility profits to grow while sales declined. It set separate targets for utility revenue and electricity usage; excess revenue would be returned to consumers; a shortfall in revenue would be added to the next year's consumer bills. Greater efficiency could boost profit margins. Rates are now reviewed every six to 12 months instead of every three years. (A similar approach for natural gas utilities had been adopted in 1978.)

The power companies quickly altered their focus. Now, Rosenfeld says, the state and the utilities spend $700 million a year to promote energy efficiency. "It's cheaper than building power plants," he says. At the moment, the program has expired but is up for renewal.

California remains the only state to have adopted decoupling, though proposals are pending in seven states.

"There's an element of stability of revenues that is very attractive," said Steve Kline, a vice president at Pacific Gas & Electric. "We don't have those huge swings that other companies do if there is an incredibly cold or hot winter." And that, he added, "is viewed favorably in the financial community."

Some utilities that favor decoupling are getting support from their traditional foes: environmentalists. Ralph Cavanagh, senior attorney for the Natural Resources Defense Council in California, has filed written testimony on behalf of Idaho Power Co., which is asking that state's Public Utilities Commission to implement the practice.

"We have to break the link between their financial health and their electricity and natural gas sales," says Cavanagh. "If their financial health is tied to increasing sales, they're unlikely to be efficiency partners."

Energy-efficiency targets are also built into California's solar promotion program. To qualify for a $2,000 rebate, homeowners must show that their homes beat building standards for energy efficiency by 15 percent or more. Often, a change in the color of a home's roof from black to white can save as much electricity as the new solar panels generate, Rosenfeld says.

DOJ_NMG_0134114

Many of these techniques grow out of work Rosenfeld did at the Center for Building Science at the Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory, which he founded in 1975. Over 20 years, the lab developed a variety of energy-efficiency technologies, including electronic ballasts that led to compact fluorescent lamps and a coating for glass that allows light in but blocks heat from either entering (during summer) or escaping (during winter).

But much of the motivation remains economic. The state's disastrous experiment in electricity deregulation -- deregulating supplies while capping retail prices -- led to a supply crisis and rolling blackouts in 2001. Soon, prices rose; PG&E sought bankruptcy protection.

Many manufacturers complain that the high electricity prices make the state an unappealing place to do business. Since 2001, California has lost 375,000 manufacturing jobs, a 19.9 percent drop that slightly exceeded the nationwide decline of 17 percent. Some firms -- such as Buck Knives, with 250 jobs, or bottle manufacturer Bomatic, with 100 jobs -- moved to states such as Idaho or Utah, where they said expenses, including energy, were lower.

Gino DiCaro, a spokesman for the California Manufacturers and Technology Association, says manufacturing investment is also "stalled" because of uncertainty about how the new legislation authorizing limits on greenhouse gases will affect energy costs.
